THE SERMONS AND FELLOWSHIP GIVEN IN CONGREGATION BY ALMIGHTY GOD

(2007 TO SEPTEMBER 25, 2021)

The Importance of Pursuing the Truth and the Path of Its Pursuit

Just now, the brother fellowshiped on the topic of pursuing the truth. Having fellowshiped this much, do you feel how pursuing the truth is the most important thing, and that if you believe in God but do not pursue the truth, you will not gain a thing? Perhaps now some of you are ready, and have made up your minds to pursue the truth diligently, to work hard on God's word, and to strive to understand the truth more and to practice it more. Is this the right mentality? Of course it is. If, having fellowshiped so much, you still have absolutely no reaction, then that is not normal, and these words will be in vain. The truth is the most important thing to everyone who sincerely believes in God and longs for Him to appear and to everyone who loves the truth and hopes to gain God's salvation in the last days. Pursuing the truth is more important than any other thing: It is much more important than our jobs, our lives, or our fleshly prospects. Do you now recognize the importance of pursuing the truth? You are undoubtedly experiencing certain feelings in your hearts, recognizing that pursuing the truth is the most important thing in your lives—a lifelong event for each and every one of you, so to speak. After listening to so much fellowship, each of you may now have such a foundation in your hearts, such knowledge, feeling, and realization. Understanding and feelings such as these are right and accurate, and they prove that what you have received is completely in accordance with God's word, with what He will do on each of you, and with His will.

Most people believe in God for the sake of obtaining blessings. Even if they understand a little of the truth, they cannot relinquish their intent to be blessed. What is man's attitude toward the truth? In their hearts, most people are sick of the truth and they don't even care about it. For man is a stranger to the truth. He does not understand what the truth is, much less where it comes from, why he should pursue it, why he should accept it, why he should practice it, or why God expresses so much of it. All these questions are foreign to every person, and they have never considered them, nor have they ever been exposed to them. Now that God is doing the work of judgment in the last days and has expressed many words, we come into contact with many matters involving every aspect of the truth on the path of belief in God. There is no way out without seeking the truth, so we need an understanding of the truth and must read God's words in light of reality. Every sentence of God's word is the truth, and one needs to experience it personally for them to understand it. Because from birth to adulthood, to getting a job, getting married and settling into a career, everything in the environment in which a person lives—including the people, events, and things they come into contact with and all the things that happen around them—is in fact related to the truth, but not a single person sees these things in terms of the truth. That is why it is said that everyone is a stranger to the truth. No one in all mankind understands the truth, so this requires that you start facing, accepting, and pursuing the truth from now on. This is necessary. If you have not yet understood that believing in God requires pursuing the truth, and that only the truth can change you, perfect you, bring you salvation, and make you truly come to God—if you cannot understand these things, then you will not be interested in the truth, you will not be able to pursue it, and you will lose your enthusiasm as you go along. Some people say, "For belief in God it is good enough to live a church life and do one's duty, so why do we still need to pursue the truth? We do no evil, nor do we follow others, much less follow false leaders or antichrists in resistance to God. We all understand some of the doctrines about believing in God and can uphold our faith in God to the end, so there's no need for us to understand much deeper truths." Is this point of view correct? (It is not.) Why not? (Because it is only when people have obtained the truth that they can be saved by God.) That's right. In their hearts, some people are now vaguely aware of the importance of the truth to mankind's salvation. They may still be far from seeing clearly the value and significance of the truth becoming man's life, but this feeling and awareness in their hearts is very valuable. What is key is whether this feeling and awareness can take root in people's hearts, and that depends on people's future pursuits. That you now have this awareness is a good thing. It gives hope that you may walk the road to salvation. Pursuing the truth is indeed important. For example, when you are passive and weak, can you become strong without the support and provision of the truth? Can you overcome your weaknesses? Can you recognize and dissect what it is that makes you weak and passive? You certainly cannot! When you are careless and perfunctory in the performance of your duties, can you fix this corrupt disposition if you do not pursue the truth? Can you achieve faithfulness to God in doing your duties? Without seeking the truth, can man know himself and fix his own corruption, his own arrogance? Man always has notions about God and is always measuring God with his own notions and imaginings. Can this be fixed in the absence of the truth? It cannot. We face choices in the many things that befall us in life. If we do not understand the truth, if we do not know what God's will is and what He requires of us, then we have no way of practice. We will then reveal our corrupt dispositions, and we will easily make mistakes and take the wrong path. Can the existence of man's corrupt disposition be fixed by the words and doctrines that he understands? If you do not seek the truth, one might say that there are no principles to anything you do in life, no paths to follow, and no goals or directions. If this is the case, then everything you do is contrary to the truth principles, a sign of resistance to God and a betrayal of Him, and your actions will be abhorred and cursed by God. If you live by your corrupt dispositions, not one of you will be saved unless you accept God's judgment and chastisement. Therefore, before genuinely understanding the truth, everyone will have to face some judgment and chastisement, some chastening and discipline. These are all for the purpose of enabling people to obtain the truth and cast off their corrupt dispositions.

Although you understand some of the doctrines of believing in God, you often feel confused when experiencing everything. You feel at a loss and unable to get a grasp of God's will, you do not know what to practice, and no amount of worrying offers up a solution. You want to seek fellowship but you do not know what the problem is, you want to look for answers in God's word, but His word is boundless and you have no goals. Is it not often like this? This is a sign that new believers do not know how to seek the truth in all things. Therefore, most of the questions you ask in gatherings are unrelated to the truth, as are most of the words of your fellowship. This shows that most people do not know how to practice the truth in real life, nor do they know how to seek the truth when events befall them, much less do they have the truth as a principle and a goal for their practice. Is this a difficulty for everyone? If you had grasped the principle of the truth and understood its essence in events that befall you, would you still be confused as often? You certainly would not. Even if you feel some confusion, it is either because your understanding of the truth is too shallow, or because your experience of the truth is limited. You cannot comprehend God's will, your corruption has not been fixed, and you feel pain in your heart. What is your greatest difficulty in pursuing the truth now? Is it that you are afraid when a topic of truth is raised for you to fellowship on? Afraid of expressing words and doctrines and being unable to communicate reality? And more afraid that you will be at a loss when things happen to you? (Yes.) This is because you do not have the truth in your hearts. If you did, you would not find these things so difficult to handle. Some people do not know what to do when events befall them. They know to seek the truth in God's word, but the right answer is not immediately forthcoming, so they take a compromise approach. That is, they content themselves with a literal understanding of the meaning of God's word, and abide by the rules. If they say their prayers and their hearts are peaceful and reassured, and if they ask their brothers and sisters and they haven't any insights greater than their own, then they feel that to practice in this way is enough. In fact, such practice is too far from the standard of truth, too far from the reality of truth, and too far from God's will. This is not the principle of practicing the truth. If you wish to practice and understand the truth, then first you must seek the truth when things happen to you in your everyday life. That is, you must view things based on God's words and the truth; when the essence of the problem is clear to you, then you will know how to practice in accordance with the truth principles. And if you always view things according to God's words, you will be able to see the hand of God—the deeds of God in everything that happens around you. No matter what happens around them, some people think that it has nothing to do with their faith in God or the truth; they merely follow their own inclinations, reacting according to the philosophies of Satan. Can they learn any lessons like this? Certainly not. It is for this reason that many people have believed in God for ten or twenty years and still have no understanding of the truth or life entry. They are incapable of incorporating God into their everyday lives, or of approaching everything that happens around them based on God's words, and so whenever anything happens to them, they cannot tell it for what it really is, nor are they able to handle it based on the truth principles. Such people do not have life entry. Some people only engage their minds when they are reading God's words in assembly; at such times, they are able to speak of a little knowledge, but they cannot implement God's words with anything that happens to them in real life, nor do they know how to practice the truth, and so they think that everything that happens in their everyday lives has no connection to the truth, no relationship with the words of God. In their faith in God, it's as if they treat the words of God and the truth as an area of knowledge, as completely divorced from their everyday lives and utterly separate from their views of things, their life goals, and their life pursuits. What about such a form of belief in God? Will they be able to understand the truth and enter reality? When they believe in God in this way, are they a follower of God? They are not someone who truly believes in God, much less are they a follower of God. All of the problems in their daily lives—including everything involving family, marriage, work, or their prospects—they see as having no connection to the truth, and so try to solve using human methods. Experiencing thus, they will never gain the truth, will never be able to understand just what it is that God wants to accomplish in people, and the effect He wishes to achieve in them. God expresses the truth in order to save people, to cleanse and change their corrupt dispositions, but they are not aware that only if they accept and pursue the truth will they be able to solve their own corrupt dispositions; they are not aware that only when they experience and practice the words of God in their everyday lives can they gain the truth. Are such people not dim and ignorant? Are they not the most foolish, ridiculous people? Some people have never pursued the truth in their faith in God. They think that faith in God means going to assembly, praying, singing hymns, reading God's words; they emphasize religious ceremony, and they never practice or experience God's words. This is how the people of religion believe in God. And when people treat something so important as faith in God as religious conviction, do they not belong to the nonbelievers? Are they not unbelievers? Pursuing the truth requires experiencing many processes. There is a simple side to it, and there is also a complex side. Simply put, we should seek the truth and practice and experience God's words in everything that happens around us. Once you begin to do this, you will see more and more how much truth you need to gain and pursue in your belief in God, and that the truth is so real and the truth is life. God saves humankind so that they can gain the truth as life. All of created humankind should accept the truth as life, not just those who perform duties, who are leaders and workers, or who serve God. God's words are directed to all humankind, and God speaks to all humankind. Therefore, all created beings and all humankind should accept God's words and the truth, seek the truth in all things, and then practice according to the truth principles so that they can become able to practice and obey the truth. If only leaders and workers were required to practice the truth, this would be completely contrary to God's will, because the truth expressed by God is for the whole of humankind, and it is expressed for the purpose of saving humankind, not just to save a few people. If this were the case, the words expressed by God would have little meaning. Do you now have a path to pursue the truth? What is the first thing that must be practiced when pursuing the truth? Before all else, you must spend more time eating and drinking the words of God and listening to sermons and fellowships. When you encounter an issue, pray and seek more. When you have equipped yourselves with more truths, when you grow quickly and possess stature, you will be able to perform a duty, undertake a little work, and will thereby be able to make it through some trials and temptations. At that time, you will feel that you really have understood and gained some truths, and you will sense that the words spoken by God are all the truth, that they are the truths most necessary for the salvation of corrupt mankind, and that they are the truth of life given by the unique Creator. Right now, you have no experience; you only have a little longing in your heart. You feel that God's words are profound, and that they contain too many things you cannot attain, and too many truths that you cannot comprehend. The essence of some things is still unclear, and you feel that your understanding of the truth is too superficial. It is just that you have such longing in your heart and such energy, but whether or not you can obtain the truth depends on how you practice and pursue it in the future.

In the work of judgment of the last days, imagine if God only expresses some simple truths: nothing too deep, much less relating too much to judgment and revelation, but only a little word according to what people can accept and what their minds can receive just some words of promise and blessing or some words of exhortation. Even if people accept these words, can they achieve salvation? Take an example. Suppose God simply says, "The corruption in all of you runs too deep. All of you are without the truth, and you are all unfaithful to Me. Your nature essence has become Satan's nature; you have become living Satans. You are hostile to Me, and you have no love for the truth." He then tells people, "Go and figure it out!" immediately followed by, "Blessed is he who loves the truth. He who is faithful to Me will be able to satisfy My will, walk the road till the end, and gain My promise." Would people's hearts be stirred if God simply told them this? Would they strive toward the truth? How would people feel? "We've read all of God's words, and though we all have corrupt dispositions, we're not evil people and won't resist God. It's just that we have rebellious dispositions, are morally somewhat corrupt and of inferior character, and prefer to follow worldly trends. Now that we understand some truths and can reflect on and know ourselves, we can surely rid ourselves of these corrupt things." Are there many people in this state? They think that to understand the doctrine of belief in God is to understand the truth, and this is very dangerous. Those who proudly preach words and doctrines immediately fall down and are revealed once a trial befalls them. Can a corrupt disposition be shed without pursuit of the truth and acceptance of judgment and chastisement? It is impossible. You should be clear that time is now running out, and if you cannot suffer and pay the price for gaining the truth, it will be easy to waste your time by believing in God based on notions and imaginings. Then, when the great tribulation comes, you will have no time to pursue the truth even if you want to, and you will have lost completely your chance at salvation.

Although you believe in God now, you do not understand God's will. Do you really know why God expresses the truth, and does the work of judgment? Every word, every topic, every truth that God expresses is of significance and extremely beneficial to you. Regardless of whether you can see it, experience it, or feel it today, and no matter how much you have really gained right now, after three to five years of your experience, you will feel that God's words today are true, and how great it is for God to express these words! If God still coddled man as He did in the Age of Grace, calling him "the lamb in His bosom" and the one lost sheep which He would abandon the other ninety-nine to go and find, man would think, "God's mercy and lovingkindness are so great; God's love for man is so deep!" If man always thinks of and looks at God in this way, he will not truly seek God, he will not come to God, he will not submit to God, and he will not have a God-fearing heart. Without a true understanding of God, man's corrupt disposition will not be shed; he will treat God and the truth with an attitude of contempt, and he will resist God as do the devils and Satan. If that is the case, man will never understand what the truth is, he will never truly understand what it is to believe in and to follow God, and what it is to seek and obtain the truth. This is true. If God did not express these words; if He did not chastise and judge every last person and treat everyone with such harsh words, then people would think that believing in God means they have obtained the truth, that believing in God is to be raptured later on, to enter the kingdom and wield power as a king. Some people say, "A man like me could almost be a centurion!" Others say, "I don't ask for much. In the kingdom, I can even watch the gates or sweep the streets!" This is the original intention, the ideal, and the desire of every person who believes in God. God has said so many things that thoroughly reveal man's notions and imaginings, his extravagant desires, and his corrupt disposition. Nothing that man thinks is in accordance with the truth or compatible with God, and nothing that man hopes for or ideally wants to achieve is in accordance with God's will. It is all completely contrary to God. When people believe in God, they are confronted with God's words of judgment and chastisement, with God's words revealing man's nature essence, with words that do not align with man's notions, and with God's way of working that does not align with man's imaginings. Although many people acknowledge that God's words are the truth, and they are willing to cooperate with God's work and accept God's judgment and chastisement, it is very difficult for them to meet God's requirements. When it comes to pursuing the truth, many people become listless, and when it comes to fellowshiping about the truth, they doze off and do not care to listen. But when it comes to mysteries, blessings, and promises, they become animated. What is going on? Deep in their hearts, people do not love the truth. They find pursuing it too troublesome, laborious, too painful, and too high a price to pay. If pursuing the truth were as simple as reading a primary school textbook or a nursery rhyme, some people might be a little interested in it, because it would be simple, easy, and it would not call for a price to be paid or for much energy to be expended. Now, it is quite the opposite. Pursuing the truth is neither that easy, nor that simple. It is not that, if people are of a sufficient caliber to read God's word and understand it, they then naturally enter into the truth reality; understanding words and doctrines does not mean entering into the truth reality. Some people are so energetic in their belief in God that they take notes at gatherings and when listening to sermons and fellowships. But after a while, they think it through and get nothing out of it: They forget it all and can't remember anything, even if they want to, so they feel that obtaining the truth is not easy, and only then do they understand that believing in God is no simple matter. Other people feel that they have gained and understood a lot after gatherings, but after a night's sleep they have forgotten all about it, which is not much different than had there been no gathering. And still others feel enlightened and illuminated after reading God's word. They feel very pleased with themselves, but after talking with unbelievers for a while, their minds wander, and when they go home and pray to God, they can no longer sense Him. They forget all about pursuing the truth, changing their dispositions, and being saved by God. This is because they are too small in stature and only understand some words and doctrines. God's word has not yet taken root in them, proving that they do not yet have a place for God in their hearts, and so, when dealing with outside matters, God is not in charge of their hearts. Experiencing God's work is not a simple matter. Without experiencing some trials, failures, and setbacks, people will not truly make gains, and rote memorization alone will not work. Nowadays, most people only begin to understand some truths after having believed for a few years. Especially after experiencing some setbacks and failures, they feel the importance of pursuing the truth, and only then do they begin to focus on reading God's word, on fellowshiping on the truth, and on practicing the truth. Only then do they begin to enter into reality.

Some people say, "Why is it that when there is some difficulty or obstacle, I feel constrained and don't know what to do, and I feel that believing in God is too difficult? Why is it that when there are difficulties, I become passive and lack the energy to believe in God? Why is it that sometimes I am not interested in meetings or in reading God's word, but if I talk about things of unbelievers, I get excited?" What is going on here? In fact, given man's nature essence, it is because man does not love the truth. If people do not love the truth, can their faith in God be true? Can there be a place for God in their hearts? Is God in their hearts? No, that is certain. If you do not have God in your heart and have no place for God, it proves that you do not have the truth in your heart, you do not understand any truth, and you will not practice any truth. Therefore, when it comes to pondering God's word and practicing the truth, people are listless and have no path. If you are asked to earn money and are told that you can make more money by doing a certain thing, then you will do everything possible to overcome all difficulties and succeed, and you will not be afraid of failure but will keep at it. There are interests attracting you, your heart is possessed by interests, those interests come first in your heart, and you feel that money and interests are too important and are not easily relinquished, so you will try to do everything you can to achieve your own desires and objectives, whatever the cost. Therefore, if you make the pursuit of the truth the number one priority in your life, I believe that you will not be without a path, nor will you be without time, much less experience any difficulties that hinder you in seeking and practicing the truth. Do you possess such resolve? It is like a parent who will pay any price to satisfy their children. When the children say how much it costs to go to college, if the family does not have that much money, then the parents will go around borrowing money, collecting money, or finding ways to do business or take on casual work if they cannot borrow it. No matter how much they suffer, they will manage to scrape together enough money to pay for their children to go to college, to cultivate their children's success, and to give their children good prospects. If you really have such resolve in your pursuit of truth, I think there should be no difficulty that cannot be overcome by any one of you, unless you are mentally deficient or have a congenital brain disorder. Unless you were born with an intellectual disability, you should be able to achieve what a normal person's mind can achieve, and any difficulty is not a difficulty. Because the pursuit of truth is not something that can be obtained by man's imaginings; it requires the work of the Holy Spirit, and man merely cooperates. As long as we have the will to pursue it, the Holy Spirit will guide us, provide for us and enlighten us at any time, allowing us to pass through every difficulty and understand the truth that we do not understand. For what is impossible for man is possible for God, and man is nothing; if God does not work, then all of man's great efforts and exertions are for naught.

In the Age of Grace, people also said they believed in God and followed God, but their goal was to enter heaven. They did not speak of the matter of practicing and experiencing God's word, nor did they know what it meant to be saved. They just abided by the rules, observed the religious services and then read the Bible, and after that they harbored a faint hope, feeling that that was more or less it, and that they would be able to enter heaven once they died. This stage of work in the last days is not that simple, and every item of work of God is a reality that requires us to pay the price in actuality, to seek and experience practically, so that we can obtain the truth from words expressed by God. If people's beliefs still resemble those of the Age of Grace, merely gathering together every week, reading the Bible, and then praying, singing, and praising God, before waiting to be raptured up to heaven or waiting to ascend to the third heaven, then how wildly arrogant a person can become! Corrupt mankind is like this. No matter how God works, as long as He gives man a promise, man will hold on to it, always keeping it as a rule and never seeking God's work or His will in the slightest, but just waiting to be raptured up to heaven. People do not know what they are, they dream of nice things and aspire to great heights. None of them thinks they are of Satan's kind, much less that they are the object of perdition. They all think that if they believe in God sincerely, have suffered a great deal in the performance of their duties, and have never betrayed God, then they are already saved by God and are surely able to enter into the kingdom of heaven. This point of view is wrong, and they really do not understand the truth at all.

Especially when people first believe in God, they are disobedient, resentful, and particularly arrogant, seeing everyone else as an eyesore and considering no one—not even God—to be as good as themselves. Even if a person has accepted Christ, it does not mean that they can accept what Christ says or everything Christ has done. They accept this stage of God's work in name only, and accept the incarnate God in name only, but it does not mean that they have no notions, no imaginings, and no resistance to what God has done. Some people are excited and thrilled when they see Christ, feeling honored in their hearts and that they have not lived in vain. However, because they lack truth and do not know God, they have notions when they see Christ speak, notions when they see Christ deal with things, and notions of what attitude Christ has toward someone; they even have notions, opinions, and ideas on what Christ eats and wears and on any one of His facial expressions or gestures. What is this? It is that the God of man's imagination is fundamentally different from the real God, and for people who inherently have corrupt dispositions and arrogant natures, it is impossible not to have notions, not to resist, and not to judge the incarnate Son of man. If one does not recognize God's divine essence, it is difficult to submit to God and even more so to love Him and fear Him. But how will people who have experienced God's work for many years know and treat the incarnate God, especially those who have listened to a lot of God's sermons and fellowship? They have personally experienced the process from having notions about God to having knowledge of God, from rebellion and resistance to true obedience, and they have personally experienced that everything God does, every word He utters, and everything He handles contains within it truth principles. People should not have notions, much less resistance or aversion in their hearts. After a few years' experience, when people understand a little of the truth, they will treat it correctly, and when they have within them a little of the truth as their life and have acquired the principles of practice, they will naturally not do anything foolish. Those who are new believers and those who have no experience in these matters are prone to rebel against God and resist Him, and they are prone to do foolish and reckless things. Some of a serious nature can judge and blaspheme God and then fall down completely; others are constantly disrupting and disturbing the work of the church, and they are cast out. Are you all now full of notions and imaginings about God? Do you feel that believing in the incarnate God is too difficult? Some people say, "When we used to believe in the Lord, it was quite simple. We just gathered together, listened to sermons, and prayed to the Lord for things; no one asked us to practice the truth and submit to God, let alone led us to practice and experience the Lord's words and pursue the truth. The pastors and preachers just explained the Bible, and we could understand it any way we wanted to. But now that we believe in Almighty God, there are so many truths expressed by Him that we feel that it is too difficult to practice the truth, and it is really hard to enter into reality!" Have you ever thought that if you still believed in God in the way you used to believe in the Lord, would you be able to obtain the truth and life? Can you be saved by God? (We cannot.) The fact that you are able to realize this shows that you have made progress.

Belief in God cannot be based on imaginings or on notions, and even less so on interest. If you believe in God on the basis of a momentary interest or on impulse, then you had better calm down and think carefully about whether you want to continue to believe, whether you really want to pursue the truth, whether you really are a true believer in God, whether you have already made up your mind to walk the path of believing in God, and whether you have already made up your mind to pursue the truth. Why emphasize these points? Because what we now believe in is the incarnate God, and God's incarnation means that He came from heaven to earth and truly became a human, one whose appearance is exactly the same as that of man, but who is Christ, who is God Himself, and who is no simple man. God's incarnation has actually carried out the work of judging and purifying people, actually expressed many words, done a lot of work, and selected many people, and He has been actually expanding His work and His gospel. Each bit of this practical work confirms that God's desire to save and perfect people naturally requires that people actually experience His words and work, so that they can obtain the truth, and truly submit to and worship God. This is what God wants to make complete. From the time you started accepting God's work until now, you may have experienced some things, no matter whether you thought they were transcendent, or whether they were visible to the naked eye or attainable by the human mind; in short, God does everything in a practical way, working on us, among us, and around us, so that we can see it and touch it. Therefore, the pursuit of truth is a practical lesson, and we must seek and practice the truth in everything that befalls us, relying on our efforts to cooperate in order to obtain the truth. Pursuing the truth is not what people imagine it to be. People think that reading God's words and understanding their literal meaning is understanding the truth, and that as long as one can speak skillfully, they are practicing the truth. It is not that simple. The pursuit of truth requires us to actually seek and accept the truth, to suffer and pay the price, to experience, to seek, to ponder, to fellowship, to practice, and to work hard in real life. Only in this way can we gradually enter into and gain from God's word and the truth. One day, when you understand what the truth is, and what the essence of the truth is, you will know that the words spoken by the incarnate God are the needs of our reality, that they are the principles of practice that we need to deal with all our problems, and that these words of God are the goal and direction of our lives. At that time, you will see how meaningful all that God does is, and how important and valuable God's incarnation is to us! Every sentence that God utters, every step of His work, His every word and action, His thoughts, His ideas, and His viewpoints are all for the purpose of purifying and saving people, and none of them is empty; they are all realistic and practical. Therefore, whether one has come from a religion or has been converted from the unbelievers, one should no longer believe in God on the basis of notions and imaginings, and one should no longer engage in religious dreams, dreaming that one will suddenly be taken into the sky to meet with the Lord when the great disasters strike; this is daydreaming. God has come to reveal and judge man, and purify man's corruption by expressing the truth in a practical way, and to save man from Satan's influence in a practical way. During this period, man will have to go through many persecutions and tribulations, and he will experience many prunings and dealings, and many judgments and chastisements before he may be purified and changed; only through this experience of God's work can be obtain the truth. Once you have obtained the truth, God will have a place in your heart, and you will have true fear and obedience to God, which is what God wants done. Once you have understood the truth and know its value, and the truth has taken root in your heart, and you have practical experience and knowledge of the truth, then the word of God will have become the life in your heart. Is this process practical? (It is.) What, then, does this process require that people do? First of all, people must have God-obeying heart, to accept the judgment and chastisement of God's word, and to submit to God's pruning, dealing, trials and refinement, so that they may be purified from their corruption, so that they can practice the truth and achieve obedience to God, and so that they can enter into the reality of God's word. As long as one knows how to experience God's work, they will know what God wants to complete in them and what results He wants to achieve. God's word achieves two main effects on man: First, it allows man to know himself; and second, it allows man to know God. When these two effects have been achieved, then one will truly know God's words, and truly understand the truth.

To know yourself, you must know your own expressions of corruption, your corrupt disposition, your own vital weaknesses, and your nature essence. You must also know, down to the very last detail, those things that are revealed in your daily life—your motives, your perspectives, and your attitude about every single thing—whether you are at home or out, when you are in gatherings, when you are eating and drinking of the words of God, or in every single issue you encounter. Through these aspects you must come to know yourself. Of course, to know yourself on a deeper level, you must integrate God's words; only by knowing yourself based on His words can you achieve results. When accepting the judgment of God's words, don't be afraid of suffering or pain, and moreover, don't be afraid that God's words will pierce your hearts and expose your ugly states. It is so beneficial to suffer these things. If you believe in God, you should read more of God's words judging and chastising people, especially those that reveal the essence of humankind's corruption. You should compare them to your practical state more, and you should connect them to yourself more and others less. The types of states God reveals exist in every person, and they can all be found in you. If you don't believe this, try experiencing it. The more you experience, the more you will know yourself, and the more you will feel that God's words are very accurate. After reading God's words, some people are incapable of connecting them to themselves; they think that parts of these words are not about them, but are instead about other people. For example, when God exposes people as jezebels and whores, some sisters feel that because they have been unerringly faithful to their husbands, such words must not be in reference to them; some sisters feel that since they are unmarried and have never had sex, such words must not be about them, either. Some brothers feel that these words are only aimed at women, and have nothing to do with them; some people believe that God's words of revelation are too severe, that they do not conform to reality, so they refuse to accept them. There are even people who say that in some instances, God's words are inaccurate. Is this the right attitude to have toward God's words? It is obviously wrong. People all view themselves based on their external behaviors. They are incapable of reflecting upon themselves, and coming to know their corrupt essence, amid the words of God. Here, "jezebels" and "whores" refer to the essence of the corruption, filthiness, and promiscuity of mankind. Whether man or woman, married or not married, everyone has corrupt thoughts of promiscuity—so how can it have nothing to do with you? God's words expose people's corrupt dispositions; whether male or female, one's level of corruption is the same. Is this not a fact? We have to first realize that everything God says is the truth, and in line with the facts, and that no matter how severe His words that judge and expose people are, or how gentle His words of fellowshiping the truth or exhorting people are, whether His words are judgment or blessings, whether they are condemnations or curses, whether they give people a bitter feeling or a sweet one, people must accept them all. Such is the attitude people should have toward God's words. What sort of attitude is this? Is it a devout attitude, a pious attitude, a patient attitude, or an attitude of embracing suffering? You are somewhat confused. I tell you that it is not any of these. In their faith, people must firmly maintain that God's words are the truth. Since they are indeed the truth, people should accept them rationally. Whether or not they are able to recognize or admit it, their first attitude toward God's words should be one of absolute acceptance. If God's word doesn't expose you, who does it expose? And if it is not in order to expose you, why are you asked to accept it? Isn't this a contradiction? God speaks to the whole of mankind, every sentence uttered by God exposes corrupt mankind, and no one is exempt—which naturally includes you, too. Not a single one of the lines of God's utterances is about external appearances, or a kind of state, much less about an external rule or a simple form of behavior in people. They are not like that. If you think every line uttered by God is just revealing a simple kind of human behavior or external appearance, then you have no spiritual understanding and you do not understand what the truth is. God's words are the truth. People can sense the profundity of God's words. How are they profound? God's every word exposes people's corrupt dispositions, and essential and deep-rooted things within their lives. They are essential things, not external appearances, and particularly not external behaviors. Viewing people from their external appearances, they might all seem to be good people. But why, then, does God say that some people are evil spirits and some are unclean spirits? This is a matter that is not visible to you. So, one must not treat God's words in light of human notions or imaginings, or in light of human hearsay, and certainly not in light of the ruling party's statements. God's words alone are the truth; man's words are all fallacy. After being fellowshiped to thusly, have you experienced a change in your attitude toward God's words? No matter how great or small the change, the next time you read God's words judging and revealing people, you at least should not try to reason with God. You should stop complaining about God, saying, "God's words of revelation and judgment are really severe; I'm not going to read this page. I'll just skip over it. Let me search for something to read about blessings and promises, so as to find some comfort." You should no longer read the word of God by picking and choosing according to your own inclinations. You must accept the truth and the judgment and chastisement of God's words; only then can your corrupt disposition be cleansed, and only then can you attain salvation.

Although you now know that God's words are all truth, and you are willing to pursue the truth, you still have your own preferences and choices in dealing with God's words, and you will still act according to your own will. You are most willing to read God's words of promise and blessing, and you will particularly remember the words of God's promise. You will feel comforted reading words such as these, or you will feel a little bit of hope and find that you have yet the strength and motivation to believe in God. But you are unwilling to read God's words judging and revealing people, because if one always reads God's words of revealing people and judging and chastising people, then one feels distressed, and the strength to believe in God will fade, so how can one move forward? Nowadays, most people cannot understand God's words revealing mysteries. They feel that they are too deep, and that the words of blessing are beyond their reach. When reading God's words revealing man's corrupt disposition, they can understand some of them, and even if they manage to connect those words to themselves and admit in their hearts that those words are the truth, they are still unwilling to accept them. You see, how troublesome people are! They know that God's word is the truth, but they are still unwilling to accept it; they want to obtain blessings, but they still cannot gain them. So how should one eat and drink God's word properly? First of all, one should read more of God's words that reveal mysteries. When reading such words, one feels that God is in the third heaven and is lofty, and that one should have a God-fearing heart. Then they pray, "Oh God, You are so great! You are supreme! You have sovereignty over all things, and You can determine my destiny; I am willing to submit to all the things that You have arranged to happen around me." Praying this way, people will have some fear of God. People are willing to believe in the lofty God, so before eating and drinking God's word, the first step is to make sure that God is speaking to people from heaven, and people will be willing to read God's word and will be less prone to having notions. The second step is to find some words of God's promises and blessings to eat and drink. On seeing God's words blessing man, people become so excited they begin to weep, saying, "Oh God, You are too lovely! You are so worthy of our worship! We are willing to accept the blessings You have for us, and we are even more willing to accept the promises You have given us. It's just that we are now small in stature and are not yet grown, we lack the qualifications to receive Your promises and blessings, and beseech You to provide for us more!" How good it is to read the words of God's blessing! Then they ponder, "What kind of blessings are there, then? God has said that when the time comes, no calamities will befall man, and that man will be freed from the annoyance of eating three meals a day and washing and cleaning—God has spoken of promises such as these." The more one reads, the more excited one becomes. But no matter how enthusiastic you are, do not forget to pursue the truth. The third step is to read God's words that reveal mankind's corrupt disposition and essence. When it comes to this, it is not necessary to eat and drink much each time; it is sufficient to eat and drink one or two items at a time. After eating and drinking, first put aside the things that you do not understand, the things that can't be connected to you, and ponder carefully the things that can be linked to you, and you will slowly come to know your own state. When you have truly recognized your corrupt disposition, and have understood more and more truths, you will be able to see through to your own nature essence unconsciously. Do you think this is good? (It is.) It is like when giving a child medicine: You first give him something tasty to coax him, then, when he's not paying attention, you give him a mouthful of medicine; if he finds it bitter, you give him two more pieces of candy to coax him, and he will take his medicine. But when he grows up, this is no longer necessary: He drinks the medicine of his own accord, with full knowledge of how bitter it is. This is a matter of stature. If you lack the stature, and you are asked to find in God's word those words that reveal man's corrupt nature and related truths and compare yourself against them, and if you are made to eat and drink of these words all day long, at length you will tire of them, because your experience does not extend to them and is not up to it. And so, you have to add something similar to a sugar-coating in the middle of it, and those who are small in stature should eat and drink of God's words in this way. If you are often weak and passive and have no real faith or hope, you should hurry to eat and drink some words on God's blessings and promises, and find words to eat and drink on God's words revealing mysteries. If you feel your strength increasing and your relationship with God getting closer, then you should strike while the iron is hot and find words to eat and drink on chastisement and judgment, and in this way, eating and drinking will take effect more easily, and you will not delay the growth of life. When eating and drinking of God's words if you are small in stature, you must know how to make adjustments: eating and drinking in such a way as to put yourself in a good frame of mind and grow quickly; eating and drinking of that which is within your reach and setting aside that which is not; and trying to practice and experience what you have understood from eating and drinking. As long as you know how to practice and experience God's words and the truths that you understand, you will be able to enter the right track of believing in God.

I recall someone once saying something like this: There was a man who made a great effort to study when God would leave the earth. This great effort was not thinking about it day and night; rather, it had been a matter of concern to him from when he began to believe in God. In order to find out an accurate answer, he gathered all the words on God's departure, such as when God would leave the earth, what signs there would be, and how the people in the church would react. He then pondered over them with great vigor, making a comprehensive analysis and comparing them against each other, one by one and from front to back, as if consulting a reference Bible. Was this not a great effort? How much did this man "care" for God, and how much "love" did he have for God! God's departure from the earth is a very significant event in God's work, and when he discovered it, he regarded it as the most important thing-more important than his pursuit of truth to achieve salvation, and more important than seeking any items of truth in God's words. So, he gathered all those words together and finally found the "answer." Leaving aside the accuracy of the results of his research, what do you think about the views of this kind of person on the pursuit of faith in God and the way he pursued it? Was the effort he put in necessary? It was pointless to put in such hard work! What has God's departure from the earth got to do with you? God did not inform you of His coming, so He is not going to let you know when He is leaving. There are many things that God does not let people know, and what is the reason for that? The reason is that there is no need for people to know, and if they do know, it will do them no good and will play no role in their future destinations, so there is no need for people to know. Now that God has become flesh, He knows all the mysteries and all aspects of the truth and all things, and He can tell people, but there are some things that people do not need to know, nor is there any need to tell them. Does it have any bearing on man when God departs from the earth, or when He concludes His work? One can say: None whatsoever! Some people say, "How come it doesn't matter? What will I do if it's too late for me to pursue the truth? I have to see how much time is left of God's day, and I have to be certain of the day before I pursue the truth." Is such a person foolish? Are they a pursuer of truth? Not at all! If a person truly pursues the truth, they will not care about this, nor will they wish to concern themselves with these things; they think that caring about these things does not help in the pursuit of the truth and is of no significance, so they are not willing to put thought and effort into these boring topics. Some people are ever concerned about when God's day will come, but is this not a personal agenda? Does your constant concern over when God's day will come prove that you love God? Can it prove that you are a person who does God's will? Can it prove that you bear witness for God? Can it prove that you have contributed to the expansion of the gospel of the kingdom of God? How is your preparation of good deeds going? How much of the truth have you understood? What truth realities have you entered into? These are the things you should be most concerned about. You are always inquiring about God's news, always wanting to know a bit of gossip, always wanting to grasp a bit of mystery. But this is only a curious heart, and not at all a heart that pursues the truth or a heart that is considerate of God, and much less a heart that fears God. Your pursuit of understanding mysteries has not the slightest relation to the pursuit of the truth. How should these kinds of people be treated? Do you respect them? Do you admire them? Do you envy them? Would you help them seek such mysteries? No, you would certainly look down upon them, saying, "We're still no good at the pursuit of truth, at knowing ourselves, and at knowing God we haven't achieved anything yet—and there are truths of every aspect waiting to be sought out, to be understood, and to be practiced, so there is no need for us to put in the effort to study such mysteries." In fact, as long as you have God in your heart and the desire to pursue the truth, when the day comes, God will not leave you in ignorance; He will not abandon you. This is the faith and the understanding you must have. If you have this faith and understanding, you will not do anything foolish. If God intended to tell you, would He not say it directly? Would there be any need to beat around the bush? Would there be any need to hide words within words? Would there be any need to be secretive? Not at all. What God intends to let people know is the truth; everything His work, words, and will express is the truth, and He will not hide them from people at all. Therefore, there is no need for you to inquire about the things that God does not want people to know, nor do you need to mull over them, for the amount of effort you put into those things will be in vain, and it will be of absolutely no value, but it will be abhorrent to God. Why will it be abhorrent to God? First of all, you must understand that God has expressed many truths, and truths are expressed in all areas. If you do not seek the truth to fix your own real problems when things happen to you, you are not a lover of the truth: You are a person who is overly curious; a person who likes to split hairs; a person who treats God's words without proper respect and always in a perfunctory manner. You do not have a place for God in your heart. All you have in your heart are a few things God does not want you to know, such as what His abode—the third heaven—is like and where it really is, what the future kingdom will be like, and when God's incarnation will leave the earth. That is why I say that God abhors you. Is there any reason for God to abhor you? (There is.) Suppose your children did not study hard all day and did not do the homework they were meant to, but instead mulled over questions such as: "How did my father and mother meet? How did they give birth to me? After I was born, did they like me? How will my family fare in the future? Will we be able to make a fortune?" If they always studied these questions, would you dislike such a child? Would you abhor your children doing this? What would you like your children to do? To learn to read and write well and to study hard. This is your intention for your children, so what is God's intention for man? How could God not prefer even more that man follow the right path and do proper work? God does not like people to study Him, or to always be secretly observing His every word and action, or to expend meaningless time and effort on Him. Many are those who are always studying when God's day will come. Are they not doubting and resisting God in their hearts? What is the problem of man neither treasuring nor pursuing the many truths that God expresses? A devout person seeks the truth and feels God's heart in all things, and after reading God's words, they can be sure that they are the truth, and that they should be practiced and obeyed. Only those who do not believe that God's word is the truth will study God. These people do not care one bit about their responsibilities and their own duties; they do not pay attention to them at all and do not make any effort or pay any price for them. Instead, they are always concerned about things such as when God will leave the earth, when God will bring down disaster, and how much longer it will be until God's day, and strange questions such as: "Will God still meet with us after He has left the earth? Will God's work be like this after He has left the earth? After God has left the earth, how long will He stay in the third heaven? Will He come back? Will there be angels in the future Age of Kingdom? Do angels interact with people?" God abhors people constantly studying these kinds of topics. Then what should man focus on? How to know the incarnate God, how to know God's work, and how to receive every word that God has spoken: These are man's responsibilities, and they are the first things that man should seek to understand and to enter into. If you do not seek to understand and enter into these truths, then your belief in God is meaningless—an empty slogan with no real content. If you are always surreptitiously pondering things relating to mysteries and to when God leaves the earth, or if you are always talking among yourselves about where God's flesh was born, what kind of family He was born into, what kind of family background He has, what kind of life He has, how old He is, what kind of education He had, whether He ever believed in God, whether He ever read the Bible, and how long He believed in Jesus, and so on—if you are always studying these things, then you are judging God and blaspheming God's flesh! God wants you to know His disposition and His essence, so that you may understand His heart, be able to obey Him, and be able to practice the truth to satisfy Him; He does not let you study Him and discuss Him behind His back. Therefore, since we have accepted God's incarnation and this stage of God's work, and we have accepted Christ as our life and our God, we should have a God-fearing heart and treat God's possessions and being and the flesh in which He has become incarnate with a devout attitude; this is the sense and humanity we should have. If you feel that you do not have any knowledge of God now, then don't speak of it. Instead, speak of knowing yourself, of how to pursue the truth, and of how to perform your duties well, and equip yourself with these aspects of the truth. One day, when you feel as if you have some real knowledge of God, you can fellowship together. But do not attempt to talk about information concerning God's incarnate flesh or some unknown mysteries, for you may easily offend God's disposition, be condemned by God, and become a blasphemer, and the Holy Spirit will forsake you. This is a matter you must see clearly. Can the pursuit of truth be replaced by always studying God and inquiring into gossip? Can it enable you to know God? If you are unable to see these things clearly, are you not a very foolish and ignorant person?

People must understand exactly what the pursuit of the truth is. Why does God express so many truths to save people? Why does God require people to understand so many truths? If one does not understand these truths, can one fix one's corrupt disposition? Can one know God without understanding these truths? If one does not know God, can one achieve obedience to God? Can one worship God? These truths are all related. How can one achieve salvation without understanding these truths? Is it easy to understand these truths? Can one achieve an understanding of the truth without experiencing judgment and chastisement? Can one know oneself without experiencing prunings and dealings? Can one have true repentance without knowing oneself? Can one achieve salvation without true repentance? All these truths are truths that should be understood by believers in God, and they are truths that must be understood in order to achieve salvation. If your belief in God has always been confused and you have not been pursuing the truth, then you will have lost the meaning of believing in God.

The Most Fundamental Practice of Being an Honest Person

What's your personal experience of being an honest person? (Being an honest person feels really difficult.) Why does it feel difficult? (I really want to be an honest person. But, when I examine myself each day, I find that I'm disingenuous and that there are lots of adulterations in my speech. Sometimes I insert emotion into my words, or I have certain motives when I speak. Sometimes I play little games, or I beat around the bush, or I say things that go against reality—deceptive things, things that are only halftrue, and other kinds of falsehood, all in order to achieve a goal.) All of these behaviors arise from people's corrupt dispositions; they belong to the part of people that is crooked and deceitful. Why do people play at being devious? It's to accomplish their own objectives, to achieve their own goals, and so they use underhanded means. In doing this they are not open and aboveboard, and they are not honest people. It's at these times that people reveal their insidiousness and cunning, or their evilness and contemptibility. This is where the difficulty lies in being honest: With these corrupt dispositions in one's heart, it will indeed seem especially difficult to be an honest person. But if you are someone who loves the truth, and who is able to accept the truth, then being an honest person will not be too hard. You will feel that it is much easier. Those with personal experience know very well that the greatest barriers to being an honest person are people's insidiousness, their deceitfulness, their maliciousness, and their despicable intents. As long as these corrupt dispositions remain, being an honest person will be too difficult. All of you are training to be honest people, so you have some experience in this. What have your experiences been like? (Every day I write down all the garbage I've said and the lies that I've told. Then, I do some introspection and selfanalysis. I've found that there's some sort of intent behind most of these lies, and that

I've told them for the sake of vanity and saving face. Even though I'm aware that what I say doesn't comport with the truth, I still can't help but lie and pretend.) This is what's so hard about being an honest person. Whether or not you're aware of it is not important; the key thing is that you stubbornly continue to lie, knowing what you do is wrong, in order to achieve your aims, to maintain your own image and face, and any claim of ignorance is a lie. The key to being an honest person is to resolve your motives, your intents, and your corrupt dispositions. This is the only way to resolve the problem of telling lies at its source. To achieve one's personal goals, that is, to personally benefit, to take advantage of a situation, to make oneself look good, or to gain the approval of others—these are people's intents and aims when they tell lies. This sort of lying reveals a corrupt disposition, and this is the discernment you need with regard to telling lies. So, how should this corrupt disposition be resolved? That all hinges on whether or not you love the truth. If you can accept the truth and speak without advocating for yourself; if you can stop considering your own interests and instead consider the church's work, the will of God, and the interests of God's chosen people, then you will stop telling lies. You will be able to speak truthfully, and straightforwardly. Without this stature, you won't be able to speak truthfully, proving that your stature is lacking and that you are unable to practice the truth. And so, being an honest person requires a process of understanding the truth, a process of growing in stature. When we look at it this way, it is impossible to be an honest person without eight to ten years of experience. This is the time that must be spent on the process of growing in one's life, on the process of understanding and gaining the truth. Some people might ask: "Can resolving the issue of lying and becoming an honest person really be that hard?" That depends on who you are talking about. If it's someone who loves the truth, then they will be able to give up lying when it comes to certain matters. But if it's someone who doesn't love the truth, then giving up lying will be all the more difficult.

Training oneself to be an honest person is mainly a matter of resolving the problem of telling lies, as well as resolving one's corrupt disposition. Doing this involves a key practice: When you realize that you have lied to someone and tricked them, you should open up to them, lay yourself bare, and make an apology. This practice is of great benefit to the resolution of lying. For instance, if you have tricked someone or if there was some adulteration or personal intent to the words you spoke to them, you should then approach them and dissect yourself. You should tell them: "What I said to you was a lie, designed to protect my own pride. I felt uncomfortable after I said it, so I'm apologizing to you now. Please, forgive me." That person will feel that this is quite refreshing. They'll wonder how there could be a person who, having told a lie, will then apologize for it. Courage like that is something they really admire. What benefits does one gain from having engaged in such practice? Its purpose is not to gain the admiration of others, but to more effectively restrain and inhibit oneself from lying. So, after lying, you must practice apologizing for having done so. The more you train yourself to practice dissecting, laying yourself bare, and apologizing to people in this way, the better the results will be—and the number of lies you tell will grow smaller and smaller. Practicing dissecting and laying yourself bare in order to be an honest person and restrain yourself from lying requires courage, and apologizing to someone after lying to them requires even more courage. If you practice this for a year or two—or perhaps for three to five years—you are guaranteed to see clear results, and it will not be difficult to rid yourselves of lies. Ridding oneself of lies is the first step toward becoming an honest person, and it cannot be taken without three or five years of effort. After the problem of lying has been resolved, the second step is to resolve the problem of deception and trickery. Sometimes, trickery and deception do not require a person to lie—these things can be accomplished through action alone. A person may not outwardly lie, but they might still harbor deception and trickery in their heart. They will know this better than anyone else, because they have thought about it deeply and considered it carefully. It will be easy for them to recognize upon later reflection. Once the problem of lying has been resolved, resolving the problems of deception and trickery will be a little easier by comparison. But one must possess a Godfearing heart, for man is governed by intent when he engages in deception and trickery. Others cannot perceive this from the outside, nor can they discern it. Only God can scrutinize this, and only He knows about it. Therefore, one can only resolve the problems of deception and trickery by relying on prayer to God and accepting His scrutiny. If one does not love the truth or fear God in their heart, their deception and trickery cannot be resolved. You may pray before God and admit your mistakes, you may confess and repent, or you may analyze your corrupt disposition—stating truthfully what you were thinking at the time, what you said, what your intent was, and how you engaged in deception. This is all relatively easy to do. However, if you are asked to lay yourself bare to another person, you might lose your courage and resolution because you want to save face. It will then be very difficult for you to practice opening up and laying yourself bare. Perhaps you're able to admit, in a general way, that you occasionally find yourself speaking or acting based on your own personal aims and intent; that there is a level of deceit, adulteration, lies or trickery in the things you do or say. But then, when something happens and you are made to dissect yourself, exposing how things played out from beginning to end, explaining which of the words you spoke were deceptive, what intent was behind them, what you were thinking, and whether or not you were being malicious or sinister, you don't want to go into specifics or give details. Some people will even gloss over things, saying: "That's just the way things are. I'm just quite a deceitful, insidious, and unreliable person." This shows their inability to properly face their corrupt essence, or how deceitful and insidious they are. These people are always in a mode and a state of evasion. They are always forgiving and accommodating themselves, and are unable to suffer or pay a price to practice the truth of being an honest person. Many people have been preaching the words and doctrines for years, always saying: "I'm so deceitful and insidious, there's often trickery in my actions, and I don't treat people sincerely at all."

But after shouting that for so many years, they remain just as deceitful as they were before, because one never hears genuine dissection or remorse from them when they reveal this deceitful state. They never lay themselves bare to others or apologize after lying or tricking people, much less do they fellowship about their experiential testimony of self-dissection and self-knowledge in gatherings. Nor do they ever say how they came to know themselves or how they repented with regard to such matters. They do none of these things, which proves that they do not know themselves and have not truly repented. When they say they are deceitful and want to be an honest person, they simply shout slogans and preach doctrine, nothing more. It may be that they do these things because they are trying to swim with the tide and follow the herd. Or, it may be that the environment of church life compels them to go through the motions and put up a front. Either way, such shouters of slogans and preachers of doctrine will never truly repent, and they will definitely not be able to attain God's salvation.

Every truth that God requires people to practice requires them to pay a price, to really practice and experience them in their real lives. God does not ask people to pay lip service by merely reciting words and doctrines, talking of self-knowledge, acknowledging that they are deceitful, that they are liars, that they are cunning, crooked and treacherous, or to say these things out loud a few times and then be done with it. If someone admits to all this but then doesn't change in the slightest after the fact; if they continue lying, cheating, and being deceitful; if they employ the same satanic tricks, the same satanic methods when they encounter something; if their means and methods never change, then is this person capable of entering into the truth reality? Will they ever be able to change their disposition? No—never! You must be able to reflect and know yourself. You must have the courage to open up and lay yourself bare in the presence of the brothers and sisters, and fellowship your true state. If you do not dare to lay bare or dissect your corrupt disposition; if you do not dare to admit your mistakes, then you are not in pursuit of the truth, much less are you someone who knows themselves. If everyone is like those religious people who show off to gain others' admiration, who bear witness to how much they love God, how much they submit to Him, how devoted they are to Him and how much He loves them, all to gain the respect and admiration of others; and if everyone harbors their own individual plans and maintains a private space within their hearts, then how can anyone talk of real experiences? How could anyone have true experiences to communicate with each other? Sharing and communicating your experiences means fellowshiping your experience and knowledge of God's words. It is about giving voice to every thought in your heart, to your state, and to the corrupt disposition that is revealed in you. It is about letting others discern these things, and then solving the problem by fellowshiping the truth. Only when experiences are fellowshiped in this way does everyone benefit and reap the rewards. Only this is the true church life. If it's just empty talk on your insights into God's words or a hymn, and then you commune as you please without taking it any further, without bringing in your actual states or problems, that kind of fellowship brings no benefit. If everyone talks about doctrinal or theoretical knowledge, but says nothing about the knowledge they have gained from actual experiences; and if, when fellowshiping the truth, they avoid talking about their personal lives, their real-life problems, and their own inner worlds, then how can genuine communication occur? How can there be any real trust? There cannot be any! If a wife never voices the words in her heart to her husband, does that count as intimacy? Can they possibly know what's on each other's mind? (No, they can't.) Suppose, then, that they are constantly saying, "I love you." They say only this, but they never lay bare or tell each other what they are actually thinking deep down, what they expect from their partner, or what problems they are having. They never confide in each other, and when together, they have nothing but superficial niceties for each other. Are they then truly husband and wife? Certainly not! Likewise, if brothers and sisters are to be capable of confiding in each other, helping each other out, and providing for one another, then each person must speak of their own true experiences. If you say nothing about your own true experiences—if you only preach the words and doctrines that man understands, if you only preach a bit of doctrine about belief in God and give banal platitudes, and do not open up about what's in your heart—then you are not an honest person, and you are incapable of being an honest person. To use the same example: while living together for several years, a husband and wife try to get used to each other, occasionally locking horns. But if you are both of a normal humanity, and you always speak to him from the heart, and he to you, concerning whatever difficulties you encounter in life or at work, whatever you are thinking deep down and however you plan to sort things out, or what ideas or plans you have for your children's future, and you tell your partner all these things, then will the two of you not feel especially intimate with each other? But if he never tells you his innermost thoughts and simply brings home a paycheck; if you never speak to him of your own thoughts and you never confide in each other, then will there not be an emotional distance between the two of you? There surely will be, for you do not understand each other's thoughts or plans. Ultimately, you will not be able to tell what kind of person your partner is, nor will he be able to tell what kind of person you are. You will not understand his needs, nor will he understand yours. If people have no verbal or spiritual communication, then there is no possibility of intimacy between them, and they cannot provide for each other or help one another. You have experienced this, have you not? If your friend confides everything to you, giving voice to all that they are thinking and whatever suffering or happiness they harbor, then will you not feel especially close to them? The reason they are willing to tell you these things is because you have confided your innermost thoughts to them as well. You are particularly close, and it is because of this that you are able to get along so well and help each other out. Without this kind of communication and exchange between the brothers and sisters in the church, they would be unable to get along harmoniously, and would find it impossible to work well together while performing their duties. That's why fellowshiping the truth requires spiritual communication, and the ability to speak from the heart. This is one of the principles one must have in order to be an honest person.

When some people hear that, to be an honest person, one must tell the truth and speak from the heart, and if they lie or deceive they must open up, lay themselves bare, and admit their mistakes, they say: "It's hard being honest. Do I have to say everything I think to others? Isn't it enough to fellowship the positive things? I don't need to tell others of my dark or corrupt side, do I?" If you do not lay yourself bare to others, and do not dissect yourself, then you will never know yourself. You will never recognize what kind of thing you are, and other people will never be able to trust you. This is a fact. If you wish for others to trust you, first you must be honest. To be an honest person, you must first lay your heart bare so that everyone can look into it, see all that you are thinking, and look upon your true face. You must not try to disguise yourself, or cover yourself up. Only then will others trust you and consider you to be an honest person. This is the most fundamental practice, and a prerequisite to being an honest person. If you are always pretending, always feigning holiness, nobility, greatness, and high character; if you do not let people see your corruption and your flaws; if you present a false image to people so that they believe you have integrity, that you're great, selfdenying, just, and selfless—is this not deceitfulness and falsity? Will people not be able to see through you, given time? So, do not put on a disguise or cover yourself up. Instead, lay yourself and your heart bare for others to see. If you can lay your heart bare for others to see, if you can lay bare all your thoughts and plans-both positive and negative—isn't that honesty? If you can lay yourself bare for others to see, then God, too, will see you. He will say: "If you have laid yourself bare for others to see, then you are surely honest before Me." But if you only lay yourself bare to God when out of view of other people, and always pretend to be great and noble or selfless when in their company, then what will God think of you? What will He say? He will say: "You are a thoroughly deceitful person. You are thoroughly hypocritical and vile, and you are not an honest person." God will thus condemn you. If you wish to be an honest person, then regardless of whether you are before God or other people, you should be able to provide a pure and open account of your inner state and the words in your heart. Is this easy to achieve? It requires a period of training, as well as frequent prayer and reliance on God. You must train yourself to speak the words in your heart simply and openly on all matters. With this kind of training, you can make progress. If you encounter a major difficulty, you must pray to God and seek the truth; you need to fight in your heart and overcome the flesh, until you can practice the truth. In training yourself this way, little by little, your heart will gradually open up. You will become more and more pure, and the effects of your words and actions will be different than before. Your lies and tricks will become fewer and fewer, and you will be able to live before God. You will then, essentially, have become an honest person.

Having been corrupted by Satan, all mankind lives in a satanic disposition. Like Satan, people disguise and package themselves in every aspect, and they resort to deceit and game-playing in all matters. There is nothing in which they do not resort to deceit and game-playing. Some people even play deceitful games in activities so common as shopping. For instance, they may have bought a most fashionable outfit, but—though they really love it—they do not dare wear it in church, for fear that their brothers and sisters will talk about them and call them shallow. So, they just wear it behind the others' backs. What sort of behavior is this? It is the revelation of a deceitful and cunning disposition. Why would someone buy a fashionable outfit, but not dare to wear it in front of their brothers and sisters? In their heart, they like fashionable things, and they follow the trends of the world as unbelievers do. They are afraid of the brothers and sisters seeing through them, seeing how shallow they are, seeing that they are not a respectable and upstanding person. In their heart, they pursue fashionable things and have trouble letting go of them, so they can only wear them at home and are afraid to let their brothers and sisters see them. If the things they like cannot see the light of day, then why can they not give them up? Is there not a satanic disposition controlling them? They constantly speak the words and doctrines, and they seem to understand the truth, yet they are unable to put the truth into practice. This is a person who lives by a satanic disposition. If someone is always fraudulent in speech and in action, if they do not let others see them for what they are, and if they always affect the image of a pious person in front of others, then what is the difference between them and a Pharisee? They want to lead the life of a whore, but also have a monument built to their chastity. They knew full well that they couldn't wear their exotic outfit in public, so why did they buy it? Was it not a waste of money? It's just because they like that sort of thing and had their heart set on that outfit, so they felt that they had to buy it. But once they have bought it, they cannot wear it out. After a few years have passed, they regret buying it, and have a sudden realization: "How could I have been so foolish, so disgusting as to do that?" Even they are disgusted by what they did. But they cannot control their actions, because they're unable to let go of the things they like and pursue. So they adopt two-faced tactics and trickery to satisfy themselves. If they reveal a deceitful disposition in such a trifling matter, will they be able to practice the truth when it comes to something bigger? It would be impossible. Evidently, it is their nature to be deceitful, and deceit is their Achilles' heel. There was a six- or seven-year-old child, who ate something nice once with his family. When the other children asked what it was, the child blinked his eyes and said, "I forgot," when in fact he just did not want to tell them. Could he have really forgotten what he just ate? This six- or seven-year-old child was capable of telling lies. Was that something adults taught him to do? Was it an effect of his home environment? No—this is man's nature, his heritage; man is born with a deceitful disposition. In fact, whatever nice thing the child ate, this was a normal thing to do. His parents made it for him; he did not steal someone else's food. If this child could tell a lie in such circumstances, when it was not necessary to do so at all, then would he not be even more likely to lie in other matters? What problem does this illustrate? Is this not a problem with his nature? That child is all grown up now, and lying has become their nature. He is indeed a deceitful person; one could see that in him from guite a young age. Deceitful people cannot help but lie and trick others, and their lies and trickery can show themselves at any time and place. They do not need to learn how to do these things, or be instigated to do them they are born with the ability to do so. If that child could make up lies to trick people at such a young age, could his lying really be a one-off transgression? Certainly not. This shows that he is, by nature essence, a deceitful person. Is such a simple thing not easy to discern? If someone has been telling lies since childhood, lies often, even lies and tricks people with regard to simple matters that do not require them to do so, and if lying has become their nature, then it will not be easy for them to change. They are an authentically deceitful person. Why say that deceitful people cannot be saved? Because they are unlikely to accept the truth, so they cannot possibly be purified and transformed. Those who can receive God's salvation are different. They are relatively guileless from the get-go, and if they tell a little lie they'll likely blush and feel unsettled. It's easier for someone like that to become an honest person: If you asked them to lie or cheat, they would find it difficult. When they do lie they can't get all the words out, and everyone can tell right away. These are relatively simple people, and they are more likely to achieve salvation if they can accept the truth. This kind of person only lies under special circumstances, when their back is up against a wall. In general, they are always able to tell the truth. As long as they pursue the truth, they'll be able to cast off this aspect of corruption with a few years of efforts, and then it won't be hard for them to become an honest person.

What is God's standard for the honest people that He requires? How are God's requirements given in Three Admonitions, this chapter of God's words? ("Honesty means giving your heart to God, being genuine with God in all things, being open with Him in all things, never hiding the facts, not trying to deceive those above and below you, and not doing things only to curry favor with God. In short, to be honest is to be pure in your actions and words, and to deceive neither God nor man. ... If your words are riddled with excuses and valueless justifications, then I say that you are someone who is loath to put the truth into practice. If you have many confidences that you are reluctant to share, if you are highly averse to laying bare your secrets—your difficulties before others to seek the way of the light, then I say that you are someone who will not attain salvation easily, and who will not easily emerge from the darkness" (The Word, Vol. 1. The Appearance and Work of God).) There is one particularly important sentence in here. Do you see what it is? (God says: "If you have many confidences that you are reluctant to share, if you are highly averse to laying bare your secrets—your difficulties—before others to seek the way of the light, then I say that you are someone who will not attain salvation easily, and who will not easily emerge from the darkness.") Right, that's it. God says: "If you have many confidences that you are reluctant to share." People have done many things that they don't dare speak of, and have too many dark sides. None of their day-to-day actions are in accordance with the word of God, and they do not rebel against the flesh. They do whatever they want, and even after believing in God for so many years, they have not entered into the truth reality. "If you are highly averse to laying bare your secrets—your difficulties—before others to seek the way of the light, then I say that you are someone who will not attain salvation easily, and who will not easily emerge from the darkness." Here, God has pointed humans toward a path of practice. If you do not practice in this way, and merely shout slogans and doctrines, then you are someone who will not receive salvation easily. This is indeed linked to salvation. Being saved is very important to each and every person. Has God mentioned "not attaining salvation easily" anywhere else? Elsewhere, He seldom refers to how difficult it is to be saved, but He does speak of it when talking about being honest. If you are not an honest person, then you are someone who is very difficult to save. "Not attaining salvation easily" means that if you do not accept the truth, it will be difficult for you to be saved. You will be incapable of taking the right track to salvation, and so it will be impossible for you to be saved. God uses this phrasing in order to give people some leeway. Which is to say: you are not easy to save, but if you put God's words into practice, then you have a hope of attaining salvation. That's its obverse meaning. If you do not practice according to God's words, and never dissect your secrets and your challenges, and never open yourself in fellowship to others, neither fellowshiping nor analyzing nor bringing to light your corruption and fatal flaws with them, then you cannot be saved. And why is that? If you do not lay yourself bare or dissect yourself in this way, you will not hate your own corrupt disposition, and so your corrupt disposition will never change. And if you are unable to change, how can you even think about being saved? God's words clearly show this, and these words demonstrate God's will. Why does God always stress that people should be honest? Because being honest is very important—it has a direct bearing on whether or not a person can submit to God and whether or not they can attain salvation. Some people say: "I'm arrogant and self-righteous, and I often get angry and reveal corruption." Others say: "I'm very shallow, and vain, and I love it when people flatter me." These are all things that are visible to people from the outside, and they are not big problems. You should not keep going on about them. No matter what your disposition or character is, as long as you are able to be an honest person as God requires, you can be saved. So, what do you say? Is it important to be honest? This is the most important thing, which is why God talks about being honest in the chapter of His words, Three Admonitions. In other chapters, He mentions frequently that believers should have a normal spiritual life and a proper church life, and He describes how they should live out a normal humanity. His words on these matters are general; they are not discussed too specifically or in too much detail. However, when God speaks about being honest, He points out the path for people to follow. He tells people how to practice, and He speaks with ample detail and clarity. God says: "If you have many confidences that you are reluctant to share, if you are highly averse to laying bare your secrets—your difficulties—before others to seek the way of the light, then I say that you are someone who will not attain salvation easily." Being honest relates to attaining salvation. So, what do you say, why does God demand that people be honest? This touches on the truth of human comportment. God saves honest people, and those He wants for His kingdom are honest people. If you are capable of lies and trickery, you are a deceitful, crooked, and insidious person; you are not an honest person. If you are not an honest person, then there is no chance that God will save you, nor can you possibly be saved. You say that you are very pious now, that you are not arrogant or self-righteous, that you are able to pay a price when performing your duty, or that you can spread the gospel and convert many people. But you are not honest, you are still deceitful, and you have not changed at all, so can you be saved? Absolutely not. And so these words of God remind everyone that, to be saved, they must first be honest in accordance with the words and requirements of God. They must open themselves up, lay bare their corrupt dispositions, their intents and secrets, and seek the way of the light. What does it mean to "seek the way of the light"? It means seeking the truth in order to resolve your corrupt disposition. When you lay bare your corruption, the goals and intents that lie behind your actions, you also dissect yourself, after which you seek: "Why did I do that thing? Is there a basis for God's words in this? Is this in line with the truth? By doing this, am I knowingly doing something wrong? Am I deceiving God? If I am deceiving God, then I shouldn't do this; I should look at what God requires, and at what God says, and find out what the truth principles are." This is what it means to seek the truth; this is what it means to walk in the light. When people are able to practice this regularly, they are able to truly change, and thus they are able to attain salvation.

That God asks for people to be honest proves that He truly loathes and dislikes deceitful people. God's dislike of deceitful people is a dislike of their way of doing things, their dispositions, their intents and their methods of trickery; God dislikes all of these things. If deceitful people are able to accept the truth, admit to their deceitful dispositions, and are willing to accept God's salvation, then they too have a hope of being saved—for God treats all people equally, as does the truth. And so, if we wish to become people who please God, the first thing we must do is change our principles of comportment. No longer can we live according to satanic philosophies, no longer can we get by on lies and trickery. We must cast off all our lies and become honest people. Then God's view of us will change. Previously, people always relied on lies, pretense, and trickery while living among others, and used satanic philosophies as the basis of their existence, their lives, and the foundation for their comportment. This was something that God despised. Among unbelievers, if you speak frankly, tell the truth, and are an honest person, then you will be slandered, judged, and forsaken. So you follow worldly trends and live by satanic philosophies; you become more and more skilled at lying, and more and more deceitful. You also learn to use insidious means to achieve your goals and protect yourself. You become more and more prosperous in Satan's world, and as a result, you fall deeper and deeper into sin until you cannot extricate yourself. In God's house, things are precisely the opposite. The more you lie and play deceitful games, the more God's chosen people will become sick of you and forsake you. If you refuse to repent and still cling to satanic philosophies and logic, if you use ploys and elaborate schemes to disguise and package yourself, then you are very likely to be revealed and cast out. This is because God hates deceitful people. Only honest people can prosper in God's house, and deceitful people will eventually be forsaken and cast out. All of this is preordained by God. Only honest people can have a share in the kingdom of heaven. If you do not try to be an honest person, and if you don't experience and practice in the direction of pursuing the truth, if you don't expose your own ugliness, and if you don't lay yourself bare, then you will never be able to receive the Holy Spirit's work and gain God's approval. No matter what you do or what duty you perform, you must have an honest attitude. Without an honest attitude, you cannot perform your duty well. If you always perform your duty in a careless and perfunctory way, and you fail to do something well, then you should reflect on yourself, understand yourself, and open up to analyze yourself. Then you should seek the truth principles and strive to do better next time, instead of being careless and perfunctory. If you do not try and satisfy God with a heart that is honest, and always look to satisfy your own flesh, or your own pride, then will you be able to do a good job? Will you be able to perform your duty well? Certainly not. Those who are deceitful are always perfunctory when they perform their duty; whatever duty they are in, they do not do it well, and such people find it hard to attain salvation. Tell Me—when deceitful people put the truth into practice, do they engage in deceit? Putting the truth into practice requires them to pay a price, to relinquish their own interests, to open up and lay themselves bare to others. But they hold something back; when they speak, they only give half away, and hold on to the rest. Others always have to guess what they mean, and always have to connect the dots to work out their meaning. They always give themselves room to maneuver, they give themselves some wiggle room. When others notice that they are deceitful, they don't want to have anything to do with them, and are put on their guard against them in anything they do. They lie and cheat and others can't trust them, not knowing what is true and what is false in the things they say, or how adulterated those things are. They often go back on their word with others and people place no value on them in their hearts. Then what about in God's heart? How does God see them? God detests them even more, because God looks into the depths of people's hearts and minds. Humans can only see what's on the surface, but God sees more accurately, more incisively, and more realistically.

No matter how long you've been a believer, what your duty is or what work you do, whether your caliber is high or low or your character is good or bad, as long as you can accept the truth and seek to become an honest person, you will certainly reap the rewards. Some people who do not seek to become an honest person think that doing their duty well is good enough. To them, I say, "You will never be able to do your duty well." Others think that being an honest person is no big deal, that seeking to serve God's will is the bigger task, and that this is the only way to satisfy God. Then go ahead and give it a try—see if you can serve God's will without becoming an honest person. Others do not seek to become honest people, but are content to pray every day, go to gatherings on time, eat and drink God's words, and just not live the way unbelievers do. As long as they don't break the law or do anything evil, that's good enough. But can God be satisfied this way? How can you satisfy God if you're not an honest person? If you're not an honest person, then you're not the right sort of person. If you're not honest, then you are crooked and crafty. You do things in a careless and perfunctory way, display all sorts of corruption, and are unable to put the truth into practice even when you want to. Anything outside of being an honest person means that nothing is done well—you will have no way to achieve submission to God or to satisfy Him. How can you satisfy God in anything you do without an attitude of honesty? How can you satisfy God if you perform your duty without an honest attitude? Could you do it properly? You always think of your own flesh and your own prospects, you always want to lessen the suffering of your flesh, to expend yourself less, to sacrifice less, to pay less of a price. You are always holding something back. This is a deceitful attitude. Some people are calculating even when it comes to expending themselves for God. They say: "I have to live comfortably in the future. What if God's work never comes to an end? I can't offer up one hundred percent of myself to Him; I don't even know when the day of God will come. I need to be calculating, to make arrangements for my family life and my future before I expend myself for God." Are there many people who think this way? What disposition is it when one is calculating and makes contingency plans for themselves? Are these people loyal to God? Are they honest people? Being calculating and making contingency plans is not of one heart with God. It is a deceitful disposition, and the people who do this are acting in deceit. The attitude with which they treat God is certainly not an honest one. Some people are afraid that, while interacting or associating with them, their brothers and sisters will see through to their problems and say they are of small stature, or look down on them. So when they speak, they always try to give the impression that they are very zealous, that they long for God, and that they are keen to practice the truth. But inside, they are actually terribly weak and negative. They pretend to be strong so that no one can see through them. This is also deceit. In short, in anything you do, whether in life or in the performance of a duty, if you engage in falsehood and pretense or use false appearances to beguile or deceive others and make them esteem and worship you, or not look down on you, this is all deceit. Some women adore their husbands, when in fact, their husbands are demons and nonbelievers. Afraid that her brothers and sisters will say her affections are too strong, such a woman will be the first to say: "My husband is a demon." But, in her heart, she says: "My husband is a good man." The former is what she says with her mouth—but that is just for the others to hear, so they think she has discernment toward her husband. What she really means is: "Don't bring this matter to light. I'll express this view first so there's no need for you to mention it. I've already exposed my husband as a demon, so that means I've let go of my affections and you won't have anything to say about it." Isn't that being cunning? Isn't that a facade? If you do this then you are deceiving people and misleading them by putting up a front. You are playing games, playing tricks at every turn, so that what others see is your false image, not your true face. This is sinister; this is man's deceitfulness. Since you've acknowledged that your husband is a demon, then why not divorce him? Why not reject that demon, that Satan? You say that your husband is a demon, but continue spending your life with him—this shows that you like demons. You say with your mouth that he is a demon, but you don't admit that in your heart. This means that you are deceiving others, hoodwinking them. It also shows that you are in cahoots with demons, that you are shielding them. If you were someone who could practice the truth, you would divorce your husband as soon as you acknowledged that he was a demon. Then you could bear witness, and it would show you were drawing a clear line between you and the devil. But unfortunately, not only have you failed to draw that line, you are living out your days with a demon, and misleading the brothers and sisters with lies and deceit. This proves that you are of the same ilk as the devil, that you are another lying demon. They say a woman follows the man she marries, whether he be a cock or a dog. Since you married a demon and never turned your back on him, that proves that you are also a demon. You are of the devil, but you say that your husband is a demon to prove that you are of God—isn't this a tactic of lying and deception? You are well aware of the truth, but still use such means to pull the wool over others' eyes. This is insidious; this is deceitful. All those who are insidious and deceitful are demons through-and-through.

Everyone has a corrupt disposition. If you do some introspection, you'll clearly see some states or practices in which you give others a false impression or act deceitfully; all of you have times when you put on an act or are hypocritical. Some people say: "Then why haven't I noticed? I'm a guileless person. I've been bullied and swindled to no end in this world, and I've never once been deceitful. I just say whatever's on my heart." That still doesn't prove that you're an honest person. It's possible you're just unintelligent, or not very educated, or maybe you're easily pushed around in groups, or maybe you're an inept coward lacking wisdom in your actions, possessing few skills, and on a lower rung in society—it still doesn't mean that you're an honest person. An honest person is one who can accept the truth—not a pitiable wretch, a good-for-nothing, an idiot, or a guileless person. You should be able to discern these things, right? I often hear some people say: "I never tell lies—I'm always the one being lied to. I'm always getting pushed around by people out there. God said He lifts the needy up from the dunghill, and I am one of those people. This is God's grace. God takes pity on people like us, guileless people who are not welcome in society. This truly is God's compassion!" God saying He lifts the needy up from the dunghill does have a practical side to it. Although you can recognize that, it doesn't prove that you're an honest person. In fact, some people are just morons, idiots; they're fools with absolutely no skills, low in caliber, and with no understanding of the truth. That kind of person has absolutely no connection to the honest people that God speaks of. It is the case that God lifts the needy up from the dunghill, but idiots and fools aren't the ones being lifted. Your caliber is innately very low, and you are an idiot, a good-for-nothing, and even though you were born into a poor family and are a member of society's lower class, you are still not a target for God's salvation. Just because you've suffered a lot and endured discrimination in society, just because you've been pushed around and cheated by everyone, don't think that makes you an honest person. If you think that, then you are sorely mistaken. Have you been holding on to any misunderstandings or misconceptions of what an honest person is? Have you gained some clarity with this fellowship? Being an honest person isn't like people think it is; it isn't being a straight talker who refrains from equivocation. A person might naturally be very straightforward, but that doesn't mean that they don't engage in trickery or deceit. All corrupt humans have corrupt dispositions that are cunning and deceitful. When people live in this world, under Satan's influence, governed and controlled by its force, it is impossible for them to be honest. They can only become ever more deceitful. Living amid a corrupt humankind, being an honest person certainly involves many difficulties. We are likely to be mocked, vilified, judged, even excluded and driven out by unbelievers, devil kings, and living demons. So, is it possible to survive as an honest person in this world? Is there any room for us to survive in this world? Yes, there is. There is certainly room for us to survive. God has preordained and chosen us, and He surely opens up a way out for us. We believe in God and follow Him entirely under His guidance, and we live entirely by the breath and life He bestows. Because we have accepted the truth of God's words, we have new rules for how to live, and new goals for our lives. The foundations of our lives have been changed. We have adopted a new way of living, a new way of comporting ourselves, entirely for the sake of gaining the truth and being saved. We have adopted a new mode of living: We live in order to perform our duties well and satisfy God. This has absolutely nothing to do with what we physically eat, what we wear, or where we live; it is our spiritual need. Many people feel that being an honest person is too difficult. One part of this is that getting rid of a corrupt disposition is really hard. On top of that, if you're living among unbelievers—and especially if you're working with them—then being an honest person and telling the truth can get you laughed at, slandered, judged, even ostracized or driven out. That creates challenges for our survival. Many people say: "Being an honest person isn't viable. I'll be at a disadvantage if I speak frankly, and I won't get anything done without telling lies." What sort of perspective is this? That's the perspective and the rationale of a deceitful person. They say false, deceitful things entirely to protect their own status and interests. They're not willing to be honest people and tell the truth for fear of losing those things. All of corrupt humanity is like that. No matter how learned they are, how high or low their status, whether they're an official or common citizen, whether they're a celebrity or an average person, they all constantly lie and cheat, and no one is trustworthy. If these corrupt dispositions aren't resolved, they'll continue to lie and cheat all the time, and be full of a deceitful disposition. Can they achieve true submission to God like this? Can they gain God's approval? Absolutely not.

Do you feel like being an honest person is hard to do? Have you ever tried to put it into practice? In what respects have you practiced and experienced being an honest person? What principles were your practices based on? What level of experience do you have of this at the moment? Have you reached the point where you are basically an honest person? If you have achieved this, that's wonderful! We should be able to see from God's words that, in order to save and transform us, He does not merely do some preparatory work or work to show what the future may hold, after which He is done. Nor does He alter people's external behavior. Rather, He wants to change every single person, starting from the innermost depths of their hearts, from their dispositions and from their very essences, and transform them at the source. Given that this is how God works, how should we then act toward ourselves? We should take responsibility for what we seek, for our dispositional change, and for the duties that we should do. We should be serious in everything we do, without letting things slide, and be able to hold everything up for dissection. Every time you finish doing something, even if you believe it was done correctly, it may not necessarily be in line with the truth. It must also be analyzed, and must be compared, verified, and discerned according to God's words. This way, whether it was correct or mistaken will become clear. Moreover, the things you think you did wrong must also be analyzed. This requires the brothers and sisters to spend more time together fellowshiping, seeking, and helping each other out. The more you fellowship, the brighter your heart will be, and the more you will understand the truth principles. This is God's blessing. If none of you open your heart, and you all cover up yourselves, hoping to leave a good impression in the minds of others and wanting them to think highly of you and not scoff at you, then you will not experience true growth. If you always disguise yourself and never open up in fellowship, you won't receive the enlightenment of the Holy Spirit, and you won't be able to understand the truth. What will be the result then? You will live in darkness forever, and you will not be saved. If you want to gain the truth and change your disposition, you must pay a price to gain the truth and practice the truth, and you must open your heart and fellowship with others. This is beneficial to both your life entry and your dispositional change. Discussing your experience and understanding in gatherings benefits you and others. How will it turn out if none of you talk about your self-knowledge, or your experiences and understanding; if none of you dissect yourselves or open up; if you all excel at speaking words and doctrines, with none of you sharing your understanding of yourselves, and with none of you having the courage to bring to light what little self-knowledge you possess? You'll all get together and exchange some polite words and pleasantries, you'll flatter and boast to each other, and say disingenuous things. "Oh, you've been pretty good lately. You've made some changes!"

"You've shown such great faith recently!" "You're so passionate!" "You've expended so much more than I have." "Your contributions are greater than mine!" This is the kind of situation that develops. Everyone flatters and boasts to each other, and nobody is willing to bring out their true self for dissection, for everyone to discern and understand. Can there be a true church life in this kind of environment? No, there cannot be. Some people say: "I've lived church life for quite a few years. I've always been content and I've enjoyed it. In gatherings, the brothers and sisters all like praying and singing hymns to praise God. Everyone is moved to tears by the prayers and hymns. Sometimes things get emotionally charged and we're all hot and sweaty. The brothers and sisters sing and dance; it's such a rich, colorful church life, and it's so enjoyable. It really embodies the work of the Holy Spirit! After that, we eat and drink God's words, and we feel that God's words speak straight to our hearts. Everybody's really enthusiastic every time we fellowship." A few years of this kind of church life is really enjoyable for everyone, but what comes of it? Hardly anyone actually enters into the truth reality, and hardly anyone can describe their experiences to bear witness to God. They have lots of energy for reading God's words, singing and dancing, but when it comes time to fellowship the truth, some people become disinterested. No one talks about their experience of becoming an honest person; no one dissects themselves, and no one lays bare their own corrupt disposition for others to know and to discern, for their benefit and edification. No one fellowships on their actual experiential testimony to glorify God. Several years of church life are frittered away just like that, singing and dancing, feeling happy, full of enjoyment. You tell Me: Where does this happiness and enjoyment come from? I'd say that it's not what God wants to see or what satisfies Him, because what He wants to see is a change in people's life dispositions, and people living out the truth reality. God wants to see this reality. He doesn't want you to clutch your hymnals, singing and dancing in praise of Him when you're in gatherings or feeling passionate—that's not what He wants to see. On the contrary, God is sad, pained, and anxious when He sees this, because He has spoken thousands upon thousands of words, but not one single person has truly carried and lived them out. This is just what worries God. You often feel quite complacent and self-satisfied with a little peace and happiness from your church life. You praise God and gain some enjoyment, a wisp of comfort or some spiritual fulfillment, and then believe that you've practiced your faith well. You cling to these illusions, treating them as capital, as the biggest takeaway from your faith in God, and accept them in place of a change in your life disposition and an entry onto the path of salvation. That way, you think that there's no need to pursue the truth or pursue being an honest person. There's no need to reflect on yourself or dissect your problems, or practice and experience God's words. This is now getting into dangerous territory. If people continue this way; if, when God's work draws to a close, they still haven't become honest people or managed to do their duty well enough; if they haven't achieved true submission to God and can still be misled and controlled by antichrists; if they haven't escaped Satan's influence; if they haven't met these requirements given to them by God, then they are not people whom God will save. That is why God is concerned.

People are always really enthusiastic when they're new to faith. When they hear God fellowship the truth, especially, they think: "Now I understand the truth. I've found the true way. I'm really happy!" Every day feels as joyful as celebrating the New Year or a wedding; every day they are looking forward to someone hosting a gathering or fellowshiping. But after a few years, some people lose their fervor for church life and lose their fervor for believing in God, too. Why is that? It's because they only have a superficial, theoretical understanding of God's words and the truth. They haven't truly entered into God's words, or personally experienced their reality. Just as God says, many people look at the sumptuous food at the banquet, but most of them are just coming to take a look. They do not pick up the delicious food provided by God and eat it, tasting it and using it to replenish their bodies. This is what God detests, and what worries Him. Isn't this the kind of state you're currently in? (Yes.) I fellowship with all of you frequently to help you out. What most concerns Me is that, after listening to these sermons and having your spiritual needs met, you'll do nothing to put them into practice and will think nothing more of them. In which case, all I've said would have been in vain. No matter what sort of caliber someone has, you'll be able to tell whether or not they are someone who loves the truth after two or three years of faith. If they are someone who loves the truth, then sooner or later they will pursue it; if they are not someone who loves the truth, they won't hold up for long, and will be exposed and cast out. Are you actually lovers of the truth? Are you willing to become honest people? Will you be able to change in the future? How much of this will you personally carry out after this fellowship? How much of this will produce results in you, really? All of that is unknown; it will be revealed in the end. It has nothing to do with how fervent someone is or how much suffering they can take when they are new to the faith. The key is whether or not they love the truth, and whether or not they can accept the truth. Only those who love the truth will mull it over after hearing a sermon. Only they will ponder how to put God's words into practice, how to experience them, how to apply them in their daily lives, and how to live out the truth reality in God's words to become someone who truly submits to God. That is why those who love the truth will ultimately gain the truth. Those who don't love the truth might accept the true way; they might gather and listen to sermons every day and learn some doctrine, but the moment they encounter hardship or trials, they become negative and weak, and may even renounce their faith. As believers, whether or not you can enter into the truth reality depends on your attitude toward the truth and what the goal of your pursuit is: whether or not it really is to gain the truth as your life. Some people equip themselves with the truth in order to help others, to serve God, or to lead the church well. That's not bad, and it means that those people shoulder something of a burden. But if they don't focus on their own life entry or on practicing the truth, and if they don't seek the truth to resolve problems, then can they enter into the truth reality? That would be impossible. How can they help others if they don't possess the truth reality? How can they serve God? Can they do church work well? That, too, would be impossible. It doesn't matter how many sermons you have listened to or what path you have chosen. I will share the correct perspective with you: No matter what duty you do, whether you are a leader or a regular follower, you must primarily put your effort into God's words. You must read them and think them over earnestly. You must first gain an understanding of all the truths that you need to know and practice; hold yourself up to them and carry them out for yourself. You have not gained a truth until you have first understood it and entered into reality. If you always explain the doctrine that you understand to others, but you are unable to put them into practice or experience them, then this is a mistake—this is foolishness and ignorance. You should practice and experience God's words as the truth, gradually coming to understand a great deal of truths. Then you will start to get better and better results in your duty, and have many experiential testimonies to share. This way, God's words will become your life. You will be sure to do your duty well, and you will also be able to complete the commission God has given to you. If you always want to hold others up to these words, apply them to others, or use them as capital in your work, then you'll be in trouble. In doing this, you are taking exactly the same path as Paul. Since this is your perspective, you are surely treating these words as doctrine, as theory, and you want to use these theories to deliver speeches and get work done. This is very dangerous—this is what false leaders and antichrists do. If you view your own state according to God's words, first reflecting on and gaining an understanding of yourself, and then putting the truth into practice, you will reap the rewards and enter into the truth reality. Only then will you be qualified and have the stature to do your duty well. If you don't have practical experience of God's work and His words; if you have no life entry at all and can only recite words and doctrines, then even if you do the work, you will be doing it blindly, achieving nothing concrete. Ultimately you will become a false leader and an antichrist, and you will be cast out. If you understand an aspect of the truth, you should first hold yourself up against it for comparison and implement it in your life, so that it becomes your reality. Then you will certainly gain something and be changed. If you feel that God's words are good, that they are the truth and have reality, but you do not contemplate or try to understand the truth in your heart, nor practice and experience it in your practical life, instead just writing it down in a notebook and stopping there, then you will never understand or gain the truth. When you read God's words or hear sermons and fellowship, you must ponder and hold yourself up against them, linking them with your own states, and using them to resolve your own problems. Only by implementing the words in this way can you genuinely gain something from them. Is this what you practice after you have heard a sermon? If it is not, then God is not in your lives, nor are His words, and you have no reality in your belief in Him. You are living outside of God's words, like unbelievers. Anyone who believes in God, but cannot apply His words in real life in order to practice and experience them does not really believe in God—they are a nonbeliever. Those who cannot practice the truth are not people who obey God, they are people who rebel against Him and resist Him. Without bringing God's words into one's real life, they have no way to experience God's work. And if one does not experience God's work or the judgment and chastisement of His words in their real life, they have no way to gain the truth. Do you understand this? If you can comprehend these words, then that would be best—but no matter how you comprehend them, no matter how much you understand, the most crucial thing is that you should bring God's words and the truths that you do understand into your real life, and practice them there. This is the only way for you to grow in stature and for your disposition to change.

When God expresses truths or puts forward His requirements of people, He will always point out principles and paths of practice for them. Take being an honest person, for example, like we were just talking about: God has given people a path, telling them how to be honest people and how to practice the principles of being honest people, in order for them to get on the right track. God said, "If you are highly averse to laying bare your secrets—your difficulties—before others to seek the way of the light, then I say that you are someone who will not attain salvation easily, and who will not easily emerge from the darkness." The implication here is that He requires us to take what we think to be secret or private and reveal it, to present it for dissection. This is what you haven't thought of: You didn't understand or know that God said this to have you practice this way. Sometimes you act with cunning, deceptive intent, and so your actions and intents should be changed. Perhaps no one perceives the cunning or deceptive nature in your words—but don't pat yourself on the back. You should come before God and examine yourself—you can fool people, but you can't fool God. You need to pray, lay bare and dissect your intents and methods, reflect on whether these intents of yours would be pleasing to God, or whether they would be disgusting to Him, whether you can lay them bare, whether they are hard to talk about, and whether they accord with the truth. With this kind of dissection and analysis you will discover that, in fact, this matter is not in line with the truth; this kind of behavior is hard to bring out into the light, and it disgusts God. Then, you change this behavior. How does this fellowship of Mine make you feel? Some of you probably feel worried. You think: "Believing in God is really complicated. It's been hard enough to get this far—now I have to start all over?" The reality is, now God has come, and He has begun leading mankind to enter into the truth reality. This is the beginning as a believer, and as a person. If you would make a good start, you must build a solid foundation in your faith, first learning the truths of visions and the significance of following God, and then focusing on practicing the truth and doing your duty well. This way, you can enter into the truth reality. If you only focus on speaking words and doctrines and establish a foundation based on those things, that becomes a problem. It's like building the foundation of a house on sand: No matter how tall you build it, it will always be in danger of collapsing, and it will not last. However, there is one commendable thing about all of you at this point, which is that you can understand what I fellowship with you about and are willing to listen to it. This is good. Pursuing the truth and entering into reality is what matters most, and the rest is secondary. As long as you know this, it won't be hard to get onto the right track in your faith. To walk the path of pursuing the truth, you must first know yourself—you must be clear about what corrupt dispositions you possess and what your shortcomings are. Then you will understand the importance of equipping yourself with the truth, and you will be able to quickly seek the truth to resolve problems. Time waits for no man! Once you have addressed your problems with life entry and you possess the truth reality, you will have a greater sense of inner peace. No matter how great the disasters are, you will not feel afraid. If you fritter away these last few years without pursuing the truth, and when things come up, you still tend to go into a daze, and you remain in a passive state of waiting, nor can you use the truth to resolve your problems, but still live by worldly philosophies and corrupt dispositions, then how piteous that would be! If, when the day comes on which the disasters are great, you don't possess a sliver of the truth reality, you will regret not having pursued the truth or done your duty well, not having gained any of the truth at all. You will be living in a constant state of anxiety. Right now, the Holy Spirit's work waits for no man. In their first few years of faith, He gives people some grace, some mercy; He gives them help and sustenance. If people never change and never enter into reality, but are content with the words and doctrines they know, then they are in danger. They have already missed out on the Holy Spirit's work, and have missed out on the last chance at God's salvation and perfection of mankind. They can only fall into disasters, weeping and gnashing their teeth.

When you first start building a foundation in your faith, you should firmly set foot on the path of pursuing the truth. You should be on the starting line for entering into the truth reality, not the starting line of reciting words and doctrines. You should be focused on entering into the truth reality, seeking and practicing the truth in all things, being able to put the truth into practice in all things and use it as a comparison for everything. You should ponder how to practice the truth, what the principles of practice are, and what sort of practice of the truth will meet God's requirements and satisfy God. However, people are too lacking in stature. They are always asking about things that are unrelated to practicing the truth, that are unrelated to self-knowledge or being an honest person. Isn't that pathetic? Doesn't that show small stature? Some people accepted this step of God's work as soon as He began it, and have been believers right up to the present day. But they still don't understand what the truth reality is, or what practicing the truth is. Some say, "I've given up my family and career for my faith and been through quite a bit. How could You say I don't have any truth reality? I've left my family behind—is that not reality? I've given up my marriage—is that not reality? Isn't all of that an expression of putting the truth into practice?" On the outside, you have given up the secular world, and given up your family to believe in God. But does that mean you have entered into the truth reality? Does it mean you are an honest person, one who submits to God? Does it mean that your disposition has changed, or that you are someone who possesses the truth, or humanity? It certainly does not. These outward actions of yours may seem nice to other people—but they don't mean that you are practicing the truth or submitting to God, and they certainly don't mean that you are entering into the truth reality. People's sacrifices and expenditures are too adulterated, and people are all controlled by the intent to receive blessings, and they have not been purified through trials and refinement. That's why so many are still perfunctory in their duties and don't get any actual results; they even disrupt, disturb, undermine, and cause all sorts of trouble to the church's work. They give no thought to repentance and keep spreading negativity, telling lies, and twisting the facts to argue their own case, even as the church clears them out. Some people believe for a decade or two, but still run amok and do all sorts of evil. They are then cleared out or expelled by the church. The fact that they can do so many terrible things is adequate proof that they have terrible character, that they are too crooked and cunning, and they are not at all guileless, obedient, or submissive. This is because they have never cared much for practicing the truth and being an honest person. They see faith in God as a matter of: "As long as I give up my family, expend myself for God, suffer, and pay a price, God should commemorate my deeds, and I should receive His salvation." This is just whimsy and wishful thinking. If you want to receive salvation and truly come before God, first you must come to God in seeking: "Oh God, what should I put into practice? What is Your standard for saving people? What type of people do You save?" This is what we should seek and know above all. Establish your foundation upon the truth, put effort into the truth and into reality in everything, and then you will be a person who possesses a foundation, who possesses life. If you establish your foundation upon words and doctrines, never putting any truth into practice or putting effort into any truth, then you will be someone who never possesses life. When we practice being an honest person, we have the life, reality, and essence of an honest person. We then have the practice and the behavior of an honest person, and at the least, that honest side of us will bring God joy, and He will approve of it. However, we still often display lies, trickery, and deceitfulness, which need to be cleansed. That's why we need to continue seeking and not get stuck in a rut. God is waiting for us, giving us a chance. If you never make plans to become an honest person, if you never seek how to speak honestly and from the heart, how to do things without the adulteration of artifice or deception, how to behave like an honest person, then there's no way you will live with an honest human likeness or enter into the truth reality of being an honest person. If you have entered into the reality of a certain aspect of the truth, then you have gained that aspect of the truth; if you do not possess that reality, then you don't possess that life or stature. In the face of trials and temptation, or when you receive a commission, if you don't have any reality at all, you will easily stumble and make mistakes; you will be prone to offending and disobeying God. You won't be able to help yourself. Many people run amok in their duties, refusing to take advice and remaining incorrigible, seriously disrupting and disturbing the church's work and seriously harming the interests of God's house. These people are cleared out or expelled in the end—this is the inevitable outcome. But if you are currently practicing the truth to be an honest person, your experiential testimony as an honest person is approved by God. No one can take that away from you, and no one can strip you of this reality, of this life. Some people ask, "I've already been an honest person for a long time. Can I turn back into a cunning person?" If you have cast off your corrupt disposition; if you possess the truth reality of being an honest person; if you're living out a human likeness and despise artifice, deceitfulness, and the world of unbelievers in your heart, then you cannot return to being under Satan's power. This is because you are able to live according to God's words; you are already living in the light. Changing from a cunning person into an honest one is not easy. Turning back into a cunning person from being an honest person that God truly delights in would be impossible, even more difficult. Some people say: "I have several years of experience of being an honest person. I tell the truth most of the time and I'm fairly honest. But here and there I say something that is untrue, indirect, or cunning." This is a much easier problem to fix. As long as you focus on seeking the truth and striving for the truth, there's no need to worry about being unable to change in the future. You'll certainly continue to improve. Just like a seedling planted in the earth, if you water it on time and give it daily sunlight, you don't need to worry about whether it will bear fruit later on, and there will certainly be a harvest in the fall. What you should be most concerned about now is this: Have you had any entry into being an honest person? Are you telling fewer and fewer lies? Can you say that you are, on the whole, an honest person now? These are the key questions. If someone says: "I know that I'm a deceitful person, but I've never practiced being honest," then you don't have any of the reality of being an honest person. You need to work hard, to take out for dissection every little facet of your life, all your various behaviors, all the ways you practice deceitfulness, and your treatment of others. Before you dissect these things, you may feel very pleased with yourself, very self-satisfied for having done what you've done. But once you dissect them in comparison with God's words, you will be shocked, "I didn't realize I'm so vile, so malicious and insidious!" You will discover your true self, and truly recognize your difficulties, your flaws, and your deceitfulness. If you don't do any dissection, and forever think of yourself as an honest person, someone free of trickery, yet you still call yourself a deceitful person, then you will never change. If you don't dig up those despicable, evil intents in your heart, then how will you see your ugliness and corruption? If you don't reflect on and dissect your corrupt states, will you see the truth of how deeply corrupted you are? Without any understanding of your corrupt disposition, you won't know how to seek the truth to resolve problems; you won't know how to pursue the truth and enter into reality according to God's requirements. That's the true meaning behind the phrase: "You will never have reality if you don't practice the truth."

Everything that God says is the truth—every last word has the truth reality, and it is all the reality of positive things. People just need to bring God's words into their daily lives to practice and enter into. Every word from God is aimed at what mankind needs, and every word is for people to compare themselves against. They are not meant to be glanced over in passing, nor are they meant to satisfy some spiritual needs of yours, nor for you to pay lip service to or to meet your needs to talk about words and doctrines. Each word of God possesses the reality of the truth. If you don't put God's words into practice, you will have no way of entering into the truth reality—you will always be someone who has no connection to reality. If you practice being an honest person, then you will have the reality of being honest and you will be able to live out a true state of being an honest person, rather than just putting up false pretenses. You'll also be able to understand what sort of person is honest and what sort of person isn't, and why God detests deceitful people. You'll truly understand the significance of being an honest person; you will experience what God feels about when He requires people to be honest, and why He requires that of people. When you find that you are full of cunning, you'll hate your deceitfulness and crookedness. You will hate how shamelessly you lived by your deceitful, crooked disposition. You will thus be eager to change. This way, you will feel more and more that being an honest person is the only way to live out a normal humanity and to live with meaning. You will feel that God requiring people to be honest is incredibly meaningful. You will feel that only by doing this can you meet God's will, that only honest people will gain salvation, and that what God said is entirely accurate! You tell Me: Is God's requirement for people to be honest meaningful? (Yes, it is.) Then, starting from now, you should dissect the deceitful and crooked parts of yourselves. Once you've dissected them, you will discover that behind everything deceitful there is an intent, a certain goal, and a human ugliness. You'll discover that this deceit reveals people's foolishness, selfishness, and despicableness. When you discover that, you will see your true face, and when you see your true face, you will hate yourself. When you start to hate yourself, when you really know what sort of thing you are, will you keep flaunting yourself then? Will you keep boasting at every turn? Will you always be wanting compliments and praise from others? Will you still say that God's demands are too high, that there's no need? You won't act that way, and you won't say such things. You will agree with what God says, and give an "Amen." You will be convinced with your heart and mind, and with your eyes. When this happens, it means that you have begun practicing God's words, you've entered into reality, and you've started to see results. The more you put God's words into practice, the more you will feel how accurate and how necessary they are. Let's say you don't put them into practice. Instead you always just blather on, "Oh, I'm dishonest, I'm deceitful," and yet when faced with a situation, you still act deceitfully, all the while thinking that this doesn't count as deceitfulness, considering yourself as still honest and just letting the affair pass like that. And the next time something comes up, you again resort to tricks and engage in crookedness and deceitfulness, lying as soon as you open your mouth. Afterward, you wonder, "Was I crooked and deceitful again? Was I lying again? I don't think that counts," and you pray before God, "God, You see how I always resort to schemes, and am always crooked and deceitful. Please forgive me. I won't be that way next time; if I am, please discipline me," just touching upon these matters lightly, glossing over them. What kind of person is this? This is someone who doesn't love the truth and isn't willing to put it into practice. You may have paid a bit of a price or spent some time performing your duty, serving God, or listening to sermons. You may also have sacrificed some working hours and made a bit less money. But in fact, you haven't remotely put the truth into practice, and you haven't taken the matter of practicing the truth seriously. You have been superficial and careless, never thinking much of it. If you only go through the motions when practicing the truth, that proves your attitude toward the truth isn't one of love. You are someone who isn't willing to put the truth into practice; you are distant from and sick of the truth. Your faith is undertaken in order to gain blessings, and the only reason you haven't walked away from God is because you're afraid of being punished. So you muddle through in your faith, seeking to preach the words and doctrines to make yourself look good, learning some spiritual vocabulary and some popular hymns, learning some catchphrases for fellowshiping on the truth and buzzwords related to your faith. You adorn yourself like a spiritual person, thinking that you're someone who conforms to God's will and is worthy of being used by Him. You become complacent and forget yourself. You get taken in and fooled by this surface-level image, these hypocritical behaviors. You are fooled by these until you die, and though you think that you will ascend into heaven, in fact, you will descend into hell. What meaning is there in that kind of faith? There is nothing real in this so-called "faith" of yours. At most, you have acknowledged that there is a God, but you have not entered any bit of the truth reality. So, in the end, your outcome will be the same as unbelievers—you'll go to hell, with no good outcome. God said, "What I ask for is not bright, lush flowers, but bounteous fruit." No matter how many flowers you have or how pretty they are, God doesn't want them. Which is to say that, no matter how nicely you speak or how much you appear to expend, contribute, or sacrifice, this is not what God takes joy in. God only looks at how much truth you have actually understood and put into practice, how much of the truth reality in God's words you have lived out, whether there has been true change in your life disposition, how much genuine experiential testimony you have, how many good deeds you have prepared, how much you have done to satisfy God's will, and whether you've performed your duty up to standard. These are the things that God looks at. When people don't understand God and don't know His will, they always misinterpret it and present Him with some superficial things as a way to settle accounts with Him. They say, "God, I've been a believer for many years. I've traveled all over the place, preached the gospel and converted so many people. I can recite several passages of Your words and sing quite a few hymns. When something big or something difficult comes up, I always fast and pray, and I read Your words all the time. How could I not be conforming to Your will?" Then God says to them: "Are you an honest person now? Has your deceitfulness

changed? Have you ever paid any price to become an honest person? Have you ever brought before Me all the deceitful things you've done, all the ways you've shown deceit, and brought them to light? Are you being less dishonest with Me? Do you recognize when you make false oaths or empty promises to Me, or say nice things to fool me? Have you let go of these things?" When you think on that and find you haven't let go of these things at all, you will be left dumbfounded. You will be alerted to the fact that you have no way to settle accounts before God. I expose your corrupt state to allow you to know yourselves; I talk this much so that you can put the truth into practice and enter into reality. No words, no fellowship or truths are for people to recite far and wide; they are to be put into practice. Why are you always being told to accept the truth and put it into practice? It is because only the truth can cleanse your corruption and change your outlook on life, and your values, and only the truth can become someone's life. When you accept the truth, you must also put it into practice for it to become your life. If you believe that you understand the truth but haven't practiced it, and it hasn't become your life, then you cannot possibly change. Since you haven't accepted the truth, there's no way for your corrupt disposition to be cleansed. If you cannot practice the truth, you will not change. Finally, if the truth has not taken root in your heart and it has not become your life, then when your time as a believer is coming to a close, your fate and outcome will be decided. In light of this fellowship, are all of you feeling some urgency to put the truth into practice? Don't wait for three years, five years, or beyond, and only then start to practice it. There's no such thing as being too early or too late when it comes to practicing the truth; if you practice it soon, you will change soon, and if you practice it later, you will change later. If you miss your chance at the Holy Spirit's work and God's perfection of mankind, you will be in danger when the great disasters come. Then, when God's work to save mankind concludes, there won't be any chances left at all. If, after you've lost your chance, you say: "I didn't put any effort in then, but I'll start to practice this now," it will be too late, and it'll be unlikely that you will be perfected by God. That's because the Holy Spirit won't be working anymore, and your understanding of all things, of all truths, will be very shallow. There are all sorts of situations arising now, and through fellowshiping on the truth, your faith is growing and you have more drive to follow God. If there weren't any situations for a while, you would certainly become negative and undisciplined, drifting further and further from God. You would become just like those in the religious world, just observing the formats of gatherings and religious ceremonies, utterly without the truth reality. Then what good would it do you to beat your chest and wail?

Tell Me, is it exhausting to live alongside deceitful people? (It is.) Are they not exhausted, too? In fact, they are also tired, but they do not feel their tiredness. This is because deceitful people and honest people are different: Honest people are simpler. Their thoughts are not so complicated, and they say what they think. Deceitful people, on the other hand, always have to speak in a roundabout way. They say nothing directly—instead, they are always playing deceitful games and covering up their lies.

They are always exercising their minds, always thinking, afraid that if they are at all negligent, they will let something slip. To what extent do some people play deceitful games? No matter who they are interacting with, they are always trying to see who is more calculating, who is smarter, who is on top, and ultimately their competitiveness becomes neurosis. They cannot sleep at night, yet they do not feel pain, and even think this is normal. Have they not then become living demons? When God saves people, He allows them to cast off Satan's influence and their corrupt dispositions, to become honest people, and live by His words. To live as an honest person is freeing and liberating, and much less painful. It is the happiest of lives. Honest people are simpler. They say what is in their hearts, and they say what they are thinking. In their words and actions, they follow their conscience and reason. They are willing to strive for the truth, and when they understand it, they put it into practice. When they cannot see through a matter, they are willing to seek the truth, and then they do whatever accords with it. They seek God's will everywhere and in everything, and then follow it in their actions. There may be a few areas in which they are foolish and must equip themselves with the truth principles, and this requires them to constantly grow. Experiencing in this way means that they can become honest, wise people and conform entirely to God's will. But deceitful people are not like this. They live by satanic dispositions, demonstrating their corruption, yet fearing that others may find something to use against them in their doing so. So, they use crooked and deceitful tricks in response. They are afraid of a time when everything will be revealed, so they use every means they can to fabricate lies and cover them up, and when a gap appears, they tell more lies to fill it. Always lying and covering up their lies is that not an exhausting way to live? They are always racking their brains to think up lies and cover up for them. It is just too taxing. That is why deceitful people, who spend their days devising lies and covering them up, have such exhausting and painful lives! It is different, however, with honest people. As an honest person, one does not have so much to consider when one speaks and acts. In most cases, an honest person can just speak truthfully. It is only when a specific matter touches on their interests that they work their minds a bit harder—they may lie a little to protect their interests, to maintain their vanity and pride. These kinds of lies are limited, so speaking and acting are not so exhausting for honest people. The intents of deceitful people are much more complicated than those of honest people. Their considerations are too multifaceted: They must consider their prestige, their reputation, profit, and status; and they must protect their interests—all this, without letting others see any flaws or giving the game away, so they must rack their brains to come up with lies. Moreover, deceitful people have great, excessive desires and many demands. They have to devise ways to achieve their goals, so they must continue to lie and cheat, and as they tell more lies, they need to cover up more lies. That is why the life of a deceitful person is so much more exhausting and painful than that of an honest person. Some people are relatively honest. If they can pursue the truth, reflect on themselves regardless of what lies they have told, recognize the trickery they have engaged in, whatever it was, viewing it in light of God's words to dissect it and understand it, and going on to change it, then they will be able to rid themselves of much of their lying and trickery in no more than a few years. They will then have become a person who is basically honest. Living like this not only makes them free from much pain and exhaustion, it also brings them peace and happiness. In many matters, they will be free of the constraints of prestige, profit, status, of vanity and pride, and will naturally live a free and liberated life. Deceitful people, however, always have ulterior motives behind their speech and actions. They fabricate all manner of lies to beguile and trick others, and as soon as they are exposed, they think of ways to cover up their lies. Tormented in this way and that, they, too, feel that their lives are exhausting. It is exhausting enough for them to tell so many lies in every situation that they encounter, and having to then cover up those lies is even more exhausting. Everything they say is intended to accomplish a goal, so they expend a lot of mental energy on every word they speak. And when they have finished talking, they fear you have seen through them, so they must also rack their brains to hide their lies, doggedly explaining things to you, trying to convince you that they are not lying or deceiving you, that they are a good person. Deceitful people are apt to do these things. If two deceitful people are together, there is bound to be intrigue, conflict, and scheming. The wrangling will never end, resulting in a deeper and deeper hatred, and they will become archenemies. If you are an honest person with a deceitful person, these behaviors will certainly sicken you. If they just act that way here and there, you'll say that everyone has a corrupt disposition and that such things are hard to avoid. But if they act that way all the time, you'll be particularly nauseated and disgusted by these methods; you'll be disgusted by that side of them and the intentions they have. When you become so disgusted, you will be able to despise and reject them. This is a very normal thing. They cannot be interacted with unless they repent and show some change.

What do you say—isn't life exhausting for deceitful people? They spend all their time telling lies, then telling more lies to cover them up, and engaging in trickery. They bring this exhaustion upon themselves. They know that living like this is exhausting—so why would they still want to be deceitful, and not wish to be honest? Have you ever thought about this question? This is a consequence of people being fooled by their satanic natures; it stops them from ridding themselves of this kind of life, this kind of disposition. People are willing to accept being fooled like this and to live in this; they do not want to practice the truth and walk the path of light. You think that living like this is exhausting and that acting this way is unnecessary—but deceitful people think it absolutely necessary. They think that to not do so would cause them humiliation, that it would harm their image, their reputation, and their interests, too, and that they would lose too much. They treasure these things, they treasure their own image, their own reputation and status. This is the true face of people who do not love the truth. In short, when people are unwilling to be honest or practice the truth, it is because they do not love the truth. In their hearts, they treasure things like reputation and status, they like to follow worldly trends, and live under the power of Satan. This is a problem of their nature. There are people, now, who have believed in God for years, who have heard many sermons, and know what believing in God is all about. But they still do not practice the truth, and have not changed one bit—why is this? It's because they do not love the truth. Even if they do understand a little of the truth, they are still not able to practice it. For such people, no matter how many years they believe in God, it will be for naught. Can people who do not love the truth be saved? It is absolutely impossible. Not loving the truth is a problem with one's heart, with one's nature. It cannot be resolved. Whether or not one can be saved in their faith mainly depends on whether or not they love the truth. Only those who love the truth can accept the truth; only they can undergo hardship and pay a price for the sake of the truth, and only they can pray to God and rely on Him. Only they can seek the truth and reflect and know themselves through their experiences, have the courage to forsake the flesh, and achieve the practice of the truth and submission to God. Only those who love the truth can pursue it in this way, walk the path of salvation, and gain God's approval. There is no path other than this one. It is very hard for those who do not love the truth to accept it. This is because, by their natures, they are sick of the truth and hate it. If they wanted to stop resisting God or to not do evil, it would be very difficult for them to do so, because they are of Satan and they have already become devils and enemies of God. God saves mankind, He does not save devils or Satan. Some people ask questions like: "I really do understand the truth. I just can't put it into practice. What should I do?" This is someone who does not love the truth. If someone does not love the truth, then they cannot put it into practice even if they understand it, because at heart, they are unwilling to do so and they do not like the truth. Such a person is beyond salvation. Some people say: "It seems to me that you lose out on a lot by being an honest person, so I don't want to be one. Deceitful people never lose out—they even profit from taking advantage of others. So, I would rather be a deceitful person. I'm not willing to let others know my private business, to let them grasp me or understand me. My fate should be in my own hands." By all means, then—try that and see. See what sort of outcome you wind up with; see who goes to hell and who gets punished in the end.

Are you willing to be honest? What do you plan to do after hearing these communions? What will you start with first? (I'll start by not lying.) This is the right way to practice, but not lying isn't easy. There are often intents behind people's lies, but some lies don't have any intent behind them, nor are they deliberately planned. Instead, they just come out naturally. Such lies are easy to resolve; it is lies with intents behind them that are difficult to resolve. This is because these intents come from one's nature and represent Satan's trickery, and they are intents that people intentionally choose. If someone does not love the truth, they will be unable to forsake the flesh—so they should pray to God and rely on Him, and seek the truth to resolve the issue. But lying cannot completely be resolved all at once. There will be the occasional relapse, even multiple relapses. This is a normal situation, and as long as you resolve each and every lie you tell, and keep up with this, then the day will come when you will have resolved them all. The resolution of lying is a protracted war: When one lie pours out, reflect on yourself, and then pray to God. When another one comes out, reflect on yourself and pray to God again. The more you pray to God, the more you will hate your corrupt disposition, and the more you will long to practice the truth and live it out. Thus, you will have the strength to abandon lies. After a time of such experience and practice, you will be able to see that your lies have grown much fewer, that you are living with much greater ease, and that you need not lie or cover up your lies anymore. Though you may not speak much day to day, every sentence will come from the heart and be true, with very few lies. How will it feel to live like that? Will it not be freeing and liberating? Your corrupt disposition will not govern you and you will not be bound by it, and you will at least begin to see the results of being an honest person. Of course, when you come across special circumstances, you may sometimes let a small lie slip. There may be times when you encounter danger or trouble of some sort, or want to maintain your safety, at which times lying cannot be helped. Still, you must reflect on it, understand it and resolve the problem. You should pray to God and say: "There are still lies and trickery in me. May God save me from my corrupt disposition once and for all." When one is intentionally exercising wisdom, it does not count as a revelation of corruption. This is what one must experience to be an honest person. In this way, your lies will become ever fewer. Today you tell ten lies, tomorrow you might tell nine, the day after that you'll say eight. Later, you'll only say two or three. You'll tell the truth more and more, and your practice of being an honest person will come ever closer to God's will, His requirements, and His standards—and how good that will be! To practice being honest, you must have a path, and you must have an aim. First, resolve the problem of telling lies. You must know the essence behind your telling of these lies. You must also dissect what intents and motives drive you to speak these lies, why you are possessed of such intents, and what their essence is. When you have clarified all these issues, you will have thoroughly seen through the problem of lying, and when something befalls you, you will have principles to practice. If you carry on with such practice and experience, then you will surely see results. One day you'll say: "It's easy being honest. Being deceitful is so tiring! I don't want to be a deceitful person anymore, always having to think about what lies to tell and how to cover up my lies. It's like being a person with a mental illness, speaking in contradictions—someone who doesn't deserve to be called 'human'! That sort of life is so tiring, and I don't want to live like that anymore!" At this time, you'll have a hope of being truly honest, and it will prove that you have begun to make progress toward being an honest person. This is a breakthrough. Of course, there may be some of you who, when you begin to practice, will be mortified after speaking honest words and laying yourselves bare. Your face will go red, you will feel ashamed, and you will fear the laughter of others. What should you do, then? Still, you must pray to God and ask that He give you strength. You say: "Oh God, I want to be an honest person, but I'm afraid that people will laugh at me when I speak the truth. I ask that You rescue me from the bondage of my satanic disposition; let me live by Your words, and be freed and liberated." When you pray like this, there will be ever more brightness within your heart, and you will say to yourself: "It's good to put this into practice. Today, I have practiced the truth. Finally, I've been an honest person for once." As you pray like this, God will enlighten you. He will work in your heart, and He will move you, allowing you to appreciate how it feels to be an honest person. This is how the truth must be put into practice. At the very start you will have no path, but through seeking the truth you will find a path. When people begin seeking the truth, they don't necessarily have faith. Not having a path is hard for people, but once they understand the truth and have a path of practice, their hearts find enjoyment in it. If they are able to practice the truth and act according to principles, their hearts will find comfort, and they will gain freedom and liberation. If you have some true knowledge of God, you'll be able to see all things in this world clearly; your heart will be illuminated, and you will have a path. Then you will gain complete liberation and freedom. At this time, you will understand what it means to put the truth into practice, to satisfy God, and to be a real person—and in this, you will be on the right track in your belief in God.

The Path of Practice Toward Changing One's Disposition

What is dispositional change? Most people don't quite understand this. Dispositional change is the principal vision for believers in God. Achieving dispositional change is no simple matter. This is because God is not saving newly-created humans who are uncorrupted by Satan, but a group of humans who have been deeply corrupted by it, filled with satanic poisons and satanic dispositions, who are just like Satan, and are resisting and rebelling against God. Transforming a person's corrupt disposition is like treating someone with cancer. That's a complex process, isn't it? It requires surgery, long-term chemotherapy, and re-examination after a period of time. The process is truly complex. So, do not regard dispositional change as a simple matter. It is not the change in behavior or character that people imagine. It is not something that people achieve just because they want to. There are many processes involved in dispositional change processes that are explained very clearly in God's words. Therefore, from the very first day that you come to believe in God, you must understand how God saves people and the effect that He wants to achieve by saving them. If you want to pursue the truth and achieve dispositional change, you must change your erroneous views on belief in God. Believing in God does not require you to be a well-behaved, good person, or a law-abiding person, or to do many good deeds that win the approval of others. In the past, people thought that believing in God and pursuing dispositional change meant being a people-pleaser—to outwardly have some human likeness, some culture, some patience, or else to have some superficial piety and love for other people, to help others and to give alms. In other words, to be what is considered a good person within human notions and imaginings. Everyone has such notions and things in their hearts—this is one aspect of satanic poisons. In the past, no one who believed in God could explain clearly the issue of dispositional change. They were unfamiliar with matters of faith—it wasn't something that they innately understood, or that they could understand after a few years of belief in Christianity. This is because God had not yet performed this aspect of His work, nor had He communicated this aspect of the truth. That's why many people, based on their notions and imaginings, considered faith to be a matter of making some changes to their superficial behavior and practices, and of changing some of their obviously erroneous viewpoints. Some even believed that having faith was about enduring greater hardships, not eating good food, or not wearing fancy clothes. Just like the Catholic nuns in Western countries in the past, who believed that faith in God simply meant enduring more hardship and enjoying fewer good things in their lives—to give money, when they had it, to the poor, or to do more good deeds and to help others. All their lives, they placed emphasis on suffering. They did not eat any good food; they did not wear any nice clothes. When they died, their clothes were worth only a few dollars. Their deeds may have been reported in the news around the world. What does this mean? It means that, in people's minds, only people such as these are good and virtuous; that only these people are considered by the religious world to have done good things and good deeds, that only they have undergone transformation and truly have conviction. And so, you all may be no exceptions, perhaps you also believe that faith in God must mean being a good person—someone who doesn't hit or insult others, who doesn't use bad language or do bad things, someone that, on the outside, people can see is a believer in God and someone who can glorify God. This is a mental state possessed by those who have just started to believe in God. They believe that this is dispositional change, and that this is the kind of person who is pleasing to God. Is this viewpoint correct? Only people who have just started out in their faith have such naive thoughts. Once one has understood some truths, these kinds of thinking will soon disappear. No matter how deeply this viewpoint was rooted in your heart before, you have not yet uncovered its errors and deviations. No matter how many years you have believed in God, these erroneous viewpoints have not been thoroughly resolved. From this, it is clear that few people truly understand what dispositional change is, nor do they understand what it means to truly believe in God, how to be a real person, what kind of person is pleasing to God, or what kind of person God finds acceptable, and what kind of person God wants to gain. If you don't understand these things, it shows that you haven't laid a solid foundation on the true way. Those human notions, imaginings, and subjective thoughts still dominate your thinking and your viewpoints.

Some people say: "I feel that I still haven't changed. I get angry if my child is disobedient, or if my husband does something that I don't like. When I see unbelievers not believing in God, I despise them. Are these not still revelations of corruption and a lack of dispositional change?" Is this statement correct? (No, it isn't.) What's wrong with it? It only focuses on outward behavior. Tell Me, when God speaks of dispositional change, does He mean a change in a person's character or temperament? Absolutely not. Some people believe that dispositional change is just a change in character, and think that being particularly patient and never losing one's temper is dispositional change, but this is a grave mistake. Most people cannot see the issue of dispositional change clearly. They think that they are now closer to God and compatible with Him in some areas, and that although sometimes they cannot submit and lose their temper when encountering things that do not conform to their notions and imaginings, as they are able to reflect on this later, to come to know it, and to pray and repent to God, this means that they have changed. Do you think this sort of change represents a change in disposition? How would you discern this kind of state? What does dispositional change entail? What states and manifestations occur in someone whose disposition has changed? (Dispositional change is accepting the judgment and chastisement of God's words, coming to know our own corrupt essence, changing our views on things, and gradually achieving compatibility with God. It isn't never becoming angry, or being able to restrain ourselves so that we lose our tempers less often. This has nothing to do with dispositional change.) This is a pretty pure understanding. I will first ask you a question, and you can ponder on it: If your disposition has changed, and you understand the truth, then your view on things will be compatible with God. When your view on things is compatible with God, will you still be compatible with corrupt humanity? You won't. You'll be able to hate Satan and devils in your heart, and you will feel opposition, aversion, and loathing toward corrupt humanity who resists and betrays God; you will be able to despise all kinds of negative things, you will be even more unwilling to associate with those who are of the devils, and you will be able to love what God loves and hate what He hates. These are the results achieved by understanding the truth. If you can truly know yourself and see through to your own nature essence, then you'll be able to see through to the common essence of corrupt humanity, and naturally loathe those corrupt humans who resist God. When you see their erroneous and absurd views, you'll be unwilling to associate with them, and will feel disgusted by and reject them. Especially when you see the religious world's mad condemnation of the incarnation and their extreme hatred and loathing of the truth, you'll naturally come to loathe these antichrist forces and totally reject them. If you genuinely understand the truth and know God, you will naturally loathe those who are hostile to God, who disobey, renounce, and betray Him. How could you possibly still be compatible with those people? Therefore, if your life disposition has changed, you will be particularly disgusted by and loathe unbelievers, and all those who resist God. However, because we currently live among corrupt humans, we can only endure, and live based on wisdom. We can't detest, reject, and keep our distance from them, ignore them, or pick guarrels when we see them just because we understand the truth and our disposition has changed. We must not do these things, we must be wise. There is another issue that you still don't quite understand—some of you think that dispositional change and being compatible with God means having no temper at all, and being gentle and kind and smiling pleasantly even toward the devils and Satans, that this is a change in disposition. Is this a correct understanding? (No, it is not.) This is a grave misunderstanding. But why is it incorrect? God wants to save people, and He has spoken many words and done much work, but what sort of person does He want people to become? He wants people to become someone whose thoughts are led by the truth, who takes the truth as their motto in life. He doesn't want them to be devoid of thought, like a numbskull, much less does He want them to have no temper or normal emotions, like a person in a vegetative state. He wants them to become a person who understands the truth and can listen to His words and obey Him, a normal person who loves what He loves and hates what He hates, who likes what He likes, and loathes and rejects that which He loathes. Now you should be clear on what God wants to change in people's dispositions. God has spoken so many words and expressed so many truths; He wants to save people and change every person with His words. Have you ever thought about what likeness God wants the people He makes complete to have? I hear many brothers and sisters say, "I've believed in God for such a long time, but I'm still constrained by many external matters." Some sisters say, "I want to wear the clothes I see unbelievers wearing, and to steal a few more glances at whomever I see dressed up beautifully." Some brothers say, "I see wealthy, well-off families, and I want to make money too. When I see a pretty girl, I want to take another look at her, and I feel like getting angry whenever I see anything that displeases me. These corrupt dispositions of mine still have not changed, and when things befall me, I always let my imagination run wild. How can I control these things? When will I be able to change?" It is these ideas that led Me to say that you do not understand what dispositional change is. You're merely restraining yourselves in terms of your behavior, your outward actions, and your temper and character. It is not possible to achieve dispositional change this way. Which of God's words say that you should not speak freely, or show your emotions when you feel like it, or get angry, and so on? Is this what God's word says? His words simply reveal a great deal about man's corrupt essence, and tell people how to recognize their corrupt dispositions, how to cast them off and achieve dispositional change, emerge from under Satan's influence, and then act based on God's requirements, and become someone who conforms with and satisfies God's will. Once you understand the issue of what dispositional change is, will you still make a fuss over these outward actions? Will you still get entangled in all these external affairs? (No.) If you do not understand what dispositional change is, you will never grasp its essence or achieve it. In particular, for some of those who have just converted from religion, their views on belief in God still have not transformed from the ideas and notions of religion. They still seek to be a spiritual, pious, humble, and patient person, a loving people-pleaser, and a good Samaritan, but this is a grave error! If you seek to be this kind of spiritual person and people-pleaser, then you are someone who doesn't have spiritual understanding. Can a people-pleaser understand the truth? Can they achieve self-knowledge and cast off their corrupt disposition? Definitely not. People who seek to be people-pleasers will never attain the truth, never be able to know themselves and achieve dispositional change, and never obtain God's approval. Therefore, if you want to achieve dispositional change, you must first understand what it is, and what true belief in and submission to God are. Only then will you be able to embark on the path of pursuing the truth.

Dispositional change lies not in changes in rituals or regulations, and must less in changes to one's external appearance or outward behavior, character, or temper. It is not about transforming a slow temperament into a quick temperament, or vice-versa, nor is it about transforming an introvert into an extrovert, or someone talkative into someone taciturn. This is not the way, this is very far removed from God's requirements, and so far off! When someone first begins to believe in God, because they don't understand the truth, they always do things according to their notions and imaginings. This results in them straying from the right path, and wasting several years of their time without gaining anything real. At that time, they don't know that they should walk the path of pursuing the truth in their belief in God. This leads to them following wrong turns for several years, before realizing that the most important thing in believing in God is understanding the truth and entering into reality to achieve salvation, and that this is the most crucial thing. Only then do they understand that the dispositional change that God speaks of does not refer to changes in outward behavior, and that God is instead asking people to understand themselves and their own corrupt essence, to put in effort and find the root cause with regard to understanding man's nature essence, and to then cast off their corrupt dispositions, put the truth into practice, and be able to obey and worship God. This is what it means to change one's life disposition. Are you now aware of the root cause behind why you have believed in God for years without achieving any dispositional change? It's because you don't understand what dispositional change is, and you don't know what results and standards God wants to achieve by saving people. Some people might not accept this aspect of the truth, and say: "I know what dispositional change is, but I just can't control myself. I always do things I like to do, and things that I think are right." Overall, no matter how you phrase it, this way of speaking proves that you still don't understand what dispositional change is, which is why you have produced all kinds of notions and imaginings. The more that dispositional change is spoken of, the farther away it feels from you, the more it feels beyond your reach, and the greater you seem to fall short of it. The more that dispositional change and revealing mankind's nature essence is discussed, do you not feel even more that your disposition has not changed at all, and that you must keep working hard? Why do I ask you about dispositional change? Actually, I know you won't be able to answer. Some people will say, "Well, aren't You just making things difficult for us? Why ask us if You know that we cannot answer?" I am not making things difficult for you. With every question I ask, I am hoping that you will take them to heart. Don't simply think about every sentence or topic that I fellowship on and consider the matter closed once you seem to understand them. Every sentence, and every aspect of content that I fellowship on now is a process that you will have to go through in the future. No part of it can be omitted, and these are all things that you fundamentally do not possess. I ask you in the hope that you will reflect on yourselves, and examine whether you have any human notions and imaginings in your hearts. You should carefully reflect on whether you have any human notions or any erroneous thoughts and ideas in your approach to belief in God. In reality, people all have their own minds and thoughts, and matters concerning belief in God are no exception. So, you must examine the essence of these thoughts and notions. Right now, we do not go through formalities in our gatherings like people do in the religious world: reading the Bible, praying, listening to sermons, and that's the end of it. Can it be that simple? Of course not. The topics we discuss now are the highest of all human topics, and more important than any other, because the topics we speak of now concern humanity's future destination, and the requirements that God, the Ruler of all things, has for man. We explore these sorts of topics and fellowship on them daily, but perhaps even now there are those who don't guite understand them. We haven't finished fellowshiping on these topics, and not a single one of them can be fully described or explained. Matters of life, therefore, are not as simple as people imagine. It's not just a case of listening to more sermons, reading more of God's word, making more notes, and then memorizing some famous phrases, and using those things to fellowship with brothers and sisters at gatherings. It's not that simple. You must pay attention, you must understand every aspect of the truth that God speaks of, and these are also truths that everyone who seeks to attain salvation must equip themselves with. If you understand why God requires people to achieve dispositional change, then you'll pay attention to this in your heart and strive for the truth. If you can't see clearly what dispositional change is all about, then you won't love or pay attention to the truth. On the contrary, you'll have no interest in the truth, so you will never be able to obtain it. God enlightens those who thirst for the truth, and hides from those who do not pursue it. If you have a longing, seeking heart, then God will enlighten you, work on you, and, little by little, make you understand all aspects of the truth clearly. Do you think that the topic of dispositional change is important? (Yes, it is important.) It's definitely important, because you urgently need to understand this aspect of the truth right now. You fear that you don't have the truth, that you haven't changed, and that you will be abandoned when the disasters strike, and you fear that you will fall into the disasters, and suffer therein. Of course, some people fear that they understand too little of the truth right now, and that when God tests them in the future they will stumble and not be able to stand firm, wasting all of their previous efforts. Because this is the last stage of God's work to save mankind, if people cannot achieve salvation at this stage, then their belief in God will have totally failed, their life of faith in God will be over, and they will ultimately be destroyed.

If you want to achieve dispositional change, you must first understand what it is. I spoke just now about what some people imagine dispositional change to be in their notions, and you all agreed that these people's statements and views are incorrect, mistaken, and incompatible with the dispositional change that God requires. So, how should you understand dispositional change? How should you attain it? Achieving dispositional change is no simple matter. You must first possess the ability to eat, drink, and apprehend God's words. If you do not possess this quality, you will be unable to understand the truth or know yourself, and thus be unable to achieve dispositional change. If you want to achieve such a change, you must have knowledge of your own corrupt disposition, and discern your various erroneous thoughts, perspectives, behaviors, and manifestations based on God's words. You must then hold your state against God's word for comparison, and come to understand your own corrupt disposition. Once you can see clearly that the essence of this corrupt disposition is something which resists and betrays God, and is something which He hates, then you will be able to throw off your corrupt disposition and gradually achieve dispositional change. Tell Me, as mankind has been so deeply corrupted, will they be able to understand their corrupt dispositions if they don't accept the truths which God expresses? Will they be able to see the reality of mankind's profound corruption? Corrupt people all advocate for education, they all accept and compete for knowledge, yet the human world gets progressively darker and eviler. And who is it that can save mankind from this influence of darkness? It is totally impossible, therefore, to achieve dispositional change and to live out human likeness if you depart from God's word, and do not accept His judgment and purification. Some people say: "I don't want to read God's words about judging and exposing people, because reading these things pierces me to the heart and makes me uncomfortable." Will they be able to know themselves by approaching God's words in this way? Will it be easy for them to achieve dispositional change? It's okay if you don't like reading God's words that judge and chastise mankind, as God's house has hymns of God's word, as well as experiential testimony videos, for you to watch, and learn. Sing those hymns more, as they are set to melodies, which makes them easy to learn and memorize. Learning to sing these hymns of God's word in this way will bring results, and it will be easy for you to remember some of His words. Begin sparking your interest in the truth with these words. Needing to spark people's interest even when it comes to eating and drinking God's word—tell Me, how removed is mankind from God's requirements, that people must have their interest sparked through hymns? This proves that mankind really doesn't love the truth! God's words are spoken so well, and no matter what aspect of the truth is being fellowshiped on, they are of benefit to man, from beginning to end, but people still don't like to eat and drink them. Mankind is really too far removed from God's requirements! So, what's to be done about this situation? First, you must pray to God every time you eat and drink His words, saying: "Oh God, I wish to strive for dispositional change and gain a good destination, because I fear falling into the disasters. I also want to eat and drink Your words more, but those that judge and expose people are too harsh, they pierce me to the heart, so I'm unwilling to read them. Please, enlighten me, help me, enable me to understand Your words, and to see that Your words are all that my life needs, and that they are the life that I should attain." If you sincerely pray in this way, then God will work in you without you even realizing it, and gradually lead you to understand more of His words, in an increasingly profound way. Some people say: "I very much like eating and drinking God's words, and have already read them from beginning to end, but I don't know which truths are the most important to understand, and which truth realities are most important to enter into, or how I should pursue in order to achieve dispositional change." How can this problem be solved? First, you must put a lot more effort into God's words. It's not enough to merely read them a few times. You must read them carefully many times, ponder and fellowship on them often, and practice them in your life, until you have actual experience. Only then can you understand the truth. In addition, if you cannot fellowship clearly on some topics, just fellowship to whatever extent you can. Set aside the topics which you really cannot fellowship clearly on for now; first choose to fellowship, from shallow to deep, on those which are easier for you to understand, and which your current level of experience can reach. Life entry is not a simple matter, and it's impossible to enter deeply after believing for just three or five years. It's the same as the process of becoming an adult: growing little by little from childhood, cumulatively, until you finally become an adult after 20 or 30 years. Believing in God also requires this many years of experience, and as for the truths about obeying and loving God, it takes a whole lifetime to experience them. Some people say: "I eat and drink God's words in this way, but how exactly can I gauge if I have made any changes to my disposition?" Many brothers and sisters are concerned about this question. Tell Me, when a baby has just been born, and his mother feeds and looks after him, does the baby care about when he will grow into an adult? Of course not, because he doesn't understand. So, you don't need to ask this question. Just wait until you've grown in stature, then you'll naturally understand, and when the time comes that you ought to change, you will naturally do so. God will do some things in every stage and period you go through, arranging some environments or people, matters, and things to make you learn lessons. Think back on your belief in God, from its beginning until now, compare what kind of views you had when you first believed in God to your views now, and you'll know if you've changed. Right now, the most important thing for you to do is to eat and drink more of God's words, to fellowship more, to listen to more sermons, and to work harder on God's words. This is crucial, and it is the primary condition for achieving dispositional change. Can you achieve results if you don't read God's words or fellowship on the truth, but only focus on how to feel the Holy Spirit's touch, how to live within the spirit, and be spiritual? There's no point always focusing on these things, as they're all secondary. So, what is the most important thing? Eating and drinking God's words more. If you do not carefully eat and drink His words, then even if you gather daily or conduct religious ceremonies well, you won't be able to understand the truth, let alone put it into practice. This is because the truth is all contained within God's words, and you will never gain it if you do not eat and drink His words. All truth comes from God's words, and if you leave His words, that is tantamount to leaving God. If you depart from eating and drinking God's words, then you are not believing in God, and you are one of the unbelievers. Then, no matter how good your behavior may be, you'll never be able to achieve salvation. Therefore, to those who believe in God, eating and drinking His words is the most important thing. If you work hard at God's word, you'll gain as much as you put into it. There's no need for you to look into, weigh up, let alone care about precisely how big these gains are. This isn't your responsibility. God will do His work, and God will give you an explanation, enlighten you, and let you know. So, if someone asks again in the future: "When will God test me? Will I be able to stand firm? How much has my disposition actually changed? Can't God give me a definite answer?" this is outrageous and unreasonable. There's no need for you to concern yourself with such things. When you one day have stature, and your disposition has really changed, you'll be able to overcome a situation that befalls you and handle it correctly, using the methods that God requires. Then you will know that you have changed. This is not an external change, but an internal change, and it is a change in disposition and essence.

Dispositional change isn't something that happens overnight, or something that can be achieved after several years of experience. Some people often fail and stumble when they begin to change their bad habits, and think: "I'm done. I'm hopeless. Dispositional change is not for me, it's impossible for me to change. If it's so hard for me to change even these small flaws or bad habits, then surely it will be even more difficult to change my disposition?" They become negative, feel like they have no hope, and they are unwilling to eat and drink God's words for a long time. Whenever anyone prunes and deals with them, they feel annoyed and negative, they are unwilling to perform their duties, and totally uninterested in the truth. What state is this? This is a serious problem. Have you ever had this kind of experience? Are you afraid that, in the process of your life experience, you'll always be negative, weak, failing, and stumbling? Regardless of whether you're afraid or not, it is a fact that dispositional change does not happen overnight. This is because dispositional change begins from the very root of mankind's corrupt nature, and it is a radical and total transformation. It is like when someone gets cancer and grows a tumor: They must be operated on to remove the tumor, they must endure a lot of suffering, and it is a very complex process. In the process of dispositional change, you may go through many things before understanding a little bit of the truth or achieving an aspect of dispositional change, or you may experience many people, matters, things, and different environments, and make many wrong turns, before you finally achieve a little change. This change is precious, no matter how big it is, and it is cherished and commemorated in God's eyes because you have suffered much and paid a great price for it. God examines the depths of people's hearts, knows their thoughts and desires, and their weaknesses, but most of all God knows what they need. To follow the practical God, we must have this resolve: No matter how great the environments we encounter, nor what kind of difficulties we face, and no matter how weak or negative we are, we cannot lose faith in our dispositional change or in the words that God has spoken. God has made a promise to mankind, and this requires people to have resolve, faith, and perseverance to bear it. God does not like cowards; He likes people with resolve. Even if you've revealed a lot of corruption, even if you've taken the wrong path many times, or committed many transgressions, complained about God, or from within religion resisted God or harbored blasphemy against Him in your heart, and so on—God doesn't look at all that. God only looks at whether someone pursues the truth and whether they can one day change. In the Bible there is a story about the return of the prodigal son why did the Lord Jesus use this parable? It was to make people understand that God's intention to save mankind is sincere, and that He gives people the opportunity to repent and change. Throughout this process, God understands man, knowing well their weaknesses and the degree of their corruption. He knows that people will stumble and fail. Just like a child learning to walk, no matter how physically strong they are, there will always be times where they fall and stumble, and times when they knock into things and trip over. God understands every person in the way that a mother understands her child. He understands each person's difficulties, their weaknesses, and their needs. Even more than that, God understands what difficulties, weaknesses, and failures people will face while entering into the process of changing their disposition. These are the things that God understands best. This means that God examines the depths of people's hearts. No matter how weak you are, as long as you don't renounce God's name, or leave Him and this way, then you'll always have the chance to achieve dispositional change. If you have this chance, then you have hope of surviving, and therefore of being saved by God. When we understand what dispositional change is, and what kind of process is needed for it, then we should not be afraid, but should have faith, and pray before God: "Oh God! I am so deeply corrupt. I don't even know what the truth is, much less what dispositional change is. I really need Your salvation, and for You to help and provide for me, so that I may know how to understand and put Your words into practice, and gain knowledge and experience from them, and thus bring Your words into my life, and have Your enlightenment and guidance in my every word and action, my each and every move, in all of my intentions, and in everything I do. I hope for this, I thirst for this, I long to live out normal humanity and true human likeness to satisfy You. But I cannot yet achieve this, my corruption is still so great that I don't even realize it myself. Please expose me, help me, and provide for me. This is what I need right now." You should have this kind of prayer, and this kind of resolve. After praying like this, your heart and your life will change without you even knowing it, because how you pray and seek is mirrored in your resolve, and in how God fulfills your resolve. It won't do if you're always afraid of failure, and, in fact, becoming scared before anything actually happens to you just proves that you lack resolve and faith when it comes to the matter of dispositional change. First, you must understand that dispositional change does not happen overnight. Do you think that mankind was so deeply corrupted by Satan overnight? No, people have been corrupted by Satan for millennia, their satanic nature has already been thoroughly exposed, and advanced to a degree where they cannot control it, and where their natural outpourings can only exceed those of Satan. They've reached the level of being enemies of God, and the point where they feel uninterested, repulsed, and loathing whenever they hear that something is the truth, or the word of God, or from God. People are corrupt and numb to such an extent, so it's not easy for them to understand the truth, let alone achieve dispositional change. Changing one's disposition is not as simple as changing one's behavior. We must therefore have a correct understanding of this matter of dispositional change, and approach it with the correct attitude. We cannot indulge in wild fantasies and say, "I believe in God, and I have been eating and drinking His words all along. Won't I change if God just does a bit more work, and performs some signs and wonders?" This is an unrealistic view, and it is a human imagining. If we followed human notions and imaginings, there would be no need for God to do His work of judgment, nor for Him to express so many words revealing mankind's corruption, let alone for Him to test and refine people. Tell Me, in God's management plan, does He save mankind in order to defeat Satan, or does He fight Satan in order to save mankind? (God fights Satan in order to save mankind.) That's right. We must have an accurate understanding of God's management plan. So, in the future, do not utter the foolish statement: "Why doesn't God just destroy Satan?" Without Satan's corruption, would God express so many truths in order to save us? Would we have gained so many truths by now? Without Satan's corruption, God's management plan to save mankind would never have arisen, nor would God have planned to perfect this group of people in the last days to become those who remain. God battles Satan in order to save mankind and gain a group of people. It can also be said that it was entirely for the sake of perfecting our group of people that God became flesh to fight Satan. Therefore, we have seen God's will, and the goal and core of His management plan is to gain a group of true people. This is God's management plan. So, you can see how important it is to achieve dispositional change in one's belief in God, and be able to fully become a true person whom God loves and wishes to gain!

Do you have a path for achieving dispositional change? Do you know what things will change? Do you usually fellowship on this aspect of the truth? Just now, we fellowshiped on how dispositional change doesn't refer to changes in outward behavior and conduct, or in rules, nor does it refer to changes in one's personality. So, what exactly is it? Have you ever considered this? First, we must discover and understand which dispositions and things God wants us to change. Dispositional change is not a change in behavior or personality, much less a change whereby people become more knowledgeable or learned; God wants to change every person's thoughts and views through His words, and enable them to understand the truth, so that they can achieve a transformation in how they see things. This is but one aspect, while another is to change the principles underpinning how people conduct themselves, which is a change in their outlook on life; yet another is to change the deep-rooted satanic nature and disposition which is revealed in people. In general, dispositional change encompasses these three aspects.

Let us initially discuss the first aspect of dispositional change—the way people view things. People's thoughts and views are, namely, the way they see everything. Man has been so deeply corrupted by Satan that many of these thoughts and views are wrong and absurd, and God saves people by first changing the way they view things. Take a simple example: What is your understanding of knowledge? Of science? Are knowledge and science the truth? Can they solve people's corrupt disposition, and enable them to live out human likeness? Can they rescue people from Satan's influence? Can they lead people to know and obey God? Can they lead to salvation, and obtaining a good destination? They certainly cannot. What use is knowledge in a person's life? What can it bring to them? Some people think that knowledge is a precious thing in this world, and that the more knowledge they have, the greater their status and the better they are, the more distinguished and cultured, so they cannot do without knowledge. Some people think if you study hard and enrich your knowledge then you'll have it all. You'll have status, money, a good job and a good future; they believe that without knowledge it's impossible to live in this world. If someone has no knowledge, then everyone looks down on them. They'd be discriminated against, with no one willing to associate with them; those without knowledge can only live on the lowest rungs of society. Thus do they worship knowledge, and regard it as extremely lofty and important—even more so than the truth. Someone might say: "Without knowledge, am I able to understand God's words? Does He not also speak through knowledge and words?" These are two quite different things. The knowledge I'm speaking of now refers to human history, geography, politics, literature, modern science and technology, or certain skills or subjects and so on. People think this is all part of humanity's strength, and that those with knowledge have everything and can stand firm in this world, and so everyone regards knowledge as phenomenally important. In short, however you look at it, this is one aspect of human thoughts and views. There is an ancient saying: "Read ten thousand books, travel ten thousand miles." But what does this mean? It means that the more you read, the more knowledgeable and prosperous you'll be. You'll be highly regarded by all groups of people and will have status. Everyone harbors these kinds of thoughts in their heart. If someone is unable to gain a college diploma due to unfortunate family circumstances, they will regret it for their entire life, and be determined that their children and grandchildren should study more, earn a university degree, or even go study abroad. This is everyone's thirst for knowledge, and how they think, view, and handle it. Many parents, therefore, will spare no effort or expense to nurture their children, even going so far as to squander the family fortune, and all so their children go study. And what of the lengths some parents go to in disciplining their children? Only three hours of sleep permitted a night, continual forced study and reading, or making them emulate the ancients and tie their hair to the ceiling, denying them sleep altogether. These kinds of stories, these tragedies, have always happened from ancient times to the present, and they are the consequences of mankind's thirst for and worship of knowledge. You may find these words distasteful, as there are those among you with impressive knowledge and academic qualifications. Of course, I'm not saying that it's bad for you to be educated, but you must treat this matter correctly. That is, you must now have a correct way of dealing with satanic things, and a correct way to understand and recognize them. I'm not forbidding you to study, let alone preventing you from nurturing your children by having them earn a degree and land a good job. I'm not saying this. I'm not restricting you. I'm only speaking My opinion, and exposing the degree to which corrupt humanity reveres knowledge. Regardless of your current level of knowledge, or how advanced your degrees and academic qualifications are, I'm now speaking about humanity's views on knowledge and My views on knowledge. Do you know what God thinks about knowledge? Someone might say that God wishes developed science for mankind, and for them to understand more scientific knowledge, as He doesn't want man to be too backward, ignorant and uncomprehending. This is correct, but God uses these things to do service, and doesn't approve of them. No matter how wonderful these things are in the eyes of man, they are neither the truth nor a substitute for the truth, so God expresses the truth to change people and their dispositions. Although God's words can occasionally touch on views or ways of looking at knowledge like Confucianism or social sciences, they're only representative of such views. Reading between the lines of God's words, we should see that He hates human knowledge. Human knowledge not only contains basic sentences and simple doctrines, but also some thoughts and views, as well as human absurdity, prejudices, and satanic poisons. Some knowledge can even deceive and corrupt people—it is the poison and tumor of Satan, and once someone has accepted this knowledge and understands it, Satan's poison will grow into a tumor in their heart. This tumor will spread to their whole body, inevitably resulting in death if they are not healed by God's words and cured by the truth. So, the more knowledge people gain, the more they grasp, then the less likely they are to believe in God's existence. Instead, they will actually deny and resist Him, as knowledge is something they can see and touch, and is mostly related to things in their lives. People can study and gain a lot of knowledge in school, but they are blind to the source of knowledge and its connection with the spiritual world. Most of the knowledge that people learn and grasp goes against the truth of God's words, with philosophical materialism and evolution in particular belonging to the heresies and fallacies of atheism. It is undoubtedly a load of fallacies which resist God. What will you gain if you read history books, well-known authors' works, or biographies of great people, or perhaps study certain scientific or technological aspects? For example, if you study physics you will master some physical principles, Newtonian theory or other doctrines but, when learned and taken to heart, these things will take over your mind and dominate your thinking. When you then come to read God's words, you'll think: "How come God doesn't mention gravity? Why isn't outer space discussed? Why isn't God talking about whether the moon has an atmosphere, or how much oxygen there is on earth? God should reveal these things, as they're the things that really need to be made known and told to mankind." If you harbor these kinds of thoughts in your heart, then you'll regard the truth and God's words as secondary, instead elevating to the fore all your knowledge and theories. This is how you will treat God's word. At any rate, these intellectual things will give people the wrong idea and cause them to stray from God. It doesn't matter if you believe it or not, or whether you can accept it today—the day will come when you will admit this fact. Do you truly understand how knowledge can lead people to destruction, to hell? There are some who may not be willing to accept this, because there are some highly educated and very knowledgeable people among you. I'm not mocking you or being sarcastic, I'm simply stating a fact. Neither am I asking you to accept it right here and right now, but to gradually come to an understanding of this aspect. Knowledge causes you to use your mind and intellect to analyze and deal with everything God does. It will become a hindrance and obstacle to you knowing God and experiencing His work, and lead you to stray from and resist God. But you have knowledge now, so what do you do? You have to differentiate between knowledge which is practical, and that which comes from Satan and belongs to heresy and fallacy. If you only accept atheistic, absurd knowledge, it can obstruct your belief in God, disturb your normal relationship with Him and your acceptance of the truth, and block your life entry. This you need to know, for it is correct, and you should properly comprehend this topic. I know that some brothers and sisters are highly educated, and I'm not attacking, mocking, or sidelining you. This topic suddenly came up today, and these are just a few words to warn you, not to intentionally cause trouble for those of you with high academic qualifications or some knowledge and culture. It's not to make you negative or depressed, that's not the aim at all. So, can you properly comprehend it? (Yes, we can.) If you can, then I am relieved, and can breathe a bit easier.

After fellowshiping this much, you can see now that achieving dispositional change isn't a simple matter. It's not something that's achieved by merely understanding doctrines and following rules. You must first come to understand yourself, be able to reflect on your thoughts and views, and dig out which of those exist in your heart that deny and resist God, as well as those things that God hates and abhors. Do you really have any understanding about your own satanic nature, or of the various satanic dispositions you usually reveal? Are you really able to dissect them? Corrupt human beings all have satanic dispositions, and all have deeply-rooted erroneous thoughts and ideas. Everyone is the same, with some corruption within them that is hostile to the truth and resistant to God. None of it is compatible with the truth, and most people can accept this. Just now, I talked about how to understand human knowledge, and why I say that much of it is absurd and wrong. Some of you might feel uncomfortable when you hear this, like you've been poked in a sore spot, but it had to be said. Many of your mistaken views are derived from knowledge, and this incorrect and absurd knowledge generates erroneous thoughts and views, which become deeply rooted in your hearts. If you don't resolve these misguided views, it will be difficult for you to accept the truth, let alone put it into practice. I hope, therefore, that you can accept God's words, and all the truths He expresses. Even if you are unwilling, you should still learn, and try to accept. In this way, your hearts will become closer to God's, and you will become closer to His requirements. If you don't practically experience God's words in this way, putting the truth into practice, then your belief in God will always be mere lip service, and it will be impossible to enter into the truth reality. Is it not this way? Today I've spoken a little about knowledge, which may have made you feel awkward. If you do feel uncomfortable then I am sorry, but you have to face these realities as there is no avoiding them. If you avoid them, then when will you be able to know which things within your thoughts and views are right and which are wrong? You can't know. You will have to one day face these facts; like the unbelievers say: "An ugly wife will eventually meet her in-laws." Now that you believe in God, if you want to accept His chastisement and judgment, if you want to have life entry, achieve dispositional change and be saved, you have to face these facts, learn your lessons, and endure some torment and suffering. You wish to pray to God in your heart but you lack the right words, so you are left speechless, and the next time you encounter such a thing you'll again be uncomfortable for several days, and again be left speechless, but the following time you encounter it, you'll unconsciously discover that there really are some things in your thoughts and views which resist God; you will be able to nod your head and admit—honestly and seriously admit—that everything God has said is true, without any falsehood, and that truly God knows mankind best, and understands best the things that exist in everyone's heart. The day will come when you have this level of experience, and then you'll be on the right path of believing in God, and the right path of changing your life disposition. At that time, because you won't contradict every word God says, you won't feel uncomfortable when you hear them, and you'll be able to accept every fact that God reveals without aversion, and without running away. You will face it properly, and this will prove that you have already entered into the word of God. We've made but a small beginning today, conducted a small experiment. You may have felt a little uncomfortable, a little awkward, but that doesn't matter. I don't mind, and I hope you don't mind either, because God's words of judgment are much harsher than these. If

God really wants to judge you, His words will be much more severe. Do you think that God will speak in a kindly manner when He sees a corrupt mankind without normal humanity, unreasonable, with eyes wide open yet still denying, condemning, and resisting God? Could God's attitude be good when exposing man? Of course not. God's words would definitely be pretty severe, profound, and to the point! If you can accept the few facts on which we've fellowshiped today, then this proves you've made a good start on accepting God's word and His chastisement and judgment. On this first aspect, we've talked about the problem of thoughts and views, with a little example which you all know, looking at the topic of knowledge. I didn't fellowship on this topic very much in the fear that it'd make some people uncomfortable, so I've only spoken a little in consideration of their feelings, though imperfectly and briefly. I hope that you can gradually figure it out through your experience, slowly seek the truth in this area, and experience what knowledge can bring to people. Perhaps we'll fellowship more on this topic in the future, and I hope that you won't feel uncomfortable at that time, and won't think, "Is this something against me? Is this aimed at me?" None of those thoughts or ideas. But for now, we'll conclude our fellowship on the first aspect here.

Now we'll fellowship on the second aspect of dispositional change—outlook on life. What is yours? What are the principles by which you live? Do you have any understanding? Are there even any principles? Do you have any idea? That is, what sort of person do you want to be? What is your outlook on life, your life's direction? (To be someone God likes.) (To follow God to the end for the rest of my life.) (To know God.) (To escape my corrupt disposition and be saved by God.) Everything you've said is excellent, and proves that all your hearts are hard at work in the pursuit of the truth and you are determined to follow God to gain the truth, and that you have a correct goal and direction for your conduct, which shows that, in your belief in God, your heart is not empty and you're not just wasting time. You've made some progress during this time, and this is change; at the very least you won't say, like the unbelievers, "Life is just about eating and dressing." If you hear someone saying such things, you'll dislike them, and detest and reject them. No matter how far you've entered the truth, you should have the will to follow God well. You should know in your hearts, "Since God has revealed to us the goals and mysteries of His management plan, and His intention to save mankind, and since we've seen His promises and blessings, then if we remain passive and inconsiderate of God's will, we would really be letting Him down and we would be so indebted to Him!" Having this kind of heart proves that your spirits have already awakened and have begun to change. In any case, judging by your efforts to perform your duty, you're all striving toward the direction and goals required by God, and this is correct. No matter what differences there are in your viewpoints about pursuit, they are all quite practical and not imaginary or empty. Do you think that we should have the view of seeking to be someone who truly obeys and worships God? Should we not have an outlook on life where we no longer resist God, no longer make Him loathe or be angry at us, constantly furious, but where God's heart is comforted and we are, like Abraham, true worshipers? This is the outlook on life that people should have. When this sort of outlook on life and these kinds of thoughts have taken root in your heart, and you pursue in this direction, then will not the temptation and seduction of worldly riches, status, fame and profit be lessened? When you work hard, practice, and experience in this direction, without even realizing it, God's words will become your motto for life in your heart, and the foundation of your existence; before you know it, God's words will become your life, become your life path within you. At that time, won't everything in the world just be unimportant to you? Therefore, it is also important what your outlook on life is. In what direction are you pursuing, in your belief in God? Is it the right direction? Is it the right path? How far are you from God's requirements? If you pursue on the basis of God's requirements, then you're going in the right direction. It doesn't even matter if you go a little astray, or are a little weak, or have some failures; God won't remember, and will always support you until your life grows. What kind of people do you think God likes? God likes those who pursue the truth, are determined, and are honest. He is not worried by your ignorance, your weakness, or your lack of wisdom; but He loathes it if you do not pursue the truth, or if you understand the truth but do not put it into practice, or if you live without reading His words, like soulless animals, with no goal or direction for your life—God hates it if you have this attitude of believing in Him. To achieve dispositional change through belief in God, therefore, quality of outlook on life is very important. Some people say, "My goal in life is to be someone of great use to God, someone who can serve Him." Is this a good pursuit? It may be good, but human stature is limited and people's qualities and conditions are different, so your pursuit of this goal is right, but it might not be suitable for you. People's outlook on life should be to become someone with truth, humanity, conscience, and reason who worships God—that is, a real person. This is the most proper pursuit. Someone might say: "Are we not now real people?" Outwardly you are, as you have noses and eyes, and a human form, but based on your essence, you have still not become a real person. You still lack too much and understand too few truths. To be a real person, someone who possesses the truth and has humanity, someone who fears God and shuns evil, who follows His will and worships Him, you must pursue and obtain the truth. This is a matter of personal practice.

The third aspect of dispositional change is one's satanic nature. This we must understand and grasp the most, as this is the most important aspect related to dispositional change. Satanic nature is humanity's corrupt disposition and corrupt essence, and this topic makes up a lot of God's words which expose this aspect the most. God's words on this aspect are also the strictest, with many different styles: Some directly expose and judge, while others find a more tactful turn of phrase lest people cannot accept it. But no matter how it's said, or what style or tone is used, it is true that what God reveals is the essence of man. God reveals the most typical aspect of satanic nature in two chapters. What is the typical essence of satanic nature? Do you know? (A betraying nature.) The betraying nature revealed in God's words "A Very Serious" Problem: Betrayal (1)" and "A Very Serious Problem: Betrayal (2)" is the typical representation of satanic nature. Other aspects like humanity's self-righteousness, arrogance, and deceit, or mankind's wickedness and resistance—these are all mentioned somewhat in every chapter, but there isn't a single chapter in which the truth of these aspects is especially expounded upon. Only on the topic of "betrayal" has God spoken two full chapters. From this we can see that in God's eyes, human betrayal is exceedingly serious, and that it directly offends His disposition, and is what He hates most, and what He curses. How does God dissect and deal with the essence of human betrayal? Of course, God dislikes human betrayal. He despises and loathes it, and loathes those who betray Him. Betrayal is archetypical of satanic nature. Where does the root cause of the nature of human betrayal come from? It comes from Satan. We must, therefore, understand this aspect of disposition. The root cause of betrayal is Satan, Satan's nature is betrayal, and the disposition people reveal by the things they do is seen as betrayal by God. Why does God discuss this matter at such length? It is because human betrayal is constant, irrespective of place or time and, no matter how someone behaves, something deeply rooted in human nature opposes God. Some people say: "I don't want to oppose or resist God!" But you will, as within you is a betraying nature, which means you cannot obey God, cannot follow Him to the end, and cannot completely accept God's words as your life. How should you understand the problem of betrayal? No matter how long you've believed in God, or how many of His words you've eaten and drunk, or how much understanding you have of Him—so long as your nature betrays God, and you haven't accepted His words as your life, and you have no entry into the truth of His words, then your essence will forever betray God. That is to say, if your disposition hasn't changed, you're someone who betrays God. Some people say: "I can comprehend God's words, and understand everything He says. I'm also willing to accept them, so how can I be called someone who betrays God?" Just because you're willing to accept doesn't mean that you're able to live out God's words, let alone that you've already been made complete by them. The truth of mankind's betraying nature is deep, and if you want to understand this aspect of the truth, then you might need a period of experience. In God's eyes, everything that every person who believes in God does is at odds with the truth, incompatible with God's word, and hostile to Him. You might not be able to accept this either, and say: "We serve God, worship God, do our duty in God's house. We've done so much, all according to God's words and requirements, and in line with work arrangements. How can it be said that we resist and betray God? Why do You always knock our enthusiasm? We gave up our family and careers with huge difficulty, and were determined to follow God, so how can You speak about us like this?" The aim of speaking thus is to ensure that everyone understands: It's not the case that someone who behaves guite well, or gives something up, or suffers some hardships, will change their betraying nature. No way! Suffering is necessary, as is performing your duty, but just because you can suffer, or perform, doesn't mean that your corrupt disposition no longer exists. This is because there has been no real change in life disposition within anyone, and everyone is still far from satisfying God's will and meeting His requirements. People's belief in God is too adulterated, their corrupt dispositions revealed too much. Although many leaders or workers serve God, they also resist Him. What does this mean? It's that they intentionally go against God's words and don't practice according to His will. They intentionally violate the truth, insist on acting according to their own will, to achieve their own designs and aims, to betray God and establish their own independent kingdom, where what they say goes. This is the meaning of serving God but also resisting Him. Do you understand now?

Let us fellowship no more on "betrayal" now. There is still a crucial problem, which is the arrogance and conceit that is characteristic of satanic nature. Mankind's arrogance is revealed and displayed everywhere, and cannot be restrained even if they want to. It is revealed and bursts forth from time to time, and there's nothing people can do about it. After it bursts forth, they'll regret it, and after regretting it they'll firmly resolve never to let it happen again, never to reveal it again, but they still won't be able to control it. Why is this? It is because people's disposition hasn't changed, and their corrupt disposition is still there. This will never just automatically disappear from inside them, and when something happens their corrupt disposition will naturally be revealed. This is all caused by mankind's arrogant and conceited disposition. When you understand more of the truth, can put it into practice and grasp the truth principles, and when your understanding of the truth is more and more practical, and you have knowledge of God and are closer to His requirements, when your views on things have changed—then your arrogant disposition will gradually lessen, slowly disappear, and your life disposition will begin to change. At that time, the problem of your betrayal can be considered completely resolved, and only then will you be someone who has truly been saved.

Only by Recognizing One's Own Misguided Views Can One Truly Transform

Do you now have a way to know yourselves, to gain life entry, and to enter the right path of believing in God? Do you have a goal or direction? You should have some ideas, because we've fellowshiped quite a bit on matters such as being an honest person, about knowing yourself, how to eat and drink God's word, how you should fellowship on the truth to solve problems, how you should cooperate harmoniously in the performance of your duty, how brothers and sisters should go about establishing normal interpersonal relations between one another, and so on. Now that you're clearer on all aspects of the truth relating to faith in God, have some practical knowledge, and you aren't like you were before—when you were all vague no matter which aspect you were asked about don't you feel much better? (Now I feel clearer and clearer.) "Clearer and clearer" is right. In reality, no matter which aspect of the truth one practices, whether it's being an honest person, or training oneself to submit to God, or whether it's how to engage amicably with one's brothers and sisters, how to live out normal humanity, or something similar, no matter what aspect of the truth you seek to enter, you must start by touching on the issue of self-knowledge. Does being honest not involve knowing yourself? You will not be able to practice honesty until you have come to know your own deceit and dishonesty. When you come to know you have failed to obey God, only then will you be able to practice obedience to Him, or seek out what you must do to obey Him. If you do not know yourself, then your wishes to be an honest person, obey God, or attain salvation, are all empty. This is because people have corrupt dispositions, and it is not easy for them to practice any aspect of the truth, as their practice is always tainted and obstructed by their corrupt dispositions. When you practice any aspect of the truth, your corrupt dispositions will certainly rear their heads, hindering your efforts to be honest, obstructing your submission to God, and inhibiting your patience and tolerance for your brothers and sisters. If you do not reflect on, unearth, dissect, or come to recognize these corrupt dispositions, and instead rely on your notions and imaginings to practice the truth, then you will just be obeying rules, because you do not understand the truth and you do not know what truth principles to abide by. Therefore, no matter which aspect of the truth a person is practicing, or what they are doing, they must first reflect on and know themselves. To know yourself is to know your every word and deed, and each and every action; it is to know your thoughts and ideas, your intentions, and your notions and imaginings. You must also know Satan's philosophies for living, and all Satan's various poisons, as well as traditional cultural knowledge. You must seek the truth and discern these things clearly. That way, you will understand the truth and truly know yourself. Though a person may have done a great number of good deeds since they began believing in God, they still cannot see many things clearly, let alone achieve understanding of the truth. Yet, because of their many good deeds, they feel that they're already practicing the truth, have already submitted to God, and have already guite satisfied His will. When nothing befalls you, you are able to do whatever you are told, you have no qualms about performing any duty, and you do not resist. When you are told to spread the gospel, you don't complain and can stand this hardship, and when you are told to run about and work, or to do a task, you do so. Because of this, you feel you are one who submits to God and genuinely pursues the truth. Yet if you are asked seriously, "Are you an honest person? Are you a person who truly submits to God? A person whose disposition has changed?"—if every person is held up for scrutiny against the truth of God's words—it may be said that none is up to standard, and that none would be capable of acting according to the truth principles. So, all of corrupt mankind must reflect on themselves. They must reflect on the dispositions that they live by, and on the satanic philosophies, logic, heresies and fallacies from which all of their acts and deeds derive. They must reflect on the root cause of why they reveal their corrupt disposition, what the essence of their acting willfully is, on what and for whom they live. If this is held up to the truth for comparison, then all people will be condemned. What is the reason for this? The reason is that mankind is so deeply corrupted. People do not understand the truth, and all of them live by their corrupt dispositions. They do not have the least bit of self-knowledge, they always believe in God according to their own notions and imaginings, perform their duties based on their own preferences and methods, and follow religious theories in how they serve God. What is more, they still think that they are full of faith, that their actions are very reasonable, and in the end they feel that they have gained a lot. Without realizing it, they come to think that they are already acting in line with God's will and have satisfied it completely, and that they have already met God's requirements and are following His will. If this is how you feel, or if you think that you have reaped some gains in your several years of belief in God, then all the more must you come back before God to examine yourself. You should look at the path you have walked over your years of faith to see whether all your acts and deeds before God have been entirely in accordance with His will. Examine which of your behaviors were in opposition to God, which achieved submission to Him, whether your actions have met and satisfied God's requirements. You should clarify all these things, for only then will you know yourself.

The key to self-reflection and knowing yourself is this: The more you feel that in certain areas you have done well or done the right thing, and the more you think you can satisfy God's will or are able to boast in certain areas, then the more it is worth knowing yourself in those areas and the deeper it is worth digging into them to see what impurities exist in you, as well as what things in you cannot satisfy God's will. Let us take Paul as an example. Paul was especially knowledgeable, he suffered a lot in his preaching work, and many people particularly adored him. As a result, after completing much work, he assumed there would be a crown set aside for him. This caused him to go farther and farther down the wrong path, until finally he was punished by God. If he had reflected upon and dissected himself at the time, then he would not have thought in the way that he did. In other words, Paul had not focused on seeking the truth in the words of the Lord Jesus; he had only believed in his own notions and imaginings. He had thought that merely by doing some good things and exhibiting some good behaviors, he would be praised and rewarded by God. In the end, his own notions and imaginings blinded his heart and covered the truth of his corruption. But people were not able to discern this, and had no knowledge of these matters, and so before God had brought this to light, they had always set Paul as a standard to aim for, an example to live by, and regarded him as an idol they sought and longed to be. Paul's case is a warning to every one of God's chosen people. Especially when we who follow God can suffer and pay the price in our duties and as we serve God, we feel that we are faithful and love God, and at times like this, we should reflect on and understand ourselves even more concerning the path we are taking, which is very necessary. This is because what you think is good is what you will determine to be correct, and you will not doubt it, reflect on it, or analyze whether there is anything in it that resists God. For example, there are people who believe themselves to be extremely kind-hearted. They never hate or harm others, and they always lend a hand to a brother or sister whose family is in need, lest their problem go unsolved; they have great goodwill, and do everything in their power to help everyone they can. Yet they never focus on practicing the truth, and they have no life entry. What is the result of such helpfulness? They put their own lives on hold, yet are guite pleased with themselves, and extremely satisfied with all they have done. What is more, they take great pride in it, believing that in all they have done, there is nothing that goes against the truth, that it will definitely satisfy God's will, and that they are true believers in God. They see their natural kindness as something to be capitalized on and, as soon as they do so, they take it for granted as the truth. In reality, all they do is human good. They do not practice the truth at all, for what they do is before man, and not before God, and less still do they practice according to God's requirements and the truth. Therefore, all their deeds are in vain. Nothing they do is practicing the truth or God's words, let alone following His will; rather, they use human kindness and good behavior to help others. In summary, they do not seek God's will in everything they do, nor do they act in accordance with His requirements. God does not praise this kind of good behavior of man; to God, it is to be condemned, and does not merit His remembrance.

To know oneself is crucial for each and every person, because it directly impacts the important matter of whether or not one can cast off their corrupt disposition and achieve salvation. Do not think this is a simple matter. To know yourself is not to understand your actions or practices, but to know the essence of your problem; to know the root of your disobedience and its essence, to know why you cannot practice the truth, and understand the things which arise and disturb you when you practice the truth. These are some of the most important aspects of knowing yourself. For example, due to the conditioning of Chinese traditional culture, in Chinese people's traditional notions they believe that one must observe filial piety toward their parents. Whoever does not observe filial piety is an unfilial child. These ideas have been instilled in people since childhood, and they are taught in practically every household, as well as in every school and in society at large. When a person's head has been filled with such stuff, they think, "Filial piety is more important than anything. If I weren't to observe it, I wouldn't be a good person—I'd be an unfilial child and I'd be denounced by society. I'd be a person who lacks conscience." Is this view correct? People have seen so many truths expressed by God—has God demanded that one show filial piety toward their parents? Is this one of the truths that believers in God must understand? No, it is not. God has only fellowshiped on some principles. By what principle do God's words ask that people treat others? Love what God loves, and hate what God hates: This is the principle that should be adhered to. God loves those who pursue the truth and are able to follow His will; these are also the people that we should love. Those who are not able to follow God's will, who hate and rebel against God-these people are despised by God, and we should despise them, too. This is what God asks of man. If your parents do not believe in God, if they know full well that faith in God is the right path, and that it can lead to salvation, yet remain unreceptive, then there is no doubt that they are people who are sick of and hate the truth, and that they are people who resist and hate God—and God naturally abhors and despises them. Could you despise such parents? They oppose and revile God—in which case they are surely demons and Satans. Could you abhor and curse them? These are all real questions. If your parents prevent you from believing in God, how should you treat them? As is asked by God, you should love what God loves, and hate what God hates. During the Age of Grace, the Lord Jesus said, "Who is My mother? And who are My brothers?" "For whoever shall do the will of My Father which is in heaven, the same is My brother, and sister, and mother." These words already existed back in the Age of Grace, and now God's words are even more clear: "Love what God loves, and hate what God hates." These words cut straight to the point, yet people are often unable to grasp their true meaning. If a person is someone who denies and opposes God, who is cursed by God, but they are a parent or relative of yours, and not an evildoer as far as you can tell, and they treat you well, then you might find yourself unable to hate that person, and might even remain in close contact with them, your relationship unchanged. Hearing that God despises such people will trouble you, and you are unable to stand on the side of God and ruthlessly reject them. You're always bound by emotion, and you cannot fully let go of them. What is the reason for this? This happens because your emotions are too strong, and they hinder you from practicing the truth. That person is good to you, so you can't bring yourself to hate them. You could only hate them if they did hurt you. Would that hatred be in line with the truth principles? Also, you're bound by traditional notions, thinking that they are a parent or relative, so if you hate them, you would be scorned by society and reviled by public opinion, condemned as unfilial, without a conscience, and not even human. You think you would suffer divine condemnation and punishment. Even if you want to hate them, your conscience won't let you. Why does your conscience function this way? It's because a way of thinking has been sown within you since you were a child, through the inheritance of your family, the education given to you by your parents, and the indoctrination of traditional culture. This way of thinking is rooted very deeply in your heart, and it makes you mistakenly believe that filial piety is perfectly natural and justified, and that anything inherited from your ancestors is always good. You learned it first and it remains dominant, creating a great stumbling block and disturbance in your faith and acceptance of the truth, leaving you unable to put God's words into practice, and to love what God loves, hate what God hates. You know in your heart that your life came from God, not from your parents, and you also know that your parents not only don't believe in God, but resist God, that God hates them and you should submit to God, stand on His side, but you just can't bring yourself to hate them, even if you want to. You can't turn that corner, you can't steel your heart, and you cannot practice the truth. What's the root of this? Satan uses this kind of traditional culture and notions of morality to bind your thoughts, your mind, and your heart, leaving you unable to accept God's words; you have been possessed by these things of Satan, and rendered incapable of accepting God's words. When you want to practice God's words, these things cause disturbance within you, cause you to oppose the truth and God's requirements, and make you powerless to rid yourself of the yoke of traditional culture. After struggling for a while, you compromise: You prefer to believe traditional notions of morality are correct and in line with the truth, and so you reject or forsake God's words. You do not accept God's words as the truth and you think nothing of being saved, feeling that you still live in this world, and can only survive by relying on these people. Unable to endure society's recrimination, you would rather choose to give up the truth and God's words, abandoning yourself to traditional notions of morality and the influence of Satan, preferring to offend God and not practice the truth. Is man not pitiful? Do they not have need of God's salvation? Some people have believed in God for many years, but still have no insight into the matter of filial piety. They really do not understand the truth. They can never break through this barrier of worldly relationships; they do not have the courage, nor the confidence, let alone the determination, so they cannot love and obey God. Some people are able to see beyond this, and it is no easy thing indeed for them to say, "My parents don't believe in God, and they stop me from believing. They are devils." No unbelievers have faith that there is a God, or that He created the heavens and earth and all things, or that man is created by God. There are even some who say, "Life is given to man by their parents, and they should honor them." Where does such a thought or view come from? Does it come from Satan? It is millennia of traditional culture that have educated and deluded man in this way, causing them to deny God's creation and sovereignty. Without Satan's deception and control, mankind would investigate God's work and read His words, and they would know that they are created by God, that their life is given by God; they would know that everything they have is given by God, and that it is God whom they should thank. Should anyone do us a good turn, we should accept it from God—in particular our parents, who gave birth to and raised us; this is all arranged by God. God rules over all; man is just a tool for service. If someone can set their parents aside, or their husband (or wife) and children, in order to expend themselves for God, then that person will be stronger and have a greater sense of righteousness before Him. However, it is not easy for people to break through the bondage of national education and traditional cultural ideas, notions, and moral statements, because these satanic poisons and philosophies have long taken root in people's hearts, producing all sorts of corrupt dispositions that prevent them from hearing God's word and obeying Him. In the depths of corrupt man's heart, there lacks

a fundamental willingness to put the truth into practice and to follow God's will. So, people rebel against and resist God; they may betray Him and forsake Him at any time. Can one receive the truth if the corrupt dispositions and satanic poisons and philosophies exist within them? Can one achieve submission to God? It is very hard indeed. If it were not for the work of judgment by God Himself, then deeply corrupt mankind could not achieve salvation, and could not be cleansed from all its satanic disposition. Even if people believe in God and are willing to follow Him, they cannot listen to God and obey Him, as it takes too much effort for people to accept the truth. Therefore, the pursuit of truth must first be preceded by the pursuit of knowing oneself and resolving one's own corrupt disposition. Only then will it be easier to accept the truth. Knowing oneself is by no means a simple matter; only those who accept the truth can know themselves. That is why knowing yourself is so vital, and a matter you must not overlook.

People have corrupt dispositions, so it is very difficult for them to accept the truth, and it is even harder for them to know themselves. If they want to achieve salvation, they must come to know their own corrupt dispositions and their nature essence. Only then can they truly accept the truth and put it into practice. Most people who believe in God are satisfied with only being able to speak the words and doctrines, thinking that they understand the truth. This is a big mistake, as those who do not know themselves do not understand the truth. Therefore, in order to understand and obtain the truth in their belief in God, people must focus on knowing themselves. Regardless of when or where we are, and no matter what environment we are in, if we can come to know ourselves, unearth and dissect our own corrupt dispositions, and treat knowing ourselves as our top priority, then we will surely gain something, and gradually deepen our knowledge of ourselves. At the same time, we will practice the truth, practice loving and obeying God, and understand more and more of the truth. The truth will then naturally become our lives. However, if you do not enter into knowing yourself at all, it is false for you to say that you practice the truth, because you are blinded by all sorts of superficial phenomena. You feel as if your behavior has improved, that you have more conscience and reason than before, that you are gentler, more considerate and tolerant of others, and more patient and forgiving with people, and consequently, you think that you are already living out normal humanity, and that you are a great and perfect person. But in God's eyes, you still fall short of His requirements and standards, and you are very far from truly obeying and worshiping Him. This shows that you have not gained the truth, that you lack the slightest bit of reality, and are still far from meeting the standards of salvation. People must understand which truths they need to equip themselves with in order to meet God's requirements. People still cannot distinguish between external good behaviors and the practice of the truth. All that people possess now is just slight changes in their external behavior. Nowadays, most people frequently gather to listen to sermons, and can get along and interact with their brothers and sisters in a normal manner. They do not quarrel, they are able to be tolerant and patient with each other, and they are more conscientious in performing their duties than they were before. However, their understanding of the truth is too shallow, their thoughts and views on many matters are still distant from the truth, or go against the truth, and some of their views are even hostile toward God. This is enough to illustrate that people have not yet obtained the truth. That is why we need to seek the truth in every aspect of self-knowledge and endeavor to know ourselves more profoundly. Through this fellowship, do you not feel that it is very important to know yourselves? Just now, I gave an example of showing filial piety toward one's parents. This is a significant matter that every person needs to face. If you cannot understand the truth and emerge from traditional thoughts and notions, it will be difficult for you to renounce everything and truly expend yourselves for God. There are many people who have believed in God for years and years but have not fulfilled a duty. They've been struggling in their hearts for an unknown amount of time, it is uncertain when they will be able to really understand the truth and emerge from the restraints and shackles of their fleshly affections and traditional thoughts and notions, and reach the point of "loving what God loves and hating what God hates." This is not an easy thing to achieve. Seeing through to the essence of family and casting off the constraints of one's fleshly relations is a difficult hurdle for those who follow God. There is a process to breaking through the shackles of one's family and fleshly affections, and breaking free from the restraints of the thoughts of traditional culture—it requires God to arrange environments in which we may practice entering into the truth. Especially when it comes to our loved ones, it is even more necessary for us to see their true faces and each of their nature essences clearly. At the same time, we also need to reflect, based on the truth, on the corrupt dispositions that we have revealed, and the satanic heresies and fallacies that still exist in our hearts. This requires God to orchestrate various environments to expose us, so that we may know what things still exist in our hearts that resist or are incompatible with Him, and then seek the truth to resolve them. We need God to arrange suitable environments to reveal our corruption and our stature. However, we must also actively and positively work together with God, and place demands on ourselves according to His word, only then can we be made complete by Him. But before God acts, we need to prepare ourselves mentally. First, we need to recognize the satanic poisons that are within man, and understand that the thoughts and notions of traditional culture deceive and corrupt people. We must understand how severely these satanic things—which we inherit, and which come from education and society—resist God, and how much they go against the truth. Only when you see through to these things can you be said to really understand the truth.

I just talked about how to treat one's parents. It can be said that this is a major matter in life, and it is also a significant matter that every person must face. This is undeniable. Next, we will fellowship on another topic, namely, how to treat one's children. When it comes to how you treat your children and your parents, the way that you treat them doesn't matter, rather, what matters is your perspective, it's about the perspective and attitude you approach them with. This is something we need to understand in our hearts. Each person starts to plan from the moment they have children about the kind of education they want their children to receive, the kind of college that their children should go to, and how they can then find good jobs after that, so that they can get a foothold and have a certain level of status in society. People all believe that in this life, one must first possess knowledge and an advanced degree—in their eyes, this is the only way to find employment and secure a livelihood in society, so that one does not have to worry about basic necessities such as food, clothing, and shelter in the future. Therefore, when it comes to how people treat their children, every parent hopes that their child will receive a higher education. They hope that their child will be able to get ahead in the world one day, that they will have a place in society, a high and stable income, and prestige and status. They think that only this will bring honor to their ancestors. All people harbor this view. "May my children become the cream of the crop"—is this view right? Everyone wants their son or daughter to go to a prestigious university and then pursue further studies, in the belief that their child will be able to get ahead in the world once they have obtained an advanced degree. People all worship knowledge in their hearts and believe that "Other pursuits are small, books excel them all"; moreover, they think that competition in society nowadays is particularly fierce, and that if someone doesn't have an academic qualification, just trying to keep themselves fed will be difficult. This is a thought and view that every person harbors—it is as if, so long as somebody holds an advanced degree, their future livelihood and prospects will be secure. So, when it comes to their demands for their sons and daughters, people make entering into an institute of higher education and receiving a higher education the top priority. In reality, all of that education, all of that knowledge, and all of the ideas that people receive go against God and the truth, and are loathed and condemned by God. This proves that the views of man are wrong and absurd. People should understand that if they receive this kind of education, apart from acquiring a bit of useful intellectual knowledge, they will also be indoctrinated with many of Satan's poisons, thoughts, theories, and its various heresies and fallacies, and they should understand what the consequences of this will be. People have never thought about this before, and they cannot see through to this matter. All they believe is that their children will have brighter futures and bring honor to their ancestors if they enter institutes of higher education. As a result, when your child comes home one day, and you talk to them about believing in God, they will feel averse toward it, and when you fellowship on the truth with them, they will call you foolish, mock you, and treat your words with contempt. At that time, you will realize that you chose the wrong path when you sent your child to an institute of higher education to receive an advanced education. However, it will be too late for regrets. As soon as a person accepts Satan's philosophies and views, and these things take root, blossom, and begin to bear fruit within them, it is the same as growing cancerous tumors—these things cannot be removed or changed overnight. At that point, it becomes difficult for that person to accept the truth, and there is no way for them to be saved. It is equivalent to them being poisoned to death by Satan. I haven't seen anyone say: "When my child goes to school, let them simply learn to read, so that they can understand what the word of God means. After that, I'll guide them to believe in God wholeheartedly, and learn a bit about a useful profession so that they can secure a good job and make a stable life for themselves in the future. Then, I can rest assured. It would be better if they are of high caliber, possess good humanity, and can perform a duty in God's house. If they cannot fulfill a duty, it would be enough for them to have a job outside of the church so that they can support their family. Most of all, I want them to receive God's truths in His house and to not be polluted or conditioned by society." People do not have the faith to bring their children before God; they always worry that their children won't have good prospects if they don't enter into higher education. In other words, when it comes to their children, not a single person is willing to bring them before God so that they can accept God's word and conduct themselves according to the truth and God's requirements. People are unwilling to do this, and they do not dare to do this. They fear that if they act in this way, their children will not have a means of livelihood or prospects in this society. What does this view confirm? It confirms that people, who have been corrupted deeply by Satan, have no interest in the truth or in believing in God. Even if they do believe in God, it is only to be blessed. They do not pursue the truth, because in their hearts what people worship are material things, money, and Satan's influence. You do not have the faith to say: "If one abandons the trends of the world and relies on God, He will give them a way out so that they can survive." You lack this faith. Your misguided view of worshiping knowledge has taken root in your heart. It controls your every word and deed, so you cannot accept and submit to God's work, much less accept the truths that God expresses. Why do I say this? Because this thought and view is hostile toward God, it betrays God, denies God, and it is not compatible with the truth. When a person understands the truth, they can see through to this problem, and they realize that there are many things within themselves that are in opposition to God—things that are fundamentally loathed by God. These are all results achieved by experiencing God's work. Without the revelation of God's word, and without its judgment and chastisement, people would think that they had become holy, that they were full of love for God, and that their faith in Him was strong after believing in God for a few years, and making some changes to their behavior. Now that they understand the truth, they suddenly realize: "How can these corrupt things still exist in people? Why couldn't I recognize them before? People are just too ignorant!" At this time, they learn that God's revelation of man's corruption is so great and so necessary, and they know that if God did not reveal and judge their corruption, they would never be able to recognize it. People are all skilled at pretending and disguising themselves. They can disguise themselves quite well or conceal and package themselves up well, but the corrupt dispositions that they reveal and the thoughts that are deeply rooted in their minds resist God, and these things are loathed and hated by

God. These are the things that God wants to reveal, and they are the things that people should come to know. However, people often think, "In terms of our speech, we haven't spoken any words that resist God, and we possess reason. In terms of our behavior, we have not done anything out of line, we have already reached the point where we are performing our duties very appropriately. We have no glaring problems, so what more should we know about ourselves? Do we even need to know ourselves?" Does this view align with the facts? If it does, why do people still always confess their sins to God? Why do people still reveal their corrupt dispositions frequently and even commit transgressions? So, the more you consider yourself to be good in one respect, the more it is worth your while to seek the truth, reflect, and come to know yourself in that respect. Only through this can you truly come to know your corrupt dispositions, be purified, and be perfected by God. This is the outcome of experiencing God's work.

There are many people who believe that filial piety is pleasing to God and blessed by God. They think that being filial to one's parents is something that God surely likes, because they believe that filial piety is perfectly natural and justified, and that it proves that a person has conscience, and that they haven't forgotten where they come from. According to traditional notions, such individuals are considered good people and filial children. When it comes to filial children, everyone gives them a thumbs up. People love them, as do their parents. So, you naturally assume that God must also like them, and wishfully think that: "God must like those who show filial piety to their parents—He definitely likes them!" So, you give up performing your duty and return home to show filial piety to your parents. As you do so, you become more and more motivated, and you are increasingly convinced that this is justified and proper, and that you are practicing the truth. Unconsciously, you start to believe that you have already satisfied God, and that you have the capital needed to obtain God's approval, His delight, and His recognition. When God says that you are defying and betraying Him, or when He says that you haven't changed at all, you resist and pass judgment on Him. You deny His words by claiming that He is wrong. What kind of problem is this? When God says that you are good and approves of you, you accept it. But when God exposes that you are disobeying and defying Him, you deny and reject this, and even resist and judge God. What sort of disposition is this? It is evident that people are arrogant, conceited, and selfrighteous. Usually, it seems like people can acknowledge that God's word is the truth, and people all consider themselves to be obedient to God, but when God judges them and reveals their corrupt dispositions, none of them pay any attention to His words, and none of them compare their actions against His word each time that they do something. Rather, they merely speak and talk a bit, and that's the end of it, or they recite a few lines of God's word during gatherings, fellowshiping on them a little, and then they are done. In reality, when you do things, you do not practice according to God's word at all. So, what is the point of you reading and fellowshiping about God's word? You do not put God's word into practice when something happens to you, and you do not live by God's word, so why do you read God's word? Isn't this merely a formality? Can you understand the truth in this way? Can you obtain the truth? It is meaningless believing in God in this way. Many people simply read God's word a bit, gain an understanding of its literal meaning, and think that by uttering a few words and doctrines, they have understood the truth, and that they possess the truth reality. Some say, "I'm fellowshiping on God's word, so how can it just be the words and doctrines?" You do not know the essence of God's word, you do not put His word into practice, and you certainly do not have experiential knowledge of it, so you are speaking the words and doctrines when you fellowship on it. God's word is, of course, the truth, but you do not truly understand it or put it into practice, so what you understand is just doctrine. Can you understand this? Do you feel that hearing these words has touched on a sore spot? Will you say, "If I don't honor my parents is that not a terrible offense? Aren't God's requirements for people inconsiderate of their feelings?" Tell Me, are the standards that God requires of man high? In fact, they are not high—based on man's conscience and reason, they are all standards that people can meet. It is due to the influence of human affections and because traditional culture has already taken firm, unshakeable root in their hearts, that people feel that God's demands are too high, and really beyond their reach. This is caused by a lack of understanding of the truth. If you really understand the truth and see through to the true nature of this matter, you will be able to approach and handle this problem in the right way. For thousands of years, people have been influenced by traditional culture. Satan's philosophies and laws for self-conduct have already taken root in people's hearts. You live by such ideas, so what exactly have you lived out? Have you lived out normal humanity? Have you lived out a real life? It is worthwhile for you to come to know and dissect this matter. You need to reflect on what you have gained from traditional culture and Satan's philosophies and views, on whether these things are really the truth, and on what they bring to you. Then you should fellowship on these matters and analyze them based on God's word. If you do this, it will be easy for you to discover the truth. Once you understand the truth and grasp God's intentions, you will see that God's requirements for people are all things that man's conscience and reason can accomplish. Naturally, you will no longer complain that God demands too much of man. Instead, you will say, "We understand the principles; we have a path of practice, and we understand how to handle these things." In this way, little by little, you will enter into the reality of God's word. This is the process of understanding the truth.

In entering the truth reality, self-knowledge is extraordinarily important. Self-knowledge means knowing which things in our thoughts and views are fundamentally incompatible with the truth, and belong to a corrupt disposition, and are hostile to God. It is easy to gain an understanding of the corrupt dispositions of man, like arrogance, self-righteousness, lying, and deceit. You can come to know them a little by simply fellowshiping on the truth a few times or through frequent fellowship, or by having your state pointed out to you by your brothers and sisters. Furthermore, arrogance and deceit

are present in every person, differing only in degree, so they are relatively easy to know. But discerning whether one's thoughts and views are in line with the truth is difficult, and not as easy as knowing one's corrupt dispositions. When a person's behavior or outward practices change a little, that person feels as though they have changed, but actually this is a mere behavioral change, and it does not mean that their outlook on things has truly changed. In the depths of people's hearts, there are still many notions and imaginings, various thoughts, views, and poisons of traditional culture, and many things that are hostile to God. These things are hidden inside of them, yet to be unearthed. They are the origin of corrupt dispositions, and they come from within man's nature essence. That is why, when God does something that does not line up with your notions, you will resist Him and oppose Him. You will not understand why God has acted so, and though you know there is truth in everything God does and you wish to submit, you will find yourself unable to do so. Why are you unable to submit? What is the reason for your opposition and resistance? It is because there are many things within man's thoughts and views that are hostile to God, hostile to the principles by which God acts and hostile to His essence. These things are difficult for people to gain knowledge of. Since I've fellowshiped on these words, you should be able to gain insight and some understanding. Suppose you have notions about God when something happens and think, "This can't be God's doing, for if it were God then He wouldn't have done it like this, or spoken thus. Everything God does is love, and easy for people to accept," but then suppose you think, "This way of thinking is wrong. God has said before that there is truth to be sought wherever people cannot understand. I should reflect on myself, as it's the notions and imaginings in my heart which are playing up, leading me to define God's work. I shouldn't misunderstand Him"—this is the correct way to reflect on yourself. Whenever you see that God's work or words don't conform to your notions, that's when you should reflect on yourself, hurry to seek the truth in God's words, measure yourself against and then act in accordance with them. Is this not a way forward?

We've just fellowshiped on how to treat one's parents. Many of you feel you owe your parents a lot, as they've suffered much on your behalf throughout their lives, and shown you great love and care. If they one day fall ill, your conscience is disturbed, and you feel blamed. You suddenly think that you should stay with your parents to fulfill your filial duty to them, comfort them and ensure they're happy in their old age. You think this is your responsibility and obligation as their child. If, as you fulfill this obligation, God asks something of you or gives you an unexpected trial, His intention is that you should not do so, but should take belief in God, performing your duty well, and pursuing the truth as the principle. How would you feel if God asked you directly not to be filial to your parents or treat them in that way? You'd consider this matter through the lens of traditional notions, and complain about God in your heart, thinking that He did it without considering your feelings, and that it doesn't satisfy your filial piety. You believe that you're acting full of filial piety, humanity, and conscience, but God doesn't let you act according to your conscience or filial piety. Then you will resist, rebel against and oppose God, and not accept the truth. I'm saying all this to make people realize that the root and essence of man's rebellious nature comes primarily from people's thoughts and views, which are formed by the education they receive from family and society, as well as from traditional culture. After these things are deeply planted in people's hearts bit by bit, through family convention, or the influence of society and academic education, then people start to live by them. They'll unconsciously start to believe that this traditional culture is correct, irreproachable, and cannot be criticized, and that only by acting according to the demands of traditional culture can they be real people. If they don't, they'll feel they're devoid of conscience, contrary to and without any humanity, and they won't be able to come to terms with it. Are these human thoughts and views not far removed from the truth? The things in human thoughts and views, and the goals people pursue, are all directed toward the world, toward Satan. God's requirement for man to pursue the truth is directed toward God, toward the light. These are two different directions, two different goals. Act according to God's goals and requirements of man and your humanity will become more normal, you will have more of a human likeness, and you will get closer to God. If you act according to the thoughts and views of traditional culture, you will lose more and more of your conscience and reason, become even more false and fake, follow the trends of the world even more, and become part of the forces of evil. Then you will be living completely in darkness, under the power of Satan. You will have entirely violated the truth and betrayed God.

People who live in this real society have been deeply corrupted by Satan. Regardless of whether they're educated or not, a lot of traditional culture is ingrained in people's thoughts and views. In particular, women are required to attend to their husbands and raise their children, to be a good wife and loving mother, devoting their whole lives to their husbands and children and living for them, making sure the family has three square meals a day, and doing the washing, cleaning, and all other housework well. This is the accepted standard of being a good wife and loving mother. Every woman also thinks this is the way things should be done, and that if she doesn't then she's not a good woman, and has violated conscience and the standards of morality. Violating these moral standards will weigh heavily on some people's conscience; they'll feel they've let their husbands and children down, and that they're not a good woman. But after you believe in God, have read a lot of His words, understood some truths, and seen through some matters, you'll think, "I am a created being and should perform my duty as such, and expend myself for God." At this time, is there a conflict between being a good wife and loving mother, and fulfilling your duty as a created being? If you want to be a good wife and loving mother, then you cannot perform your duty full time, but if you want to perform your duty full time then you cannot be a good wife and loving mother. What do you do now? If you choose to perform your duty well and be responsible for the work of the church, devoted to God, then you must give up being a good wife and loving mother.

What would you think now? What sort of discord would arise in your mind? Would you feel like you've let down your children, your husband? Where does this feeling of guilt and unease come from? When you don't fulfill the duty of a created being, do you feel like you've let God down? You have no sense of guilt or blame because, in your heart and mind, there isn't the slightest hint of the truth. So, what do you understand? Traditional culture and being a good wife and loving mother. Thus the notion of "If I'm not a good wife and loving mother, then I'm not a good or decent woman" will arise in your mind. You'll be bound and fettered by this notion from then on, and will remain so by these kinds of notions even after you believe in God and fulfill your duty. When there is a conflict between fulfilling your duty and being a good wife and loving mother, while you may reluctantly choose to fulfill your duty, possessing perhaps a little loyalty to God, there'll still be a feeling of unease and blame in your heart. Therefore, when you have some spare time while fulfilling your duty, you'll look for chances to take care of your children and husband, wanting to make it up to them even more, and think it's fine even if you have to suffer more, as long as you have peace of mind. Is this not brought about by the influence of traditional culture's ideas and theories about being a good wife and loving mother? You now have a foot in both camps, wanting to fulfill your duty well but also wanting to be a good wife and loving mother. But before God, we only have one responsibility and obligation, one mission: to properly fulfill the duty of a created being. Have you fulfilled this duty well? Why did you stray off track again? Is there really no sense of blame or reproach in your heart? Because the truth has still not laid foundations in your heart, and does not yet reign over it, you can stray off track when fulfilling your duty. Although now you're able to fulfill your duty, you're actually still falling far short of the standards of truth and God's requirements. Can you see this fact clearly now? What does God mean when He says that "God is the source of man's life"? It is to make everyone realize this: Our lives and souls all come from God and were created by Himnot from our parents, and certainly not from nature, but given us by God. Only our flesh was born of our parents, as our children are born of us, but their fate is entirely in God's hands. That we can believe in God is an opportunity given by Him; it is ordained by Him and is His grace. There is therefore no need for you to fulfill your obligation or responsibility to anyone else; you should only fulfill your duty to God as a created being. This is what people must do above anything else, the main thing that should be done as the primary affair of one's life. If you do not fulfill your duty well, you are not a qualified created being. In the eyes of others, you may be a good wife and loving mother, an excellent housewife, a filial child, and an upstanding member of society, but before God you are one who rebels against Him, one who has not fulfilled their obligation or duty at all, one who accepted yet did not complete God's commission, one who gave up halfway. Can someone like this gain God's approval? People like this are worthless. No matter how perfect a wife and mother you are, or how high your standards of social morality, or how much praise you earn from others, it does not mean that you are putting the truth into practice, much less obeying God. If you are sick of the truth and refuse to accept it, this only proves that you have no conscience or reason, no normal humanity, and are someone without God in your heart at all. Is this sort of person not too far removed from God's requirements? Those who do not pursue the truth are like this, always living according to the ideas and theories of traditional culture, always following society's trends, but not accepting the truth and unable to obey God. Are these people not impoverished and pitiful? Are they not foolish and ignorant? Is being a good wife and loving mother, being a good, well-liked woman, worth boasting about and being proud of?

All the things that people hold in their hearts are actually at odds with the truth and hostile to God. That includes things we believe to be positive, good, and things generally regarded to be right. We even see these things as the truth, as human needs and things into which people should enter. To God, however, they are loathsome things. How far from the truths spoken by God are the views that man sees as correct, or the things that man believes to be positive? Far, indeed—the distance is immeasurable. So, we must know ourselves, and everything from the academic education we have received down to our pursuits and preferences, from our thoughts and views down to the paths we choose and walk, are all worthy of deep excavation and analysis. Some of them are inherited from one's family; some come from one's schooling; some come from the influence and conditioning of social environments; some are learned from books; and some come from our imaginings and notions. These are the most frightening things, for they dominate our minds, and govern the motives, intents, and goals of our actions. They also bind and control our words and actions. If we do not unearth these things and reject them, we will never fully accept God's words, and we will never unreservedly accept His requirements and put them into practice. As long as you harbor your own ideas and viewpoints, and things that you believe to be correct, you will never accept God's words unreservedly, nor will you practice them in their original form; you are certain to process God's words within your heart, and practice them only after having brought them into conformity with your notions. This is how you will act, and this is how you will "help" others, by leading them to do things according to your methods. You will seem to be putting God's words into practice, but what you practice will be human adulterations. You will not know this, and you will think that you are practicing the truth, that you have already entered the truth reality, that you have already gained the truth. Is that not arrogant and self-righteous? Is such a state not a fearsome thing? If people are not meticulous in practicing the truth, deviations will occur. If one always relies on their imaginings to put God's words into practice, then not only are they not practicing the truth, they also cannot achieve submission to God. If one means to enter the truth reality, they must reflect on which notions and imaginings exist in them, as well as which of their views are not in line with the truth. When analyzing these things, a word or two will not suffice to thoroughly explain them or to make them clear. Naturally, in life there are many other matters like these. Like the more than one hundred poisons of Satan that were collected in the past—you may have understood the words and phrases, but how have you measured yourself against them? Have you reflected on them? Do you not also have a share in these poisons? Do they not reflect how you think, too? When you are doing things, do you not also act based on these poisons? You must dig deep into your personal experience, and measure it against those words. If you merely read over the words of God that reveal Satan's poisons, just giving them a glance, or if you think simply about them, admitting that these things are indeed poisons, that they do indeed corrupt and harm people, and then put God's words aside, you will have no way to resolve your corrupt disposition. Many people read God's words and cannot link them to reality. They simply read the words and glance over the text, and so long as they understand its literal meaning, they believe that they have understood God's words, or even that they have understood the truth. Yet they never reflect on their corrupt dispositions, and when they know that they are revealing corruption, they do not seek the truth to resolve it. They are content merely to admit that all states revealed by the words of God are real and that they are outpourings of corrupt dispositions, and stop there. Can one who reads God's words like this truly know themselves? Can they cast off their corrupt disposition? Absolutely not. Most people who believe in God do so in this way, and as a result, they see no change in their disposition after ten or twenty years of belief. The root cause of this is that they do not put effort into God's words, and they cannot accept the truth and submit to it in their hearts. They merely observe rules in their practice and avoid committing great evil, and with that they think that they are practicing the truth. Is there not a deviation in their practice? Is practicing the truth as simple as that? People are living beings and they all have thoughts; in particular, people all have corrupt dispositions rooted deep in their hearts, and possess various thoughts and views that arose from the domination of their satanic nature. All these thoughts and views are outpourings of a satanic disposition. If people cannot analyze and know these things based on the truth of God's words, they have no way to know their corrupt essence, and their corrupt dispositions cannot be cleansed. Why are those who do not accept the truth so arrogant, self-righteous and recalcitrant? It is because they all have different thoughts and views on various things, and they all have some ideas and theories to guide them, so they feel themselves to be correct, look down on others, and are arrogant, self-righteous, and recalcitrant. No matter how others may fellowship about the truth to them, they are unwilling to accept it—they continue living according to the thoughts and views within them, because those have already become their life. The fact is that in everything you do, there is a thought or view inside you that dictates how you do it, and the direction in which you do it. If you are not aware of this, you should reflect on yourself often, then you will know what thoughts and views within you are controlling your acts and deeds. Of course, if you were to inspect your thoughts and views now, you would feel that there is nothing within them that is hostile to God, that you are honest and loyal, that you perform your duty willingly, that you can forsake things and expend yourself for God. You would feel that you are doing fine in all of these regards. But when God really gets serious with you, when He has you do something that does not accord with your notions, something you are unwilling to do, how will you approach it? That is when your thoughts, views, and corrupt dispositions will be exposed, just like the water that flows from an opened sluice—you cannot control it, as much as you would like to. This will keep you from practicing the truth and submitting to God. You will say, "Why can't I control myself? I don't want to resist God, so why am I? I don't want to pass judgment on God, and I don't want to have notions about His actions—so why am I judging Him? Why do I still have these notions?" At this time, you should reflect on and know yourself, and examine what is inside of you that resists God, or is hostile and contrary to the work He is currently doing. If you can examine these things and resolve them according to the truth in God's words, you will have life progress, and you will be someone who understands the truth.

China is governed by an atheist political party and Chinese people are educated in atheism and evolution, with popular sayings like "All things come from nature" and "Humans are descended from apes." After believing in God and reading His words, you know that the heavens and earth and all things were created by God, including humans, and everyone is able to feel in their hearts that God's word is true. All of nature is God's creation, and nothing would ever have come into being if God had not created them. Humans descending from apes is particularly untenable, as throughout all of human history no one has ever seen an ape become a man. There is no evidence, and thus all this is Satan's lies and deception. Those who understand the truth reject Satan's lies, heresies, and fallacies, and believe the Bible and God's words without the shadow of a doubt. But it is impossible for those who do not love the truth to fully accept that God's words are the truth. Some might wonder, "Man was created by God, but how? Why haven't I seen it? I don't believe what I haven't seen." Their belief in God is based on what they can see with their own eyes. This is not having faith. Man came from God, and God has led man step by step until now, always with dominion over man's fate. This is a fact. In the last days, God has made known all these mysteries, saying that man has reincarnation and transmigration, and that human life and soul are given by God and come from Him. This is the truth. But whenever you see this aspect of truth, because you don't accept these words of God to be the truth, you measure them against your own thoughts and views: "Since man didn't come from apes, but from God, then how did man come from God? How did He give man life?" If you do not understand God then you'll think it impossible that God has the power, wisdom or authority to create man with but a single breath or word. You don't believe that this is a fact, or that it's the truth. When you have doubts, you resist these words of God, saying you don't believe them, but in fact your heart is in a state of resistance and an attitude of opposition. You are unwilling to listen when God speaks these words, feel hostility in your heart, and cannot Amen God's words. In reality, looking at the facts, we don't need to investigate how or when God made man, who saw it, or if anyone can testify to it. There is no need for people to study this. When people genuinely understand the truth and know God's deeds, they'll be able to bear witness themselves. What is the key issue they should focus on now? It is to know God's work. God has, from beginning to end, been performing His work of managing man and saving man among mankind. From beginning to end, there is only one God working, speaking, teaching and guiding mankind. This God exists. God has spoken so many words now, we have already seen Him face to face, heard Him speak, experienced His work, and eaten and drunk His words, accepting His words into us to become our life. And these words are constantly guiding us and changing us. This God indeed exists. Therefore, we should believe, as God said, the fact that God created mankind, and the fact that God created Adam and Eve in the beginning. Since you believe this God exists and you have now come before Him, then do you still need to confirm that the work performed by Jehovah is the work of this God? If no one can confirm it and no one witnesses it, will you not believe it? Or regarding the work from the Age of Grace, do you not believe Jesus was God incarnate because you never saw Him? If you did not personally see the present God speak, work or incarnated in the flesh, then would you not believe it? If you did not see these things or there were no witnesses to confirm these things, would you not believe them all? This is because of the absurdly false viewpoint people have inside them. It is a mistake made by so many people. They have to personally see everything, and if they do not, they do not believe it. This is wrong. If a person truly knows God, is able to believe in His word even without seeing the facts, and is able to corroborate His word, only then are they the type of person who understands the truth and has true faith. Now that we have seen these words of God and heard His voice, it is enough to grant us true faith and to therefore make us follow Him and to make us believe every word and all the work that comes from God. There is no need for us to keep analyzing or researching things. Is that not the kind of sense that people should have? There was no one to witness it when God created mankind, but now God has become flesh to express truths and save mankind, to perform His work practically, and to walk among the churches and work among mankind. Have a lot of people not seen this? Not everyone is able to see it, but you believe it. Why do you believe it? Do you not only believe because you feel the words of God are the truth and that this is the true way and the work of God? Can you still say, "In this stage of God's work, I heard Him speak, and I also saw God's words. It's true that these words came from God. But regarding the Lord Jesus' work of the crucifixion, I didn't touch His nail marks, so I don't believe the fact that He was crucified. I did not witness the work Jehovah God did during the Age of Law, and I did not hear the laws when He proclaimed them. Only Moses heard them and wrote the Five Books of Moses, but I don't know how he wrote them"? Are people that say these things in a normal state of mind? They are nonbelievers and not people who truly believe in God. This is just like when the Israelites said, "Has Jehovah indeed spoken only by Moses? Has He not spoken also by us?"

(Numbers 12:2). What they meant was, "We won't listen to Moses, we must hear it personally from Jehovah God." Just like when people said during the Age of Grace that, because they did not personally see it with their own eyes, they did not believe that Jesus was crucified or that He rose from the dead. There was a disciple by the name of Thomas who insisted on touching Jesus' nail marks. And what did the Lord Jesus say to him? ("Thomas, because you have seen Me, you have believed: blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed" (John 20:29).) "Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed." What does this really mean? Did they really see nothing? Actually, all the things Jesus had said and all of the work He did already proved that Jesus was God, and so people should have believed it. Jesus did not need to perform more signs and wonders or speak more words, and people did not need to feel His nail marks to believe. True faith does not rely only on seeing, but rather, with spiritual confirmation, belief is held until the very end and there is never any doubt. Thomas was a nonbeliever who only relied on seeing. Do not be like Thomas.

A portion of people like Thomas do indeed exist in the church. They are constantly doubting God's incarnation, and they wait for God to leave the earth, return to the third heaven, and to see the real person of God to finally believe. They do not believe in Him because of the words He has spoken during His incarnation. By the time this kind of person believes, everything will be too late, and that's the time they will be condemned by God. The Lord Jesus said, "Thomas, because you have seen Me, you have believed: blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed." These words mean that he had already been condemned by the Lord Jesus and that he is a nonbeliever. If you truly believe in the Lord and in all He has said, you will be blessed. If you have followed the Lord for a long time but do not believe in His capacity for resurrection, or that He is the almighty God, then you do not have true faith and you will not be able to attain blessings. Only through faith can blessings be attained, and if you don't believe, you will not attain them. Are you only capable of believing in anything if God appears to you, allows you to see Him, and convinces you in person? As a human being, how are you qualified to ask God to personally appear to you? How are you qualified to make Him personally speak to a corrupt human such as yourself? Moreover, what makes you qualified to need Him to explain everything clearly to you before you will believe? If you are sensible, then you will believe after just reading these words God has uttered. If you truly believe, then it does not matter what He does or what He says. Rather, upon seeing that these words are the truth, you will be one hundred percent convinced that they were said by God and that He did these things, and you will already be prepared to follow Him to the end. You need not doubt this. People who are full of doubts are so deceitful. They simply cannot believe in God. They are always trying to understand those mysteries, and will only believe after they thoroughly comprehend them. Their precondition for believing in God is to have clear answers to these questions: How did God become flesh? When did He arrive? How long will He stay before He has to leave? Where will He go after He leaves?

What is the process of His leaving? How does God incarnate work, and how does He leave? ... They want to understand some mysteries; they are here to investigate them, not to seek the truth. They think that they will not be able to believe in God unless they can fathom these mysteries; it is as though their belief has been obstructed. This viewpoint such people have is problematic. Once they have a desire to research mysteries, they do not bother paying attention to the truth or heeding God's words. Could such people know themselves? Self-knowledge does not come easily for them. This isn't to condemn a certain kind of person. If someone doesn't accept the truth and doesn't believe in God's words, then they don't have true faith. They'll just focus on splitting hairs over some words, mysteries, trivial things, or problems people hadn't noticed. But it's also possible that one day God will enlighten them, or their brothers and sisters will help them by regularly fellowshiping on the truth, and they will turn around. The day this happens, they'll feel that their former views were too absurd, that they were too arrogant and thought far too highly of themselves, and they'll be ashamed. Those with genuine faith will trust whatever God says without any doubts and, when they have some experience and see that God's words are all fulfilled and accomplished, their faith will grow even stronger. This type of person is one who has spiritual understanding, who believes in and can accept the truth, and who truly has faith.

Only With True Obedience Can One Have Real Trust

What is faith in God? This is the most practical question, as well as the most basic truth that a believer must understand. Is faith in God a kind of conviction, or is it a direction and goal in a person's life? In your heart, what is the ultimate purpose of faith? Why do you want to have faith in God? That is, what is your belief? What is the basis and foundation of your faith in God? What is your motivation? In other words, what intention and purpose do you have in believing in God? What is it ultimately for? These are the most practical questions. You can say that people believe in and accept God for the purpose of gaining blessings. People believe in God in order to have something upon which to pin their hopes, long for, and pursue in the realm of thought and spirit. This is the original intention behind all people's faith in God. However, after people come to believe in God, after they come into contact with God's words, the truth, God's work, and all the various people, events and things under God's sovereignty, unconsciously, their views on faith change. Once they understand the truth to a certain extent, they come to realize that faith in God allows them to gain the truth, that faith is what is most significant, that faith can indeed change people in many respects and ultimately solve the problem of human corruption. To have faith in God, you must first figure out the following questions: Why do people believe in God? What is the purpose of believing in God? What is the motivation to believe in God? What is the initial desire and aspiration in believing in God? How much thought have you given to these questions? Do you have the correct answers? (At first, I believed in God out of a desire to gain blessings. Upon experiencing some judgment and chastisement from God's words, I saw that I only pursued blessings, that I really had no conscience or sense, and was too selfish. I felt that I had been profoundly corrupted by Satan, and so I longed to be someone possessing conscience and sense, someone who could assume the proper place of a created being and follow God. Currently, I only possess this little bit of knowledge.) When people start believing in God, they always want to gain grace, to gain blessings and benefits, to satisfy various wants and desires of the spirit and the flesh. Since the beginning of their faith when they pursued such things, they have suffered much, and now they understand that the significance of faith goes beyond these things. The significance of faith is too profound and too practical, and the benefits they receive are too many to be summed up in a few words. To have faith in God, one must first solve the problems of man's corrupt disposition and sin, as well as achieve obedience to and knowledge of God. Only in this way can one truly cast off one's corrupt disposition and escape from Satan's influence so as to turn completely to God. The purpose of believing in God and following God is to gain from God the truth and life, ultimately becoming a person who conforms to God's will and is able to obey and worship God. This is the true meaning of faith. Looking at people's understanding of faith, we can see that their views, intentions, and motivations as to their faith have undergone a great change. What brought about this change? (It is the result of God's expression of the truth and all the work He has done on people.) That is right. This change is not the result of the mere passage of time, nor is it imposed on you by anyone, nor is it the result of the influence or contagion of any religious teachings, much less did the goodness of your heart move Heaven to change you into a better, more human-like person. These are all human notions and imaginings. In fact, the most practical benefit gained is that, guided by God's words, watered and shepherded by God's words, people come to understand the truth and understand God's will, can clearly see the darkness and evil among men, and their ideas and views are greatly changed. What brings about these changes? They are the result of the gradual and piecemeal experience of God's work and God's words. So then, what do these changes involve? They involve the greatest matter of faith—the matter of salvation. This is the ultimate significance of man's faith. In fact, people do not demand much of faith. Their aim is simply to gain grace and seek peace. Then, this changes to a desire to be good people rather than bad people, and finally, they just want to receive a good destination. However, herein lies the biggest question: What effect does God actually want to achieve in His work of judgment and purification and His salvation of man? This is what people should understand. In God's work to save man, what does He use to accomplish this salvation? He uses their understanding of the truth and His words, and then their experience of judgment and chastisement, trials and refinements, freeing them from sin and Satan's influence. When all is said and done, what is the ultimate significance of people's faith? Simply put, it is in order to be saved. And what is the significance of salvation? I want you all to think it over and tell Me what it really means to be saved. (It means that we can break free from Satan's dark influence, turn completely to God, and ultimately, survive.) (People who live under the power of Satan deserve death, but people who are saved by experiencing God's work will not die.) You all understand this and can explain it at the level of doctrine, but you simply don't know what it really is to be saved. Is being saved casting off your corrupt disposition? Does being saved mean not lying, being an honest person and ceasing to rebel against God? What is it actually like to be saved? In plain terms, being saved means that you will be able to live on, that you have been brought back to life. You were once living in sin, and bound for death—as God sees it, you were a dead person. What is the basis for saying this? Under whose power do people live before they have attained salvation? (Under the power of Satan.) And what do people rely on to live under Satan's power? They rely on their satanic nature and corrupt dispositions to live. Then is their whole being—their flesh, and all other aspects such as their spirits and their thoughts—alive or dead? From God's point of view, they are dead, they are walking corpses. On the surface, you appear to be breathing and thinking, but everything you are constantly thinking about is evil, in defiance of God and in rebellion against God, all of your thoughts are of things that God detests, hates, and condemns. In God's eyes, all these things not only belong to the flesh, but they entirely belong to Satan and to devils. So, in God's eyes, is corrupt mankind even human? No, they are beasts, devils and Satan; they are Satan alive! All people live by Satan's nature and its disposition, and as God sees it, they are Satan alive and garbed in human flesh, devils in human skin. God characterizes such people as walking corpses, as the dead. God is now doing the work of salvation, which means He will take the walking corpses that live by Satan's corrupt disposition and its corrupt essence—the dead—and turn them into living people. That is the significance of being saved. One believes in God in order to be saved—what is it to be saved? When one attains God's salvation, they are the dead become living. Where once they belonged to Satan, slated to die, they have now come to life as people belonging to God. If people can obey God, know Him, and bow down to Him in worship when they believe in and follow God, if they have no more resistance and rebelliousness against God in their hearts, and will no longer resist or attack Him, and can truly submit to Him, then in God's eyes, they are true living people. Is one who merely acknowledges God in word a living person? (No.) What sort of person is a living person, then? What are the realities of living people? What must living people be possessed of? Tell Me your opinions. (People who can accept the truth are living persons. When people's ideological views and views concerning things change and align with the word of God, they are living people.) (Living people are those who understand the truth and can practice the truth.) (A person who fears God and shuns evil like Job is a living person.) (People who know God, can live according to God's words, and can live out the truth reality—those are living people.) You have all spoken of one sort of manifestation. For someone ultimately to be saved and become a living person, they must at least be able to heed God's words, and able to speak words of conscience and sense, and they must be thinking and discerning, able to understand the truth and to practice it, able to submit to God and worship Him. That is what a true living person is. What do living people often think about and do? They can do a bit of what normal people ought to do. Mainly, they perform their duties well, and they fear God and shun evil in what they think of and pour forth, what they say and do on a regular basis. That is the nature of what they often think and do. To put it a bit more precisely, what they say and do by and large accords with the truth, at the least. It is not condemned by God or detested and rejected by Him, but acknowledged and approved of by Him. This is what living people do, and it is what they ought to do. If you merely acknowledge God with your mouth and believe in your heart, can you achieve God's approval and salvation? (No.) Why can't you? Some people say, "I believe there is a God," "I believe in God's sovereignty over all things and the fate of mankind," "I believe that everything about me is in God's hands, that I have been led by God for the better part of my life, and that God can likewise lead me on my future path," and "I believe that God can change my destiny." Does having such "faith" mean they are saved? (No.) So what kind of faith means people are truly saved? (Faith that allows them to fear God and shun evil like Job.) How can people come to possess such genuine faith? Verbal acknowledgment and believing in their hearts: Can belief such as this produce a heart that fears God and shuns evil? Does believing like this mean that people have knowledge of God? Can it allow people to achieve obedience to God? Can it achieve salvation? What else is missing here? These questions must be pondered and understood.

Is there any difference between belief, conviction, and genuine faith? (Yes.) There are certainly differences, and you have to figure out what the precise differences are. If you can't distinguish these things, you may feel that you have genuine faith in God when you only have a vague belief or a conviction. How can vague conviction substitute for your genuine faith in God? In fact, instead of having real trust, you have put your own convictions and beliefs in its place. If your faith in God is nothing more than a belief or a conviction, then you can never truly come before God, and God does not approve of such faith as yours. What are the differences between belief, conviction, and genuine faith? Belief and conviction are not easy to explain clearly, so let's talk about genuine faith first. What is genuine faith in God? (Believing that all events and all things are under the sovereignty of God.) Is this genuine faith or a belief? (A belief.) (Genuine faith is established on a foundation of knowledge of God. Only when people know God can they possess genuine faith.) This understanding is only marginally correct. How can people come to possess genuine faith? What are the manifestations of genuine faith? If people have genuine faith, will they misunderstand or complain about God? Will they give any opposition to God? (No.) If people have genuine faith, will they rebel against God? Can people satisfy God when they try to do good and be good people based on their own notions and imaginings? (No.) Putting these three concepts of belief, conviction, and genuine faith to one side, let's fellowship on one matter first. What did Peter famously do before he was saved and perfected? (Denied the Lord three times.) What else did Peter do before denying the Lord three times? When the Lord Jesus said that He would be crucified, what did Peter say? ("Be it far from You, Lord: this shall not be to You" (Matthew 16:22).) Was it genuine faith that caused Peter to say this? (No.) Then what was it? It was man's good intentions, and it was a disruption of God's work. Where did Peter get this sort of good intention? (From human will.) Why did he entertain such human will? He didn't understand God's will, he didn't understand what the Lord Jesus' ministry was, and he didn't have a true understanding of the Lord Jesus. He merely followed the Lord out of admiration. He worshiped the Lord in his heart, so he wanted to love and protect the Lord. He thought, "This thing must never befall You. You can't suffer that pain! If suffering is wanted, I will suffer. I will suffer in Your place." He didn't know God's will, and he had something of the good intentions that come from human will and wanted to prevent the thing from happening. So what caused him to act in this way? In one respect, it was due to hotheadedness, human will, and a failure to understand. In another respect, he did not understand the work of God. Did he do this out of real trust? (No.) So why did he come to have such good intentions? Are such good intentions in line with the truth? Do they constitute good deeds? Although he sought to do good and acted from good intentions and sincerity, what was the nature of his actions? Were they behaviors and actions arising out of genuine faith? (No.) Now it is clear, the answer is absolutely not. So is this a belief? (Yes.) Let's use this to talk about what belief is. Belief is a kind of good longing and good desire that is most closely aligned with human notions and imaginings. It is something mankind generally considers to be good, right, and positive. A kind of good thought, a sort of good idea, good practice, and good motivation that is completely in line with human notions and sentiments. It is what humans long for. This is belief. Belief is not genuine faith. It comes entirely from human will and does not conform to the standards required by God, so belief is not real trust. Peter was indeed a good man. He possessed a good humanity, and he was simple, honest, passionate, and earnest in his pursuit. In his heart, he harbored no doubts as to the identity of the Lord Jesus. Thus, from the bottom of his heart, he could utter these words: "Be it far from You, Lord: this shall not be to You." That he could say such a thing shows his humanity and personality. Although this is a kind of desire, a kind of good intention, and it is only a kind of behavior, practice, and display arising from a kind of belief, we can see that Peter has a kind humanity. He held positive and right beliefs, but unfortunately, because he was too small of stature, knew too little about God, didn't know God's management plan, didn't know the work God intended to do, and didn't understand God's will, he did a foolish thing that was completely based on human will and disrupted God's work. It was a human action caused by belief, and was obviously not genuine faith. If someone holds such beliefs, which produce good behaviors and cause them to have some good intentions, will God remember the things they do? God does not remember these things, so they are done in vain! Instead, God said this: "Get you behind Me, Satan" (Matthew 16:23). Ponder this over. Why did the Lord Jesus speak words people find so inconsiderate? Why didn't the Lord Jesus show understanding when He saw Peter's good intentions? What was God's attitude toward this matter? Did God approve of this good intention of Peter's? (No.) God examined Peter's heart and saw that he had no evil intentions, so He didn't need to expose the essence of this matter. Is that okay? (No.) Why? What does God think when people's intentions, beliefs, and thoughts are good, but do not align with God's will? God says that such things come from Satan and are a resistance to God. This is what God believes. Is such thinking at odds with human ways of thinking? (Yes.) Acting from human affection, what would an average person do in response to Peter? They would allow Peter to save face and give him leeway, thinking in their heart, "Peter's intentions are good and he wants to protect You. To reproach Peter in this way seems inconsiderate!" But God's acts do not conform to human notions. What is the nature of the words spoken by God? In one respect, they are an exposure, in another, they are a condemnation, and in a third, they are a judgment. How did Peter feel upon hearing these words? He was chastised, and it was as if a knife was twisted into his heart. He felt terrible and did not understand, thinking to himself: "Oh God, I sincerely love You! I believe in You so much, love You so dearly, and want to protect You so much, but why do You treat me like this? You say that I am Satan and order me to stand behind You. Am I Satan? Aren't I someone who sincerely follows You, so how can You see me as Satan? More than that, You are so inconsiderate, telling me to get behind You. It is too hurtful, too painful!" From God handling and treating such things in this way, can you see God's attitude toward human belief? (Condemn, judge, and expose.) That is right. God not only dislikes such things, but hates them and, most seriously, condemns such things. From these things God has revealed, have you seen God's disposition? (God's disposition is righteous.) This is certainly so. And what else? For God, although tolerance, mercy, patience, and lovingkindness are very beneficial to people, although they are the parts of what God has and is that people find easier to accept, and although they are things God always reveals and bestows on people, once people offend God's disposition and violate His principles, how will God deal with them? God condemns them! God does not make ambiguous statements to people, saying, "People did this with good intentions and no ulterior motives, so I will spare them this time." Unlike man, God permits no middle way and allows no adulteration with human will. One is one, two is two. Right is right, and wrong is wrong. For God, there are no ambiguities. By dissecting what Peter said to the Lord Jesus, "Be it far from You, Lord: this shall not be to You," people can see what belief is. Can people who hold beliefs satisfy God? Can beliefs produce genuine faith? Can they replace people's genuine faith in God? (No.) No, that is absolutely true.

What are beliefs in the end? They are a kind of imagining and notion, good desires, good goals, and lofty ideals that people establish. After these things are established, people run in this direction, pursuing and attaining them by relying on human good intentions, human effort, human will to suffer, or more human good deeds. What is lacking here? Why is it that people who hold beliefs cannot satisfy God? (Based on their beliefs, people disrupt and disturb God's work.) This is one obvious aspect. In addition, when people do things based on their beliefs, is there any truth in what they do? (No.) Let's dissect what Peter did. Peter said, "Be it far from You, Lord: this shall not be to You." Is there truth in these words? (No.) What does he mean by saying "this shall not be to You"? Why cannot this be to God? Could it be that all of this is not under God's sovereignty? Does God not have the final say in all this? If God allows it to be, it will be. If God does not allow it to be, won't it be avoided? Could Peter's words, "this shall not be to You," be able to change all of this? Who determined the occurrence, progression, and outcome of this whole matter? (It was determined by God.) So then, what are these words spoken by Peter? They are foolish words, words spoken in ignorance, words spoken on behalf of Satan. This is the consequence brought about by human beliefs. Is this a serious problem? (It is serious.) How serious is it? (It is resistance to God and acting as an outlet of Satan.) Correct. It is acting as Satan's outlet, which means resisting God and tearing down God's work on behalf of Satan. If, in the matter, the Lord Jesus did as Peter said, wouldn't His work of redeeming mankind be ruined? What is the nature of these words spoken by Peter? (They disrupt God's work.) This is why God mercilessly spoke those angry words—"Get you behind Me, Satan!" These words are a condemnation as well as a judgment. In them, lies God's disposition! When people hold such beliefs, beliefs admixed with good intentions, human desires, beautiful human wishes, and all those things that humans hold to be positive, right, and good, does God approve of this? (No.) People see all these things as good, so why doesn't God give His approval? In one respect, it is because people do not have true knowledge of God. This is the general cause. In addition, from a practical point of view, people do not truly submit to the words spoken by God and the acts performed by Him, nor do they truly comprehend these things. On the basis of human thinking, they always want God to not do this or not do that. They always think, "It's not really good for God to act like this. Acting like this is not what we would expect, it's not very considerate to people." When people encounter such things, they often develop notions, are full of man-made imaginings, and resort to all sorts of human ways of doing things. Here, there is no obedience, no true knowledge, no true fear of God, only a disruption and tearing down of God's work. It lacks any element of genuine faith. Therefore, Peter was judged after he spoke those words. Did he gain anything after receiving judgment? (He was able to understand a bit more about himself and about God's disposition.) Is such judgment a good or bad thing? At the very least, it was a hard knock on his head that made him stop and think, "Lord, am I Satan? I truly believe in You, I am one who loves You, I am Your faithful follower! How can I be Satan?" Pondering it over again, he thought, "The Lord Jesus rebuked me with such clear and plain words. He told me to get behind Him and rebuked me as Satan. This means that, in this matter, I acted in Satan's stead! What sort of person can act on behalf of Satan? A person who is not compatible with God. Anytime and anywhere, such a person can resist and betray God, can tear down God's work, and can disturb and wreck God's work, becoming the enemy of God. This is awful! In that case, I will hurriedly retreat behind God and shut my mouth." Doesn't this show that Peter slowly came to his senses, gained understanding, and realized the seriousness of the problem? He realized that man is always man and God is always God, and between man and God, there is a distance. When man acts on the basis of good intentions, God sees this as a disruption and disturbance. By gradually proceeding in this way, does God's judgment on man turn out to be a good thing? (Yes.) So is it a bad thing for a person to reveal a bit of foolishness? Looked at like this, it is not a bad thing, but a good thing. Why do we say it turns out to be a good thing? (People benefit from it.) Right, people gain some benefits. How do these benefits come about? When you are subject to God's judgment and you submit to it, examine yourself, and accept everything that comes from God—all of God's expressions, God's revelations, and everything God requires of you—and it becomes your reality and becomes your life, then without even knowing it, your corruption will be cleansed away. So is being judged a bad thing or a good thing? (A good thing.) Are you willing to receive judgment? (We are willing.) So would it be okay if you were judged every day? This would not allow you to eat, sleep, or rest as normal. When something happened, God would tell you to step back. When He had the time, He would judge you. Would that be fine? Could you stand this? People would not be able to stand this, and God would not do such a thing. God earnestly wants you to grow and mature quickly. That is why there are many steps in God's judgment. Sometimes He may become angry, and then offer you some comfort. Sometimes He may strike you, and then offer you mercy. Although God often becomes angry, there are intervals between His anger that give people time to catch their breath. Only when God directly judges and condemns people in this way will it help their growth in life. It is worth a bit of suffering to gain the truth.

People who only hold beliefs are far from being able to satisfy God's will, and beliefs are far from an adequate substitute for genuine faith in God. If they have faith in God based on a belief, people can never truly come before God, let alone truly obey Him and possess a God-fearing heart. Why is this? People's beliefs have nothing to do with the truth, and are far from meeting God's requirements. When people have beliefs, this does not mean that they understand the truth. With faith in God based on belief, people will never understand God's work, and can only disrupt and disturb it. Faith based on belief does not mean that people will be mindful of God's will, much less obey God. So then, what happened next to Peter? Before the Lord Jesus was crucified, He said this to Peter: "Truly I say to you, That this night, before the cock crow, you shall deny Me thrice"

(Matthew 26:34). What did Peter say in response? ("Though I should die with You, yet will I not deny You" (Matthew 26:35).) This upset Peter, and he denied he would do as the Lord said, but in the end, the facts bore out the words of the Lord Jesus. Was Peter's trust at that time greater or lesser than yours? (Greater, he cut off the ear of the high priest's servant in order to protect the Lord.) That was due to hotheadedness. His knowledge of the Lord Jesus and acknowledgment of His identity represent the degree of Peter's faith in the Lord Jesus. This allowed him to fight desperately for the Lord Jesus, saying, "Whoever touches my Lord, I will risk my life to fight!" His faith had reached this level, but is it man's hotheadedness that God wants? Certainly not. Peter's faith reached the level where he would lay down his life for the Lord, but then why did Peter still deny the Lord three times? Was it because he was destined to do this by the prophecy of the Lord Jesus? (No.) So what was the reason? Why was he so cowardly? He could risk his life fighting others for the Lord Jesus and cut off someone's ear. Out of his love for the Lord Jesus, he was able to speak those words from the bottom of his heart and act on them, which showed his exceptional sincerity. So, when the time came, why didn't he dare to acknowledge the Lord? (Because he knew the consequences. If the Roman soldiers had caught him then, he would have been put to death. He was afraid of being caught and likewise afraid of death.) The main reason was his desire to save his life. It is true that Peter held beliefs, but did he have the elements of genuine faith? At that time, Peter had already realized that the Lord Jesus was the Christ, the Son of the living God, and God Himself. He had such genuine faith, so why was he still so cowardly? (He lacked that stature.) He cherished his life and feared death, suffering, and physical torture. No matter what the reason was, in the end, he still denied the Lord three times. It was just as the Lord Jesus said, "This night, before the cock crow, you shall deny Me thrice." These words were indeed fulfilled in Peter. Why was the Lord Jesus able to say such things and come to such conclusions about Peter? (God sees the things deep within people's hearts.) What did God see in Peter's heart? (Peter's stature and his faith in God.) The Lord Jesus saw Peter's stature and the extent of his trust. With such a small stature, is it such a surprise that he denied the Lord three times? Due to his stature, it is inevitable that he would act as he did given the situation. Why did he only have that little bit of trust at the time? (At the time, Peter had followed the Lord Jesus for about three years, so he had experienced too little of God's work.) After three years of following the Lord Jesus, his trust could only be so great. That was his stature at the time. His growth in stature was achieved through the continuous deepening of experience.

Is it okay to follow God without real trust? What does it actually mean for people to have genuine faith in God? To put this in the simplest possible terms: It is the extent of your trust in all of God's words and work and the extent to which you can truly believe. Specifically, it is the extent to which, in your heart, you can believe and acknowledge the ultimate fulfillment and means of fulfillment of the words spoken by God, the things that

God has ordained, God's sovereignty, the orchestrations and arrangements of God, how God arranges the future destinations of people, and all other such things as well as the extent to which you have real trust in these things. At that time, Peter didn't even dare to acknowledge the name of the Lord Jesus, or to acknowledge his relation to the Lord Jesus. He had only a little trust, and this little trust indicated his actual stature. What was his actual stature? (He only acknowledged the Lord Jesus to be the Christ, but he knew little of God.) He had such a small stature and could go no further than this. So as for you, to what degree do you currently have faith in God? Is your faith stronger than Peter's? Is it weaker? Is it about the same? (It's the same in terms of recognizing Christ. We understand a little more of the truth than Peter, but we have yet to enter into many of these truths.) If people's faith in God stops at merely acknowledging that He is God, acknowledging that God can orchestrate and arrange everything, and that He has sovereignty over all things, over your destiny, and over your life—if you only acknowledge this, but have few of the elements of believing, even less, almost none, of the elements of obedience, and none at all of the elements of waiting for and seeking God—what sort of faith is this? You always say that you believe in God, you believe that God is sovereign over all and orchestrates everything, that people's lives are given to them by God, and that you will do whatever God asks of you, even laying down your life for God. But then you encounter a situation like that Peter experienced, where people ask, "Is that your God?" You will ponder the matter over, thinking, "There are nonbelievers all around, won't I be arrested if I acknowledge Him? God has said that we can use wisdom at critical times and refrain from acknowledging Him, so I will use wisdom, and God will not hold it against me." If you cherish your life and are cowardly, you will dare not acknowledge God, and may even deny God. At such a time, where is the trust by which you believe that God is sovereign over all things? (It doesn't exist.) Was the trust you thought you had during ordinary times real or false? (False.) When something happens that especially violates your notions or tastes and God's will in the matter has yet to be fully revealed, God requires you to obey in the matter. He has arranged this environment so that you can learn a lesson. So what do you do? For example, say you have especially strong faith and are especially pious and sincere, but God arranges an environment that does not fit your notions, treating you as if you were an unbeliever. Feeling wronged, tears will fill your eyes and you will complain to God, saying in your heart: "Oh God, I believe in You, I live for You, yet You arranged for me such an environment as this, placing me among the unbelievers and mixing me with unclean spirits. Won't I become polluted by this? I am set apart as a holy person, a person who belongs to God. You shouldn't have arranged this. Do You know how much I miss You, how much I love You? I cannot be apart from You. You can't treat me like this, it's not fair to me!" What about this? When you encounter things that do not conform to your notions, where is your obedience? (It doesn't exist.) What do you replace obedience with? (Complaints, misunderstandings, and resistance.) Is this real trust?

What should genuine faith possess? How does it show itself? (Seeking God's will and obeying God.) A single incident reveals whether someone has real trust.

Let us fellowship about one matter that is most at odds with human notions. Moses lived in the wilderness for forty years. Forty years is most of a person's life. If someone lives to be eighty, forty years is half their life. What kind of living environment is the wilderness? Not only was the wilderness an extremely poor environment in which to live with many difficulties that Moses had to face, but the more important problem was that he had no contact with the Israelites during these forty years, and God did not appear to him either. God arranged this environment for Moses in order to refine him. Does this accord with human notions? If people lack genuine faith, how will this generally show itself? In the first two years, they will still have some strength in their hearts and think, "God is testing me, but I am not afraid. I have God! As long as God doesn't let me die, I can live as long as I have even one breath left. I live by God. I have trust. I must satisfy God!" They have this bit of determination because they still have sheep as companions. However, after a few years pass, the sheep grow fewer and a howling wind blows throughout the day. In the stillness of night, people will feel alone. They have no one with whom to share what is in their hearts. When they raise their eyes to the sky, all they see are stars and the moon. They feel even more lonely on cloudy and rainy nights when even the moon is hidden from view. Unconsciously, their trust gradually grows cold. When their trust becomes cold, a heart full of complaints and misunderstandings shows itself. Right after that, their internal state becomes increasingly depressed and life gradually becomes meaningless. Constantly, they feel that God takes no notice of them and has abandoned them. They draw a question mark on the existence of God, and their trust shrinks smaller and smaller. If you lack genuine faith, you will not stand the test of time or the test of the environment. If you cannot stand the test God gives you, God will not speak to you or appear to you. God wants to see whether you believe in His existence, whether you acknowledge His existence, and whether you have genuine faith in your heart. This is how God looks deep in people's hearts. Are the people living between heaven and earth in the hands of God? They are all in God's hands. This is exactly how it is. It doesn't matter if you're in the wilderness or on the moon, you're in the hands of God. That's the way it is. If God has not appeared to you, how can you see the existence and sovereignty of God? How can you allow the truth that "God exists and is sovereign over all things" to take root in your heart and never fade away? How can you make this statement your life, the driving force of your life, and the trust and strength that allows you to keep on living? (Pray.) That is practical. That is the path of practice. When you are at your most difficult time, when you are least able to feel God, when you feel most painful and lonely, when you feel as if you are far from God, what is the one thing you should do above all else? Call out to God. Calling out to God gives you strength. Calling out to God lets you feel His existence. Calling out to God lets you feel God's sovereignty. When you call out to God, pray to God, and put your life in God's hands, you will feel that God is by your side and that He has not abandoned you. When you feel that God has not abandoned you, when you truly feel that He is by your side, will your trust grow? If you have real trust, will it wear down and fade away with the passage of time? Absolutely not. Is the problem of trust now solved? Can people possess real trust simply by carrying around the Bible and rigidly memorizing verses word for word? You still have to pray to God and rely on God to solve this problem. How did Moses get through those forty years in the wilderness? At that time, there was no Bible, and there were few people around him. He only had sheep with him. Moses was certainly led by God. Although the Bible does not record how God led him, whether God appeared to him, whether God spoke to him, or whether God allowed Moses to understand why He made him live in the wilderness for forty years, it is an undeniable fact that Moses did survive living in the wilderness for forty years. No one can deny this fact. With no one around him with whom to share what was in his heart, how could he survive alone in the wilderness for forty years? Without genuine faith, this would be impossible for anyone. It would be a miracle! No matter how people ponder over this matter, they feel that this could never happen. It is too inconsistent with human notions and imaginings! But this is not a legend, not a fantastic tale, it's a real, unchangeable, and undeniable fact. What does the existence of this fact show to people? If you have genuine faith in God, as long as you have even one breath left, God will not abandon you. This is one fact of God's existence. If you have such real trust and such a true understanding of God, then your trust is great enough. No matter what environment you find yourself in, and no matter how long a time you are in this environment, your trust will not wear away.

Moses was in the wilderness for forty years. God never appeared to him, nor provided him with the truth. Moses had no books containing God's words in his hands, he had none of God's chosen people by his side, and no one with whom to share what was in his heart. Living alone in the wilderness, he could only live by relying on praying to God. Ultimately, this achieved Moses' real trust. So why did God do this? God was to entrust Moses with a commission, making great use of him, and God needed to do work on him, so He tempered him. What did God temper in Moses? (His trust.) God wanted to perfect his trust, not temper his trust. What God tempers are man's good intentions, what are called man's resoluteness and his abilities and skills, and his hotheadedness. Why did Moses leave Egypt at that time? (Because he killed an Egyptian due to hotheadedness.) Could God have used him at that time? (No.) What would have happened if God had used him then? He hated the Egyptians and always intended to act impulsively. If he killed another person, wouldn't that create problems? If God asked him to go and lead the Israelites out of Egypt, and Moses acted impulsively when Pharaoh would not agree, wouldn't that cause trouble? God would say, "Can you represent God if you act this way?" Therefore, because of his hotheadedness, God could not use him. Hotheadedness is a major taboo for humans. If you are hotheaded, if you always want to do things based on your naturalness and your impulse, and if you always want to solve problems using human methods; if you don't have genuine faith in God and you don't rely on God and believe in His sovereignty out of such genuine faith, God will not be able to use you. Should God try to use you, not only will you accomplish nothing, but you will actually mess things up. Therefore, after Moses killed the Egyptian, he fled to the wilderness. God used the environment of the wilderness to temper his will, hotheadedness, his good intentions, zeal, and impulse as well as the heroism that made him defend the interests of his people and fight against injustice. These are all things that belong to human will, hotheadedness and naturalness. Why didn't God arrange for a few Israelites to accompany him? If he had one more person with him, he might not have relied on God but on another person. What kind of person was Moses ultimately refined into in such an environment? He could obey God and had real trust. This shows that his natural hotheadedness had been worn away. When he emerged from the wilderness, did he still have his hotheadedness and heroism? (No.) What showed this? (Moses said that he was no longer a good speaker.) He could no longer speak, so did he still have his own intentions and impulses? (No.) Looked at in this way, when God wants to perfect a person, to perfect a person's trust in God, regardless of whether He uses this person or not, God will perfect this person's understanding of the truth and understanding of God's will and allow this person to obey God truly and completely without any adulteration, without what is called human heroism, impulse, ambition and lofty passions, without hotheadedness, and without human good intentions and enthusiasms—without these so-called beliefs. Everyone admires and pursues these things that come out of human will, these are things that, relatively speaking, people's hearts call positive, good, and right. These are the things everyone is willing to live by. These are people's beliefs. When people do not have these things, they can truly obey God and they will not do things and speak based on human imaginings and human goodness. When people come before God again, they will have more of the elements of genuine faith in God. What are the elements of genuine faith? Will they still advise God and say, "God, the things You do are not in accord with human notions, and people have a hard time accepting Your acts. You really need to do it like this," and "God, what You said doesn't sound right. The tone is off, the approach is wrong, and the words You use are incorrect"? These things are worn out of them and they will no longer advise God. They will be able to truly obey God, possess sense, and possess fear of God. With forty years of tempering in the wilderness, Moses truly felt the existence of God. In an environment where simple survival was impossible for an individual, he relied on God to survive day by day and hold on to hope year after year, and lived through to the end. He really did see God. It was not happenstance and not a legend. There was nothing accidental or sudden about it. It was all true. He saw the real existence of God and saw that God's sovereignty over all things is real. Once God's work in people achieves such an effect, their hearts will undergo a change. Their notions and imaginings will vanish

and they will feel that they themselves are nothing, and they can't do anything without God. As a result, they will be unwilling to do things their own way. At this time, will people say things like "Lord: this shall not be to You"? (No.) We can say that, at this time, people will not speak based on human notions to hinder God, nor will they do things out of human will or as they themselves see fit. At this time, what is the basis on which people live? What do they live out? Subjectively, they can submit to God's sovereignty and arrangements. Objectively, they can allow nature to take its course, wait and seek God's will, and obey God in everything He asks them to do without making individual choices.

Back when God sent Moses to lead the Israelites out of Egypt, what was Moses' reaction to God's having given him such a commission? (He said he was not eloquent, but slow of speech and tongue.) He had that one, slight misgiving, that he was not eloquent, but slow of speech and tongue. But was he resistant to God's commission? How did he treat it? He fell down prostrate. What does it mean to fall down prostrate? It means to submit and accept. He prostrated his whole self before God, heedless of his personal preferences, and did not mention any difficulties he might have had. Whatever God would have him do, he would do it at once. Why was he able to accept God's commission even when he felt there was nothing he could do? Because he had real trust inside him. He had had some experience of God's sovereignty over all things and matters, and in the forty years he experienced in the wilderness, he had come to know that God's sovereignty is almighty. So, he accepted God's commission with alacrity, and set off to do what God had commissioned of him without another word about it. What does it mean that he set off? It means that he had real trust in God, true reliance on Him, and true submission to Him. He was not cowardly, and he did not make a choice of his own or try to refuse. Instead, he fully believed, and he set off to act with God's commission upon him, filled with trust. He believed this: "If God has commissioned this, then it will all be done as God says. God has told me to bring the Israelites out of Egypt, so I will go. Since this is what God has commissioned, He will go to work, and He will give me strength. I need only cooperate." This is the insight Moses had. People who lack spiritual understanding think that they can do the things God entrusts them with on their own. Do people have such abilities? Absolutely not. If people are cowardly, they will lack even the courage to meet the Egyptian Pharaoh. In their hearts, they will say: "The Egyptian Pharaoh is a devil king. He has an army at his command and could kill me with one word. How can I lead away so many Israelites? Would the Egyptian Pharaoh listen to me?" These words constitute refusal, resistance, and rebellion. They demonstrate no belief in God, and this is not real trust. Circumstances at the time were not favorable for the Israelites or for Moses. Leading the Israelites out of Egypt was, in the human view, simply an impossible task, because Egypt was cut off by the Red Sea, and crossing that would be a great challenge. Could Moses really not have known how difficult it would be to fulfill this commission? In his heart, he knew, yet he said only that he was slow of speech and tongue, that no one would heed his words. He did not, at heart, reject God's commission. When God told Moses to lead the Israelites out of Egypt, he lay prostrate and accepted it. Why did he not mention the difficulties? Was it that, after forty years in the wilderness, he did not know the perils of the world of men, or the state to which things had progressed in Egypt, or the current plight of the Israelites? Could he not see those things clearly? Is that what was happening? Certainly not. Moses was intelligent and wise. He knew all those things, having personally undergone and experienced them in the world of men, and he would never forget them. He knew those things all too well. So, did he know how difficult the commission was that God had given him? (Yes.) If he knew, how was he able to accept that commission? He trusted in God. With his lifetime of experience, he believed in God's omnipotence, so he accepted this commission of God with a heart full of trust and without the slightest doubt. What experiences did he have? Tell Me. (In his experience, every time he called out to God and every time he drew near to God, God led and guided him. Moses saw that God had never gone back on His word, and he had real trust in God.) This is one aspect. Anything else? (During his forty years in the wilderness, Moses had indeed seen God's sovereignty by calling out to and praying to God. He was able to survive and come through it, and he possessed genuine faith in God's sovereignty.) Anything else? (God had already done a lot of work on Moses. Moses knew something about how God created the heavens, the earth, and all things, how God used a flood to destroy the world in the time of Noah, and about Abraham and other such things. He wrote these things in the Pentateuch, which proves that he gained insight into all these deeds of God and knew that God is omnipotent and omniscient. Therefore, he believed that as God would lead him, the undertaking would certainly be successful. He wanted to watch God's deeds, see what God would do through him, and how God would help and guide him. This was the trust he had.) That is how it was. Tell Me, in his forty years in the wilderness, was Moses able to experience that, in God, nothing is difficult and that man is in God's hand? Very much so—that was his truest experience. In his forty years in the wilderness, there were so many things that posed mortal danger to him, and he did not know whether he would survive them. Every day, he would have struggled for his life and prayed to God for protection. That was his only wish. In those forty years, what he experienced most deeply was God's sovereignty and protection. Later, then, when he was accepting God's commission, his first feeling must have been: "Nothing is difficult in God. If God says it can be done, then it certainly can. Since God has given me such a commission, He will certainly see to it—it is He who will do it, not any man." Before taking action, people must plan and make preparations in advance. They must handle the preliminaries first. Must God do these things before He acts? He has no need. Every created being, no matter how influential, no matter how capable or powerful, no matter how frenzied, is in God's hand. Moses had trust, knowledge, and experience of this, so there was not a shred of doubt or fear in his heart. As such, his trust in God was particularly genuine and pure. He may be said to have been filled with trust.

I have just talked about what genuine faith is. Tell Me, in the end, does God want people's beliefs or people's genuine faith? (He wants people's genuine faith.) What God wants is people's genuine faith. What is genuine faith? In the simplest and most direct terms, it is people's real trust in God. What does real trust look like in practice? What does it have to do with all the activities in people's real lives? (People believe that God is sovereign over and ordains all things. They believe in God's sovereignty over all they encounter and believe that nothing is difficult for God.) (People believe that every word God says will come to pass.) Ponder this over further. How else will real trust show itself? (The trust of Moses is different from that of ordinary believers. When he wrote Genesis, he believed that God created the heavens and earth and all things by His words, he believed that the heavens and earth and all things were brought about through God's words, he believed that whatsoever God says is actually is and that which God ordains will come to be, and he believed that God's words would all come to pass and be fulfilled. In this regard, he had real trust in God. He didn't just believe in the fact that God truly exists. He believed that the heavens, the earth, and all things were created by God. In his heart, he absolutely believed that God's words accomplished everything, and he believed in God's omnipotence. If he lacked such trust in God, he could never have written Genesis. These words were also inspired or revealed by the Holy Spirit, and he could see clearly.) Tell Me, is God's real existence a fact because people believe it? (No.) What kind of fact is God's real existence? (Whether people believe it or not, God exists, and God is self-existent and eternal.) At the very least, trust in God must be based on this foundation: God does not exist due to your verbal acknowledgment of Him, nor would He not exist if you did not acknowledge Him. Rather, God exists regardless of whether you believe in Him or acknowledge Him. God is eternally the Creator and eternally sovereign over all things. Why do people need to come to this understanding? What can it change in people? Some people say, "If we believe in You, You are God, but if we don't believe in You, You are not God." What are these words? These are rebellious and fallacious words. God says, "If you don't believe in Me, I am still God and I am still sovereign over your destiny. You cannot change this." This is a fact that no one can deny. No matter how much an atheist denies or resists God, their fate is still under God's sovereignty, and they cannot escape God's punishment. If you fully accept and submit to God's orchestration and arrangements and can accept all the truths expressed by God, God's words can change your way of life, change your life goals and the direction of your pursuit, change the path you choose, and change the meaning of your life. With their mouths, some people say that they believe in the existence of God and that God is sovereign over all things and everything that is, but they cannot submit to God's orchestrations and arrangements and they cannot see that God makes different arrangements for each individual. These people always want to pursue their own ambitions and desires and always want to do great things, but they encounter repeated setbacks and are ultimately beaten down and left broken and bleeding. Only then do they surrender. If they really believed in the sovereignty of God, would they act in this way? It would be impossible for them. How should they proceed? First of all, they should understand God's will. In God's work for the salvation of mankind, He helps people to shed their corrupt dispositions and break free from Satan's influence, walk down the right path of life, and live by God's words. If people really understand God's will, they will follow God's requirements in their pursuit of the truth and quest to understand God, achieving submission to God's sovereignty and arrangements. Only in this way can they conform to God's will. There are many people who believe in God but are unable to obey God. They always want to pursue their own wants, but they all fail in the end. Only then do they say what is in their hearts, "This is destiny, and no one can change what God has ordained!" At this time, when they again say, "I believe in the existence of God and believe that God holds everything in His hands," are these words different from those they spoke before? They are much more practical than the doctrines they talked about before. Previously, they just verbally acknowledged and believed that God was sovereign over all things, but when things would happen to them, they couldn't obey God and couldn't practice the truth based on God's words. In their hearts, they thought that they could realize their ideals on their own. In this way, the words of God they believed in their hearts and the doctrines that were on their tongues could not become the principles of their actions. That is, they did not believe that God's words are all the truth and can accomplish all things. They thought that they understood the truth, but they could not submit to God's sovereignty and arrangements, so what they understood were only doctrines and words, not the truth reality. With their mouths, they said they believed in God's sovereignty, but in real life, they could not obey God. They always went down their own paths, always wanted to pursue their own wants, and violated God's requirements. Is this true obedience? Is there real belief and real trust here? (No.) There is none at all, which is really pitiful! What are the manifestations of real trust in God? People with real trust at least believe that God's words are the truth and that they will come to pass and be fulfilled, and they believe that practicing according to God's requirements is the correct path in life. In their lives, they pray to God and rely on God, bring God's words into their real lives, practice according to God's words in all things, seek to be honest people, and live out the reality of God's words. They not only believe in the existence and sovereignty of God, but also seek to submit to God's orchestrations and arrangements in their real lives. If they are rebellious, they can reflect on themselves, accept the truth, accept God's discipline, and achieve obedience to God. If you practice in this way, the truth you believe and acknowledge will become your life reality. This truth will be able to guide your thoughts, guide your life, and guide the direction that your entire life takes. At this time, you will be able to bring forth real trust in God. When you possess real belief in God and true obedience, this produces trust. This trust is genuine faith in God. Where does this genuine faith come from? It is obtained by practicing and experiencing God's words and thereby coming to understand the truth. The more people understand the truth, the greater their trust in God, the more they know of God, and the more they truly obey God. This is how people come to have genuine faith.

In the process by which people come to have genuine faith in God, what does God do? (He enlightens, guides, orchestrates environments, and then takes the truth and works it into people.) When Peter received his rebuke from the Lord Jesus, that was God exposing, judging, and condemning him. Do people have to experience these things before they gain real trust in God? (Yes.) Why do they have to experience these things? Would it be impossible without these things? Is it possible to pass over judgment, exposure, reprimand, discipline, rebuke, and even cursing? (No.) Suppose the Lord Jesus had discussed the matter with Peter in a friendly manner, rather than rebuking him, saying, "Peter, I know that you mean well by what you say, but don't speak like that in the future. Don't hinder My plan out of human good intentions. Don't speak on behalf of Satan and act as Satan's outlet. In the future, be more careful and don't talk nonsense. Before speaking, consider carefully whether your words are correct and whether they will grieve or anger God." Would speaking this way work? (No.) Why not? Men have been too deeply corrupted by Satan, and the roots of their corrupt disposition run too deep. They live by their corrupt disposition. All their thoughts, acts, imaginings, notions, all the goals and directions of their lives, and all they say and do come from their corrupt disposition. Is it fine if God does not rebuke them? Will they realize the seriousness of this problem? Can the root cause of their sin be eradicated? (No.) If the root cause of their sin cannot be eradicated, can people obey God? (No.) Is it now clear to you whether it is a good or a bad thing when God condemns and curses people? (It is a good thing.) Is it a good thing for God to reveal people? (Yes.) What does He reveal in people? (He reveals their weakness, stature, and trust in God.) He completely reveals people. The doctrines you hold, the catchphrase you constantly repeat, your beliefs, your outward zeal and well-meaning intentions are not what God commends. These are not what He wants. No matter how zealous you are or how far you travel, can this show you possess the truth? Can it show you have genuine faith in God? (No.) These are not the things God commends. Human goodness and imaginings are useless. To gain God's approval and possess genuine faith in God, you must experience the various methods by which God works: exposing, judging, condemning, cursing—sometimes even disciplining and punishing are needed. Are these things to be feared? They are not things to be feared. They have in them God's will, God's good intentions, and God's love. It is worthwhile to endure this hardship! God does these things and uses these methods to work on people. This shows that God expects things from these people and wants to gain something from them. God does not do these things at random, without reason, or based on imaginings. They completely reflect God's will. What is God's will? He wants to bring people to genuine faith in God and have people accept the truth, shed their corrupt dispositions, and achieve salvation.

Tell Me, after Peter denied the Lord three times, did he reflect on his own faith? (Yes.) People with normal humanity, those who pursue the truth will reflect on themselves when they encounter failures and setbacks. Peter would certainly have reflected on himself in this way. People who do not love the truth will never reflect on themselves. If they encounter a situation like Peter's, they will say, "Although I have denied the Lord three times, these were exceptional circumstances. Who would not feel worried, afraid, and weak under such exceptional circumstances? It's not a big deal. My love for the Lord is still great, my heart is on fire with zeal, my spirit is strong, and I will never leave, never abandon the Lord! Denying the Lord three times is only a small blemish, and God probably won't remember it. After all, my trust in God is quite considerable." What sort of reflection is this? Is this the attitude of accepting the truth? Is this the way to attain real trust? (No.) What if Peter thought, "Lord Jesus, You know people too well, but how could You have wagered that I would do such a thing? You should not have predicted that I would deny You. Rather, You should have predicted that I would recognize You three times. That would have been great, and I could then have followed You with my head held high. In addition, it would have shown my great trust in You, and Your prediction would also have proved accurate. We would both be satisfied with that. How truly I believe in You. You must perfect me and give me my dignity! You shouldn't rebuke me. You shouldn't treat me in this manner. I am the dignified Peter. I should never have said words that denied God. It is too embarrassing and shameful! Why would You put such a thing on me? Why not somebody else? What You did was not fair! Although I admit that I denied You, did You have to expose me like this so that everyone can see my embarrassment? Where will I go from here? Can I still receive a good destination in the future? Doesn't this mean You have given up on me? In my heart, I feel this isn't fair." Is it right or wrong to reason with God like this? (It is wrong.) What sort of state is this? Here Peter has disobedience and complaints. Peter complains that God's work does not conform to his notions and tastes. It causes him to lose face and standing so that he cannot hold his head up high. Here he has human choices, he has human complaints, disobedience, resistance, and rebellion. All of these things are corrupt dispositions. Thinking this way, acting in this way, and having such an attitude and state are obviously wrong. If people think and act like this and God does not reprimand them, can they develop genuine faith after being revealed? Can they possess real trust in God? (No.) What sort of result is in store for people who complain, rebel, resist, and reject what God reveals in them and how God treats them such as this? What does this bring to the lives of such people? The first thing it brings is loss. What is the implication of "loss"? As God sees it, you are too much trouble to deal with. No matter what happens to you, you always have choices and you always have your own tastes, your own will, your own opinions, and your own imaginings, notions, and conclusions. So then, why do you still believe in God? For you, God is simply the object of your conviction and your spiritual support. You don't need God, God's words, God's truth, or God's life provision, and you certainly don't need God to do any sort of judgment work on you that causes you a lot of pain. In response, God says, "That's easy, I don't have to do that to you. There's just one thing: You must leave Me. You have the right to your choices, and I have the right to make choices as well. You can choose not to accept My manner of saving you, just as I can choose not to save you." Does this mean you and God have nothing to do with each other? Is this God's freedom? (Yes.) Does God have the right to do this? (Yes.) Do people have the right to choose not to accept God's salvation? (Yes.) People also have this right. You can give up or you can reject the salvation God has for you, but in the end, it is you who suffers the loss. Not only will you not be perfected by God, but God will also reject and detest you and cast you out. In the end, you will be doubly punished. This is the outcome for you. That's the trouble in store for you! Therefore, people who want to be saved must choose to submit to God's work. Only in this way can people develop real trust in God and attain genuine faith in Him. Such faith is gradually produced in the process of submission to God's sovereignty and arrangements.

People's corrupt disposition is hidden in the intentions behind their speech and actions, in their outlook on things, in their every thought and idea, and in their views, understanding, notions, outlook, wishes, and demands regarding the truth, God, and God's work. It pours out from people's words and acts without their knowing it. How, then, does God treat these things inside people? He arranges various environments to expose you. He will not only expose you, but He will also judge you. When you reveal your corrupt disposition, when you have thoughts and ideas that defy God, when you have states and viewpoints that contend with God, when you have states whereby you misunderstand God, or resist and oppose Him, God will rebuke you, judge you, and chastise you, and He will sometimes even discipline you and punish you. What is the aim of disciplining and rebuking you? (To have us repent and change.) Yes, it is meant to have you repent. What is achieved by disciplining and rebuking you is that it allows you to turn your course around. It is to make you understand that your thoughts are the notions of man, and that they are wrong; your motivations are born of Satan, they originate from human will, they are not in line with the truth, they are incompatible with God, they cannot fulfill God's intentions, they are disgusting and hateful to God, they incite His wrath, and even arouse His curse. After realizing this, you have to change your motivations and attitude. And how are they changed? First of all, you must submit to the way God treats you, and submit to the environments and people, matters, and things that He sets out for you. Do not pick holes, do not give objective excuses, and do not shirk your responsibilities. Secondly, seek the truth that people should practice and enter into when God does what He does. God asks that you understand these things. He wants you to recognize your corrupt dispositions and satanic essence, for you to be able to submit to the environments He arranges for you and, ultimately, for you to be able to practice in accordance with His will and His requirements for you. Then you will have passed the test. Once you stop resisting and opposing God, you will then no longer argue with God and will be able to obey. When God says, "Get you behind Me, Satan,"

you reply, "If God says I am Satan, I am Satan. Though I don't understand what I've done wrong, or why God says I am Satan, He orders me to get behind Him, so I shall not hesitate. I must seek the will of God." When God says the nature of your actions is satanic, you say, "I recognize whatever God says, I accept it all." What attitude is this? This is obedience. Is it obedience when you are able to reluctantly accept God saying you are the devil Satan, but cannot accept it—and are incapable of obeying—when He says you are a beast? Obedience means total compliance and acceptance, not arguing or setting terms. It means not analyzing cause and effect, regardless of objective reasons, and only concerning yourself with acceptance. When people have attained obedience such as this, they are close to genuine faith in God. The more God acts and the more you experience, the more real God's sovereignty over all things becomes to you, the greater your trust in God will become and the more you will feel, "Everything God does is good, none of it is bad. I must not pick and choose, but should obey. My responsibility, my obligation, my duty—it is to obey. This is what I should do as a creature of God. If I can't even obey God, then what am I? I am a beast, I am the devil!" Does this not show that you now have genuine faith? Once you have gotten to this point, you will be without taint, and so it will be easy for God to use you, and it will also be easy for you to submit to the orchestrations of God. When you have God's approval, you will be able to gain His blessings. Thus, there are many lessons to be learned in obedience.

Peter possessed true obedience to God. When God said, "Get you behind Me, Satan," he kept quiet and reflected on himself. The people of today can't do this. If God says, "Get you behind Me, Satan," they will say, "Who are You calling Satan? It's not okay to say that I'm Satan. Say I'm chosen by God—that would be pretty good. That I could accept and obey. If You say I'm Satan, I can't obey." If you can't obey, then do you have real trust in God? Do you possess real obedience? (No.) What is the relationship between obedience and real trust? Only when you have genuine faith can you possess true obedience. Only when you can truly obey God can real trust in God gradually arise within you. You gain real trust in the process of truly obeying God, but if you lack real trust, can you truly obey God? (No.) These things are connected, and this is not a matter of rules or logic. Truth is not philosophy, it is not logical. Truths are interrelated and absolutely inseparable. If you say, "To obey God, you must have trust in God, and if you have trust in God, you must obey God," this is a rule, a phrase, a theory, a high-sounding view! Matters of life are not rules. You keep verbally acknowledging that Almighty God is your only Savior and the one true God, but do you have real trust in God? What do you rely on to stand firm when you meet with adversity? Many people accept Almighty God because He has expressed so many truths. They accept Him in order to enter the kingdom of heaven. However, when confronted with arrest and tribulations, many people withdraw, many people hide in their homes and do not dare to perform their duties. At this time, the words you spoke—"I believe in God's sovereignty, I believe in God's control over man's destiny, and that my destiny is in God's hands"—have long since disappeared without a trace. It was merely a catchphrase for you. Since you dare not practice and experience these words, and you do not live by these words, do you have real trust in God? The essence of having faith in God is not just believing in God's name, but believing in the fact that God is sovereign over all things. You must turn this fact into your life, turn it into the actual testimony of your life. You have to live by these words. That means allowing these words to guide your behavior and guide the direction and goals of your actions when situations confront you. Why do you have to live by these words? For example, let's say that you are able to go to a foreign country to believe in God and perform your duty, and you think this is quite good. The rule of the great red dragon does not exist overseas, and there is no persecution of beliefs; believing in God does not endanger your life, so you don't have to take risks. Whereas, believers in God in mainland China are in danger of being arrested at any time; they are living in the demon's den, and that is very dangerous! Then one day, God says, "You have been believing in God overseas for several years, and gained some life experience. There is a place in mainland China, the brothers and sisters there are immature in terms of life. You should return and shepherd them." What would you do when confronted with this responsibility? (Obey and accept it.) You might accept it externally, but your heart would feel uneasy. In your bed at night, you'd cry and pray to God, "God, You know my weakness. My stature is too small. Even if I return to the mainland, I would not be able to shepherd God's chosen people! Can't You choose someone else to go? This commission has come to me, and I do want to go, but I am afraid that, if I go, I will not carry it out well, that I will not be able to perform my duty satisfactorily, and that I will fail to satisfy Your will! Can't I stay overseas for two more years?" What is the choice you are making? You are not completely refusing to go, but you are not fully agreeing to go either. This is tacit evasion. Is this obeying God? This is a most clear rebellion against God. You not wanting to return means that you possess resistant emotions. Does God know this? (He knows.) God will say, "Don't go. I am not being hard on you, I am just giving you a trial." In this way, He has exposed you. Do you love God? Do you obey God? Do you have real trust? (No.) Is this weakness? (No.) It is rebellion, it is opposing God. This trial has revealed that you do not have real trust in God, you do not have true obedience, and you do not believe that God is sovereign over all things. You say, "As long as I am afraid, I am justified in choosing not to go. As long as my life is in danger, I can refuse. I do not have to accept this commission and can choose my own path. I can be filled with complaints and grievances." What sort of trust is this? There is no real trust here. No matter how lofty the slogans you chant are, will they have any effect now? None at all. Will your oaths have any effect? Will it do any good if other people fellowship on the truth and work to persuade you? (No.) Even if you reluctantly go to the mainland after they work to persuade you, would this be true obedience? This is not how God wants you to obey. If you go unwillingly, you will go in vain. God will not work in you, and you will gain nothing from it. God doesn't force people to do things. You must be willing.

If you don't want to go, want to take a third way, and always seek to escape, reject, and evade, then you don't have to go. When your stature is large enough and you have such trust, you will voluntarily request to go, saying, "I will go, even if no one else does. This time I am truly unafraid, and I will risk my life! Isn't life given by God? What is so scary about Satan? It is a plaything in the hands of God, and I do not fear it! If I am not arrested, it will be thanks to God's grace and mercy. If circumstances are such that I am arrested, it is because God allows it. Even if I die in prison, I must still testify for God! I must have this resolve—I will hand over my life to God. I will take what I have understood, experienced, and come to know in my life and fellowship on it with those brothers and sisters who lack understanding and knowledge. This way, they can have the same trust and resolve as I do, and can come before God and testify for Him. I must be considerate of God's will and carry this heavy burden. Although carrying this heavy burden requires taking risks and sacrificing my life, I am not afraid. I no longer think of myself; I have God, my life is in His hands, and I willingly submit to His orchestrations and arrangements." After you return, you will have to suffer in that environment. You may age guickly, with your hair going gray and your face wrinkling. You may get sick or be arrested and persecuted, or even find yourself in mortal danger. How should you confront these problems? This again involves real trust. Some people can return in a burst of determination, but what will they do when confronted by these hardships after their return? You must take the plunge and believe in God's sovereignty. Even if you visibly age a bit or get a little sick, these are trivial matters. If you sin against God and refuse His commission, you will lose out on your chance to be perfected by God in this life. In your life, if you sin against God and reject His commission, that will be an eternal stain! Losing this opportunity is something you can't buy back with any number of years of your youth. What use is it to have a healthy and strong body? What's the use of having a pretty face and a good figure? Even if you live to be eighty and your mind is still sharp, if you can't understand the meaning of even one sentence spoken by God, wouldn't that be pathetic? It would be extremely pathetic! So, what is the most important and precious thing that people must obtain when they come before God? It is genuine faith in God. No matter what befalls you, if you first obey, even if you have some small misconceptions about God at the time, or you don't guite understand why God is acting in that way, you will not be passive and weak. As Peter said, "Even if God were playing with humans as if they were toys, what complaint would humans have?" If you lack even this bit of trust, could you still be as obedient as Peter? Very often, what God does to you is appropriate and reasonable, in line with your stature, imaginings, and notions. God works according to your stature. If you still can't accept it, can you achieve the obedience of Peter? That would be even more impossible. Therefore, you have to pursue toward this direction and this goal. Only then can you achieve genuine faith in God.

If people lack genuine faith, can they obey God? It's hard to say. Only by having real trust in God can they truly obey Him. That's exactly it. If you do not truly obey God, you will have no more opportunities to receive God's enlightenment, guidance, or perfection. You have pushed away all these opportunities for God to perfect you. You don't want them. You refuse, avoid, and are constantly dodging them. You always choose an environment with the comforts of the flesh and free from suffering. This is a problem! You can't experience God's work. You can't experience God's guidance, God's leadership, and God's protection. You can't see God's deeds. As a result, you won't gain the truth and won't gain real trust—you won't gain anything! If you cannot gain the truth and you cannot gain the word of God to make it your life, can you be gained by God? Certainly not. What is the main thing you intend to gain by being enlightened, guided, and perfected by God? You gain the truth and the word of God. That is, God's word becomes your reality, the source of your life, and the principle, basis, and criterion for your actions. When this is the case, what do you live out? Still a corrupt disposition? (No.) Will God say to you, "Get you behind Me, Satan"? (He will not.) What will God say? What was the definition God gave to Job? (He fears God and shuns evil, he is a perfect person.) It is appropriate to quote these words here. If you want to attain this title and definition God gave to Job, will it be easy to do so? (No.) It's not easy. You have to satisfy God's heart in all things, seek God's will everywhere, act according to God's will, and submit to God's orchestrations and arrangements. If you only say that you will submit to God's orchestrations and arrangement, but then seek to analyze why certain circumstances, people, events and things befall you, have complaints and misunderstandings, and misinterpret God's will, that would be very grievous to God! If you don't want God, God won't want you. You will have nothing to do with each other. Wouldn't it be a problem if things were to go on like this? As you are not a creature of God, God is not your Sovereign, nor your God. How will God define you in the end? "Depart from Me, you that work iniquity." Do you want to have these words said of you? (No.) What does it mean if this is said of you? (It means we are condemned, cast out, and punished by God.) That is not good at all! Once you are condemned and cast out by God, it is not like being condemned by a leader or someone in authority—it is God! God bestows life on you and sustains your life. Now that God does not want you, can you still live? (No.) What does this mean? It signifies the final outcome for you, which is not a good thing. It is not a good sign at all. If I say that a person fears God and shuns evil and is a perfect person, this is a good sign, and God's blessing will surely come to such a person. What should you make of the words with which God evaluated Job? If you think about what Job ate, what he wore, how he walked, and what temperament he had and try to imitate these things, you are going about it wrong. You have to quickly ponder and seek, thinking, "How did Job do it? What did he live out to receive God's commendation? God said that Job feared God and shunned evil, he was a perfect person. That is no small thing. That is what God Himself said. I must follow Job's example, seek the way of fearing God and shunning evil, and strive to become a person who fears God and shuns evil as well. This will make it so God will commend me and call me by this title as well. I want to be a perfect person in God's eyes." This thinking is in line with God's will.

Only Knowledge of the Six Kinds of Corrupt Dispositions Is True Self-Knowledge

What is the purpose of man's faith in God? (To be saved.) Salvation is a perennial topic of faith in God. So how can salvation be attained? (By pursuing the truth and always living before God.) That's one kind of practice. What is to be gained by always living before God? What is the aim? (To build a normal relationship with God.) (To fear God and shun evil, and to understand the truth and achieve the true knowledge of God.) What else? (To seek the truth, to make the truth our life.) These things are often said during sermons, they are spiritual phrases. What else? (To experience being pruned and dealt with by God, along with His judgment and chastisement, and His trials and refinement in order to come to reflect on and know ourselves and seek the truth to resolve our corrupt dispositions during this process, as well as to attain true knowledge of God, finally becoming someone who is possessed of the truth and humanity.) It seems you have understood much from the past several years of sermons. So, can these things you understand be used in your experiences to solve certain real problems and difficulties? Incorrect thoughts and ideas, and occasional negativity and weakness, for example, as well as certain issues to do with notions and imaginings: can these things be quickly solved? Some people might be able to solve a few minor problems, but they may still struggle with major, root-cause problems. Based on the level of understanding you have of the truths today, would you be able to stand firm if you were faced with the same kind of trials as Job? (We would resolve to stand firm, but we do not know what our true stature would be if something really were to happen to us.) But should you not know what your true stature is, even when nothing has happened to you? To not know this is perilous! Do you know what the practical aspects of these oft-repeated spiritual sayings and set phrases are? Do you understand the true implication of each of these phrases? Do you understand just what the truth in them is? If you know, and have experienced these things, then this proves you understand the truth. If you are only able to repeat a few spiritual sayings and phrases, but they are of no use to you when you actually experience something, and they are incapable of solving your troubles, then this proves that after all these years of believing in God, you still do not understand the truth, and have not had any real experiences. What is the meaning of My saying this? Having made it this far in their belief in God, people understand a little more of the truth than religionists or unbelievers, they understand some of the visions of God's work, and are able to abide by a few regulatory matters, and can be said to have a certain understanding and appreciation of, and to have a few true insights into, God's sovereignty—but have these things brought change to their life disposition? Each of you can, on the whole, talk a little about often-heard truths that relate to visions: the visions of God's work, the purpose of God's work, and God's will for mankind; and the knowledge you speak of is much higher than that of the religionists—but can all this bring about a change in your disposition, or even a partial change in your disposition? Are you able to measure this? This is of critical importance.

Recently, fellowship was given on how exactly to know the God on earth, how to interact with the God on earth, and how to establish a normal relationship with God. Are these not the most practical questions? These are all truths related to the aspect of practice, and the aim of fellowshiping on these things is to inform people how to believe in God, and how to interact with God and build a normal relationship with God in their daily lives. In terms of the truths related to practice, of all the truths you have heard, understood, and are able to put into practice, are they able to change your disposition? Can it be said that if people put the truth into practice in this way, and truly strive to achieve this, then they are practicing the truth; and that if they have made these truths their reality, they are able to achieve changes in their disposition? (It can.) Many people are blind to what changes in disposition are. They think that being able to repeat many spiritual doctrines, and understanding many truths, represents changes in disposition. This is wrong. From the point of understanding a truth, to putting this truth into practice, and then on to changes in disposition, is a lengthy process of life experience. How do you understand changes in disposition? In all that you have experienced up to this point, have there been any changes in your life disposition? You may be unable to see into these things, and all this is problematic. The word "change" in "changes in disposition" is not actually very hard to understand, so what is "disposition"? (The law of human existence, the poison of Satan.) What else? (What is natural in man, what is in the essence of life.) You keep bringing up these spiritual terms, but they are all doctrines and outlines, and they don't contain any detail. This is not understanding the essence of the truth. We often talk of changes in disposition, and such topics are always being discussed right from the start of people's faith in God, whether they are attending a gathering or listening to a sermon; these are the things that people should try to figure out when they believe in God. But as for just what exactly changes in disposition are, whether there has been a change in their own disposition, and whether it is possible to achieve change—many people are ignorant of these things, they have never thought about them, nor do they know from where to start thinking about them. What is disposition? This is a major topic. Once you have understood this, then you will more or less understand questions such as whether or not there has been a change in your disposition, to what degree it has changed, how many changes there have been, and whether there has been a change in your disposition after you have experienced certain things. To discuss changes in disposition, you must first know what disposition is. Everyone knows the word "disposition," everyone is familiar with it. But they don't know what disposition is. Just what exactly disposition is cannot be explained clearly in just a few words, and it cannot be explained as a noun, as this is too abstract and not easily comprehensible. I'll give an example that'll make you understand. Sheep and wolves are both animals. Sheep eat grass, and wolves eat meat. This is determined by their nature. If, one day, sheep ate meat and wolves ate grass, would their natures have changed? (No.) If a sheep didn't eat grass, it would grow very hungry. Give it some meat, and it will eat it, but the sheep will still be very docile toward you. This is disposition, it is the nature essence of the sheep. In what respect does a sheep's docility exhibit itself? (It doesn't attack people.) That's right—this is a docile disposition. The disposition exhibited in a sheep is pliancy and obedience. It is not vicious, but docile and kind. Wolves are different. Its disposition is vicious and it eats all kinds of small animals. Encountering a hungry wolf is very dangerous, it could try to eat you even if you don't provoke it. A wolf's disposition is not docile or kind, but cruel and fierce, without a shred of sympathy or pity. Such is the disposition of a wolf. The dispositions of wolves and sheep represent their nature essence. Why do I say this? Because the things that are revealed in them naturally show themselves regardless of context, without human input or incitement; they are naturally revealed, without any need for additional human input. The ferocity and cruelty of wolves is not forced out of them by humans, nor is the kindness and docility of sheep instilled in them by humans; they were born with these things, these are things revealed naturally, they are their essence. This is disposition. Does this example give you some understanding of what disposition is? (Yes.) This is not a conceptual matter, we are not explaining some noun. There is truth in this. So, what is the truth here? Human disposition is related to human nature. Human disposition and human nature are both of Satan, they are antagonistic and hostile to God. If people do not receive God's salvation and do not change, then what people live out and naturally reveal would be nothing but evil, negative, and in violation of the truth—of this there is no doubt.

We just spoke of the dispositions of sheep and wolves. These are two completely different animals: They each have their own dispositions and things that are revealed in them. But what is the connection to human disposition? Looking again at what exactly human disposition is through this example, what kinds of corrupt dispositions are there? (We can generally know what kind of disposition people have by interacting with them. For example, while talking to someone, we might feel that they speak in a roundabout way, that they're always equivocating, such that others can't tell what they really mean, which means they have a deceitful disposition in them. We can get a general idea from what they usually say and do, from their actions and behavior.) You can see certain problems of disposition from interacting with people. It looks as if, after hearing this example, you have a general idea about what dispositions are. So which corrupt dispositions do all people have? Which dispositions are people unaware of, and unable to feel, yet are, without doubt, corrupt dispositions? Say, for example, some people are highly sentimental, and God says, "You are highly sentimental. When it comes to someone you like or something to do with your family, no matter who tries to understand their situation or what's really going on, you won't give away anything about them, and keep covering for them. This is sentimentality." They hear this, and they understand it, acknowledge it, and they accept it as fact. They acknowledge that God's words are right, that God's words are the truth, and they give thanks to God for revealing this to them. Can their disposition be seen from this? Is it evident that they accept the truth, accept the facts, do not resist, and are obedient? (No. It depends on how they act when faced with problems, and whether what they say and what they do are the same thing.) You're not far off. At the time, they are accepting—but later, when such a thing happens to them, there is no change in how they act. This represents one kind of disposition. What disposition? They were listening at the time, then they thought about it and said to themselves, "How could I not know I am sentimental after having heard so many sermons? I am sentimental, but who isn't? If I don't cover for my family and the people I'm close to, who will? Even an able man needs the support of three other people." This is what they really think. When the time comes to act, what they are thinking and planning in their heart, and their attitude toward God's words, is all determined by their disposition. What is their attitude? "God can say and reveal whatever He wants, and I will accept whatever I am supposed to when I am before Him, but my mind is made up, and I have no intention of putting my emotions aside." Is this their disposition? Their disposition has shown itself and their true face has been exposed, right? Are they someone who accepts the truth? (No.) So what is this? This is recalcitrance. Before God, they say Amen and feign acceptance. But their heart remains unmoved. They do not take God's words seriously, they do not take them to be the truth, and much less do they put them into practice as the truth. This is one kind of disposition, is it not? And is a disposition such as this not the revelation of a certain kind of nature? (Yes.) So what is the essence of this kind of disposition? Is it intransigence? (Yes.) Intransigence: this is one kind of human disposition, and it is found in all people. Why do I say this is a disposition? This is something that springs from people's nature essence. You don't have to think about it, others don't have to teach you or work on your thoughts, nor does Satan have to trick you; it is naturally revealed in you, and it springs from your nature. There are some people who, no matter what bad things they do, always blame Satan. They always say, "Satan put the idea in my head, Satan made me do it." They put everything bad on Satan, and never admit to problems within their own nature. Is this correct? Have you not been profoundly corrupted by Satan? If you don't admit this, then how is it that the disposition of Satan is revealed in you? Of course, there are also the times when Satan is disruptive, including when people are duped and put up to something by someone wicked or by an antichrist, or when an evil spirit works and sends them thoughts-but these are just exceptions; most of the time people are directed by their satanic nature and they reveal all manner of corrupt dispositions. When people act according to their own preferences and inclinations, when they do things by their own means, according to their own notions and imaginings, then they are living by their own corrupt dispositions, and when they live by these things, they are living by their own nature. These are indisputable facts. When people are governed by their satanic nature, when they live by their satanic nature, everything that is revealed in them is their own corrupt disposition; this can't be pushed onto Satan, you can't say that these are thoughts sent by Satan. Because people have been profoundly corrupted, they belong to Satan, and because people are no different from Satan, and they are living demons, living Satans, you therefore must not push everything satanic that is revealed within you onto Satan. You're no better than Satan, and that is your corrupt disposition.

What kind of state is there inside people when they have an intransigent disposition? It is mainly that they are stubborn and self-righteous. They always stick to their own ideas, they always think that what they say is right, they are utterly inflexible, and they are opinionated. This is the attitude of intransigence. They are like a broken record, not listening to anyone, remaining unalterably fixed on one course of action, insisting on going through with it, regardless of whether it is right or wrong; there is some unrepentance in this. As the saying goes, "Dead pigs don't fear boiling water." People know full well what is the right thing to do, and yet they do not do it, they steadfastly refuse to accept the truth. This is one kind of disposition: intransigence. In what kinds of situations do you reveal an intransigent disposition? Are you often intransigent? (Yes.) Very often! And since intransigence is your disposition, this accompanies you in every second of every day of your existence. Intransigence stops people from being able to come before God, it stops them from being able to accept the truth, and it stops them from being able to enter the truth reality. And if you are not able to enter the truth reality, can change occur in this aspect of your disposition? Only with great difficulty. Has there now been any change in this aspect of your disposition that is intransigent? And how much change has there been? Say, for example, you used to be extremely stubborn, but there has now been a little change in you: When you encounter some issue, you have some sense of conscience in your heart, and say to yourself, "I have to practice some truth in this matter. Since God has exposed this intransigent disposition—since I have heard it, and now I know it—I must therefore change. When I encountered these kinds of things a few times in the past, I went along with my flesh and failed, and I am not happy with this. This time I must practice the truth." With such an aspiration, it is possible to practice the truth, and this is change. When you have experience in this way for a time, and you are able to put more truths into practice, and this brings about greater changes, and your rebellious and intransigent dispositions become ever more diminished, has there been a change in your life disposition? If your rebellious disposition has visibly become ever more diminished, and your obedience to God has become ever greater, then there has been real change.

So, to what extent must you change to achieve true obedience? You will have succeeded when there is not the slightest intransigence, but only obedience. This is a slow process. Changes in disposition do not happen overnight, they take extended periods of experience, maybe even a lifetime. Sometimes it is necessary to suffer many great hardships, hardships akin to dying and coming back to life, hardships more painful and difficult than having poison scraped from your bones. So have there been any changes in your intransigent disposition? Are you able to measure this? (Before, I believed that certain things should be done a certain way. When people offered a different point of view, I did not listen, and it wasn't until I hit real setbacks that I came around. Now I'm a little better. I push back when people put forward different views, but am able to accept some of what they say later.) An alteration in attitude is another kind of change; this means there has been a little change. It is not like before, where you knew that the other person was right, but rejected it and refused to accept it, still sticking to your own inclinations; this is not the case now. There has already been a reversal in your attitude. How much have you changed when you have changed this much? Not even ten percent. Ten percent change means that at the very least, after the other person has stated their differing viewpoint, you do not have any feelings of opposition or thoughts of resistance; you have a normal attitude. Although it still doesn't sit right with you in your heart, you do not have an intransigent attitude, you can discuss this with the person, there is some obedience when you practice, and you do not only do things according to your own ideas. Afterward, there are times when you stick to your own ideas, and times when you are able to accept what other people say. Changes in disposition go back and forth. You must experience untold setbacks to achieve a little change, and untold failures to be successful, and so it is not easy for your disposition to change without experiencing several years of trials and refinement. Sometimes, when people are in a good state of mind, they are capable of accepting correct things that others say, but when they are feeling low, they do not seek the truth. Does this not delay things? Sometimes, when you are not getting along well with your partner, you do not seek truth principles, and you live by the philosophies of Satan. Sometimes when you are cooperating with others and their caliber is better than yours and they are better than you, you feel constrained by them, and you don't have the courage to uphold principles when you encounter an issue. Sometimes you are better than your partner, and they act stupidly, and you look down on them and are unwilling to fellowship the truth with them. Sometimes you wish to practice the truth but are governed by the emotions of the flesh. Sometimes you covet the pleasures of the flesh, and though you may wish to, you are not able to turn your back on the flesh. Sometimes you listen to a sermon and understand the truth, yet are unable to put it into practice. Are these problems easy to solve? By yourself, they are not easy to solve. God can only subject people to trials and refinement, making them suffer greatly and eventually feel emptiness within themselves without the truth, and as if they cannot live without the truth. This refines people to develop faith and makes them feel as if they must strive for the truth, that their heart will not be at ease until they put the truth into practice, and that they will experience great torment if they cannot obey God. Such is the effect achieved by trials and refinement. This is how difficult changes in disposition are. Why do I tell you they are not easy? Could it be that I am not afraid you will grow negative? It is to let you know how important changes in disposition are. I wish for you to all pay attention to this, to stop pursuing those unrealistic, hypocritical, and falsely spiritual images, to stop always following those fanciful spiritual doctrines, practices, and rules; doing so will harm you and not benefit you at all.

We just spoke of one aspect of disposition: intransigence. Intransigence is often a kind of attitude that is hidden within the depths of people's hearts. Generally, it is not clear from the outside, but when it is obvious, it will be easy to detect, and people will say, "They're recalcitrant! They don't accept the truth at all—they are so intransigent!" Those with an intransigent disposition fixate on one approach, and only stick to one thing, never letting go. So is this the only side of people's disposition? Of course not there are many others. See if you can tell what kind of disposition I am describing next. Some people say, "In the house of God, I obey no one but God, because only God has the truth; people do not have the truth, they have corrupt dispositions, nothing they say can be relied upon, so I only obey God." Are they correct in saying this? (No.) Why not? What kind of disposition is this? (An arrogant and conceited one.) (The dispositions of Satan and the archangel.) This is an arrogant disposition. Do not always say it is the disposition of Satan and the archangel, this way of speaking is too broad and is vague. Satan and the archangel's corrupt dispositions are too numerous. Talk of the archangel, demons, and Satan all together is too general and not easy for people to understand. Just saying this is an arrogant disposition is more specific. Of course, this isn't the only kind of disposition they reveal, it's just that an arrogant disposition reveals itself so obviously. By saying this is an arrogant disposition, people will be able to understand easily, so this way of speaking is most suitable. Some people have some skills, some gifts, some minor aptitudes, and have done a number of deeds for the church. What these people think is, "Your faith in God involves spending all day reading, copying, writing, memorizing the word of God like some spiritual person. What's the point? Can you do anything real? How can you call yourself spiritual when you don't do anything? You do not have life. I have life, everything I do is real." What disposition is this? They have some special skills, some gifts, they can do a little good, and they take these things to be life. As a result, they obey no one, they are not afraid of lecturing anyone, they look down on everyone else—is this arrogance? (Yes.) This is arrogance. Under what circumstances do people generally reveal arrogance? (When they have some gifts or special skills, when they can do some practical things, when they have capital.) That is one kind of situation. So are people who are not gifted or don't have any special skills not arrogant? (They are arrogant, too.) The person we just spoke of will often say, "I obey no one but God," and hearing this, people will think to themselves, "How obedient to the truth this person is, they obey no one but the truth, what they say is right!" In fact, within these seemingly correct words is a kind of arrogant disposition: "I obey no one but God" clearly means that they don't obey anyone. I ask you, are those who say such words really able to obey God? They could never obey God. Those who are liable to utter such words are undoubtedly the most arrogant of all. On the outside, what they said seems right—but in fact, this is the most conniving way in which arrogant disposition is manifested. They use this "but God" to try to prove that they are reasonable, but really, that is like burying gold and sticking a sign on top saying "No gold buried here." Is this not foolish? What do you say, which kind of person is the most arrogant? What things can people say that make them the most arrogant? Perhaps you have heard some arrogant things before. What is the most arrogant of these? Do you know? Does anyone dare to say, "I don't obey anyone—not even Heaven or earth, not even the words of God"? Only the great red dragon demon dares to say this. No one who believes in God would say this. However, if those who believe in God say, "I obey no one but God," then they are not much different from the great red dragon, they're tied for world number one, they are the most arrogant of all. What do you say, people are all arrogant, but is there any difference in their arrogance? Where do you make the distinction? Corrupt human beings all have arrogant dispositions, but there are differences in their arrogance. When a person's arrogance has reached a certain degree, then they have lost all sense. The distinction is whether there is sense to what someone says. Some people are arrogant yet still possess a little reason. If they are able to accept the truth, then they still have hope of salvation. Some are so arrogant that they have no sense—there is no limit to their arrogance—and such people could never accept the truth. If people are so arrogant that they have no sense, then they lose all sense of shame and are only foolishly arrogant. These are all revelations and manifestations of an arrogant disposition. How could they say something like "I obey no one but God" if they did not have an arrogant disposition? They certainly would not. Without doubt, if someone has an arrogant disposition, then they have the manifestation of arrogance, and the person will undoubtedly say and do arrogant things, lacking any kind of sense. Some people say, "I do not have an arrogant disposition, but such things are revealed in me." Do such words hold water? (No.) Others say, "I can't help myself. As soon as I stop being careful, I come out with something arrogant." Do these words hold water? (No.) Why not? What is the root cause of these words? (Not knowing oneself.) No—they know they are arrogant, but hearing others mocking them, saying, "How are you so arrogant? What are you so arrogant about?" they feel ashamed, which is why they say such things. Their sense of pride can't stand it, they are looking for an excuse to cover it up, to disguise it, to package it, and to let themselves off the hook. So their words do not hold water. When your corrupt disposition has yet to be resolved, you are arrogant even when you do not speak. Arrogance is in people's natures, it is hidden in their hearts, and can emerge at any time. And so, as long as there is no change in disposition, people remain arrogant and self-righteous. I'll give an example. A newly elected leader arrives at a church and discovers that the way the people look at him and the expression on their faces is rather unenthusiastic. In his mind, he thinks to himself, "Am I not welcome here? I am the newly chosen leader; how could you treat me with such an attitude? Why aren't you impressed by me? I was chosen by the brothers and sisters, so my spiritual stature is greater than yours, is it not?" And so as a result, he says, "I am the newly elected leader. Some people might not accept me, but no matter. Let's have a competition to see who has memorized more passages of God's words, who is able to fellowship the truths of visions. I will give the position of leader to anyone who can fellowship truths more clearly than me. What do you say?" What kind of tactic is this? When people are indifferent to him, he is discontent and wants to give them a hard time and get back at them; now that he is a leader, he wants to dominate people—he wants to be on top. What disposition is this? (Arrogance.) And is an arrogant disposition easy to resolve? (No.) People's arrogant dispositions reveal themselves very frequently. To some people, hearing others fellowship new enlightenment and understanding is galling: "Why do I have nothing to say about this? This will not do, I have to think and come up with something better." And so they spew a load of doctrine, trying to outdo others. What disposition is this? This is vying for name and gain; it is also arrogance. In matters of disposition, you could be sitting still, not saying or doing anything, but the disposition will still exist within your heart and within your thoughts, and even your expression could reveal this. Even if people try to come up with ways of suppressing it, or controlling it, and are ever so careful to stop it from being revealed, is this any use? (No.) Some people immediately realize when they've said something arrogant: "I've revealed my arrogant disposition yet again—how humiliating! I must never say anything arrogant again." But swearing you'll keep your mouth shut is of no use, this is not up to you, it is up to your disposition. Therefore, if you do not want your arrogant disposition to reveal itself, you must fix it. This is not a matter of correcting a few words, or of putting right one of the ways you do things, much less is it a case of abiding by some rule. It is a matter of resolving the problem of your disposition. Now that I have spoken on this topic of what exactly disposition is, do you not have a deeper and more penetrating understanding of yourselves? (Yes.) Knowing oneself is not a matter of knowing one's outward-facing character, temperament, bad habits, ignorant and foolish things one has done in the past—it is none of these. Rather, it is knowing one's own corrupt disposition and the evils one is able to do in opposition to God. This is key. Some people say, "I have an explosive temper, and there's nothing I can do to change it. When can I change this disposition?" There are others who say, "I'm terrible at expressing myself, I'm not a good talker. Everything I say ends up offending people or hurting their feelings. When will this change?" Are they correct in saying this? (No.) Where is their mistake? (This is not recognizing the things within one's nature.) That's right. Character does not determine nature. No matter how good someone's personality is, they can still have a corrupt disposition.

I just talked about two aspects of disposition. The first was intransigence, the second arrogance. We don't need to say too much about arrogance. Every person reveals much arrogant behavior, and you just need to know that arrogance is an aspect of disposition. There is also another kind of disposition. Some people never tell anyone the truth. They deliberate on and polish everything in their minds before they speak to people. You can't tell which of the things they say are true, and which are false. They say one thing today and another tomorrow, they say one thing to one person, and something else to another. Everything they say contradicts itself. How can such people be believed? It's very difficult to get an accurate grasp of the facts, and you can't get a straight word out of them. What disposition is this? It is deceitfulness. Is a deceitful disposition easy to change? It's the most difficult to change. Anything that involves dispositions relates to a person's nature, and nothing is harder to change than things to do with one's nature. The saying, "A leopard can't change its spots," is absolutely true! No matter what they're talking about or doing, deceitful people always harbor their own aims and intents. If they do not have any, they will say nothing. If you try to understand what their aims and intents are, they will clam up. If they do accidentally let something true slip, they'll go to any length to think of a way to twist it around, to confound you and stop you from knowing the truth. No matter what deceitful people are doing, they will not let anyone know the whole truth about it. No matter how much time people spend with them, no one knows what's really going on in their minds. Such is the nature of deceitful people. No matter how much a deceitful person speaks, other people will never know what their intents are, what they're really thinking, or exactly what they are trying to achieve. Even their parents have a hard time knowing this. Trying to understand deceitful people is extremely difficult, nobody can figure out what is on their minds. This is how deceitful people speak and act: They never speak their minds or convey what is really going on. This is a type of disposition, is it not? When you have a deceitful disposition, it does not matter what you say or do this disposition is always within you, controlling you, making you play games and engage in trickery, toy with people, cover up the truth, and put up a front. This is deceitfulness. What other specific behaviors do deceitful people engage in? I will give an example. Two people are talking, and one of them is speaking about their self-knowledge; this person keeps talking about how they have improved, and tries to make the other person believe this, but they do not tell them the real facts of the matter. In this, something is being concealed, and this indicates a certain disposition—that of deceitfulness. Let us see if you can discern it. This person says, "I've experienced some things recently, and I feel that over these years my belief in God has been in vain. I haven't gained anything. I am so poor and pathetic! My behavior hasn't been too good recently, but I'm ready to repent." Yet a while after they say this, an expression of repentance is nowhere to be seen in them. What is the problem here? It is that they lie and trick others. When other people hear them say those things, they think, "This person did not pursue the truth before, but the fact that they can say such things now shows that they have truly repented. There's no doubt about it. We mustn't look at them as we used to, but in a new, better light." That is how people ponder and think after hearing those words. But is that person's current state the same as they say it is? The reality is that it is not. They have not truly repented, but their words give the illusion that they have done so, and that they have changed for the better, and that they are different from before. This is what they want to achieve with their words. By speaking in this way to trick people, what disposition are they revealing? It is deceitfulness—and it is very insidious! The fact is that they are not at all aware that they have failed in their belief in God, that they are poor and pitiful. They are borrowing spiritual words and language to trick people, to achieve their aim of making others think well of them and hold a good opinion of them. Is this not deceitfulness? It is, and when someone is too deceitful, it is not easy for them to change.

There is another sort of person that is never simple or open in how they speak. They are always hiding and concealing things, gleaning information from people at every turn and sounding them out. They always wish to know the whole truth about other people, yet they do not say what is in their own hearts. Nobody who interacts with them can ever hope to find out the whole truth about them. Such people do not want others to know their plans, and they share them with no one. What disposition is this? It is a deceitful disposition. Such people are extremely shrewd, they are unfathomable to everyone. If one possesses a deceitful disposition, they are without a doubt a deceitful person, and they are deceitful in nature essence. Does this sort of person pursue the truth in their belief in God? If they do not tell the truth in front of other people, are they capable of speaking the truth before God? Certainly not. A deceitful person never tells the truth. They may believe in God, but is theirs true belief? What sort of attitude do they have toward God? They will certainly have many doubts in their heart: "Where is God? I can't see Him. What proof is there that He is real?" "God is sovereign over everything? Really? Satan's regime is frantically oppressing and arresting those who believe in God. Why doesn't God destroy it?" "How exactly does God save people? Is His salvation real? It's not so clear." "Can a believer in God enter the kingdom of heaven or not? Without any confirmation, it's hard to say." With so many doubts about God in their heart, can they sincerely expend themselves for Him? It is impossible. They see all these people who have forsaken all they have to follow God, who are expending themselves for God and performing their duties, and they think, "I need to hold something back. I can't be as foolish as they are. If I offer everything to God, how will I live in the future? Who will look after me? I need to have a contingency plan." You can see how "astute" deceitful people are, how far ahead they think. There are some who, when they see others in gatherings opening up about their knowledge of their corruption, offering up the things hidden within their hearts in fellowship, and truthfully saying how many times they have committed fornication, think, "You fool! Those are private things; why would you tell them to others? You couldn't beat those things out of me!" This is how deceitful people are—they would rather die than be honest, and they tell no one the whole truth. Some people say, "I've transgressed and done some bad things, and I feel a little ashamed to tell people about them face-to-face. They are private things, after all, and they are shameful. But I can't hide or conceal them from God. I should tell these things to God, nakedly and openly. I wouldn't dare tell other people my thoughts or private matters, but I have to tell God. No matter who else I keep secrets from, I can't keep secrets from God." This is the attitude an honest person takes toward God. Yet deceitful people are guarded toward everyone, they do not trust anyone, and they do not speak honestly with anyone. They tell the whole truth to no one, and no one can figure them out. These are the most deceitful people of all. Everyone has a deceitful disposition; the only difference is in how severe it is. Though you may open your heart and fellowship your problems in gatherings, does that mean that you do not have a deceitful disposition? It does not, you have one as well. Why do I say this? Here is an example: You may be able to open yourself up in fellowship about things that do not touch on your pride or vanity, things that are not shameful, and things that you will not be pruned and dealt with for—but if you had done something that violates the truth principles, something that everyone would loathe and be revolted by, would you be able to fellowship openly about it in gatherings? And if you had done something unspeakable, it would be even harder for you to open up and reveal the truth about it. Were someone to look into it or try to assign blame for it, you would use all means at your disposal to hide it, and you would be terrified that this matter might be revealed. You would always be trying to cover it up and get away with it. Is this not a deceitful disposition? You may believe that if you do not say it out loud, no one will know of it, and that even God would have no way to do anything to you. That is mistaken! God looks upon people's innermost being. If you cannot perceive this, you do not know God at all. Deceitful people do not merely trick others—they even dare to try to trick God and use deceitful means to resist Him. Can such people attain God's salvation? God's disposition is righteous and holy, and deceitful people are what He loathes most. So, deceitful people are those for whom it is hardest to attain salvation. People with a deceitful nature are those who lie the most. They will even lie to God and try to trick Him, and they are obstinately unrepentant. This means that they cannot attain God's salvation. If someone only reveals a corrupt disposition every now and then, if they lie and trick people but are simple and open with God and repent to Him, then this kind of person still has hope of attaining salvation. If you are truly a person with sense, you should open yourself up to God, speak to Him from the heart, and reflect and know yourself. You should not lie to God anymore, you should not try to trick Him at any time, and even less still should you try to hide anything from Him. The fact is that there are some things people do not need to know about. So long as you are open with God about them, that is fine. When you do things, be sure not to keep secrets from God. You can say to God all those things that are not fit to say to other people. A person who does so is smart. Though there may be some things they feel no need to open up to others about, this should not be called deceitfulness. Deceitful people are different: They believe that they should hide everything, that they cannot tell anything to other people, especially when it comes to private matters. If it will not benefit them to say something, they will not say it, even to God. Is this not a deceitful disposition? Such a person is deceitful, indeed! If someone is so deceitful that they do not tell God the truth, and keep everything secret from God, are they even someone who believes in God? Do they have true faith in God? They are a person who doubts God, and in their heart, they do not believe Him. So, is their faith not false? They are a nonbeliever, a false believer. Do you have times where you doubt God and become guarded against Him? (Yes.) To doubt God and to be guarded against Him, what kind of disposition is this? This is a deceitful disposition. Everybody has a deceitful disposition, it is just a matter of severity. So long as you can accept the truth, you will be able to achieve repentance and change.

For some people, when something happens to them, they reveal a corrupt disposition, they have notions and ideas, they have prejudices about other people, and they make judgments about them and undermine them behind their backs. They can reflect on themselves and be completely open about these things, but when they do certain shameful things, they want to keep to themselves, and forever shut within their hearts. Not only do they not speak of these things with others, but they don't tell God of them when they pray. They even try everything they can to come up with falsehoods to cover these things up or camouflage them. This is a deceitful disposition. When you have such thoughts, when you live in this kind of state, you should reflect on yourself, and see clearly that you are not someone honest, that nothing of what God describes as an honest person is expressed in you, that you are well and truly someone deceitful, and that even though you are stupid, of poor caliber, and slow-witted, you are still someone deceitful. This is what it means to know yourself. The very least you should be able to achieve in knowing yourself is being able to clearly see and discern the obvious corruption you reveal, and being able to seek the truth in order to address this. If you truly know your own deceitful disposition, you should often pray to God, reflect on yourself, discern and dissect your deceitful disposition in accordance with God's word, and perceive its essence; then you will have hope of escaping your corrupt disposition of deceitfulness. Some people can't clearly tell the difference between deceitful people and honest people—which means their caliber is too poor. Some people often use their poor caliber, foolishness, ignorance, clumsiness with words, awkwardness, and liability to be cheated as evidence of honesty. They're always telling others, "I'm too honest, I often get the worst of it as a result, I don't know how to take advantage of others—yet God likes me because I am an honest person." Are these words right? Such words are ludicrous, they are designed to dupe people, they are barefaced and shameless. How could people who are foolish and stupid be honest? These are two different things. It is a major mistake to treat the stupid things you have done as honesty. Everyone can see that even fools are liable to be arrogant and conceited, to think highly of themselves. No matter how ignorant and lacking in caliber people are, they can still lie and deceive others. Is all this not fact? Do fools and people of poor caliber really never do anything bad? Do they really not have corrupt dispositions? They most definitely do. Some people also say they are honest and they open up about their lies to others, but they don't dare open up about the shameful things they do. When the church deals with them for their problems, they are unable to accept it and do not submit at all, preferring to poke around behind the scenes and ease out the truth. This kind of deceitful person does not accept the truth at all, and they do not submit whatsoever, yet they still think themselves honest. Is this not absolutely shameless of them? This is utter foolishness! This kind of person is absolutely not honest, nor are they guileless. Stupid people are stupid people; fools are fools. Only guileless people who are not deceitful are honest.

How can deceitful people be discerned? What are the behaviors of deceitful people? No matter who they associate or engage with, they never allow anyone to probe at what is really going on with them; they are always wary of others, they are always doing things behind people's backs, and they never say what they're really thinking. They may sometimes speak a bit about knowing themselves, but they make no mention of the crucial points or key words, and they are terrified of letting something slip. They are very sensitive to these things, out of fear that others might spot their weak points. This is a kind of deceitful disposition. Also, some people deliberately put on a facade so that others think they are guileless, that they can endure suffering and not complain, or that they are spiritual and that they love and pursue the truth. They are clearly not this kind of person, but they insist on putting on this act for others. This is also a deceitful disposition. All that deceitful people say and do has an intent behind it. If they did not have any intents, they would not speak or act. There is a disposition inside them that governs them to do so, and that is the disposition of deceitfulness. When people have a deceitful disposition, is it easy to change? How much have you changed? Have you entered onto the path of the pursuit of honesty? (Yes, this is the direction we're working toward.) How many steps have you taken? Or are you stuck at the stage of wanting to do it? (It's still just something we want to do. Sometimes, it is only after we have done something that we realize that it involved deception, that we were trying to give people a false impression; only then do we realize we were being deceitful.) You realize this is being deceitful—but were you able to realize it is a kind of corrupt disposition? And just where do these deceitful things come from? (From our nature.) That's right, from your nature. And do these corrupt things disturb you? They are hard to get away from, hard to deal with, hard to escape—and very troublesome, too. What makes them troublesome? What about them pains you? (We want to change, but feel very pained when we don't manage to.) That's one aspect, but it doesn't count as troublesome. When a person is controlled by a deceitful disposition, they can lie to and cheat others at any time or place, and no matter what happens to them, they will be thinking of how to tell lies to cheat and deceive people. Even if they want to control themselves, they are unable to, it's involuntary. This is where the problem lies. This is a problem of disposition. In how many ways can a deceitful disposition reveal itself? In probing, deception, wariness, as well as suspicion, pretense, and falsehood. The disposition which such behaviors expose and manifest is deceitfulness. After fellowshiping these topics, do you have a clearer knowledge of the deceitful disposition? Are there still those of you who say, "I do not have a deceitful disposition, I am not a deceitful person, I am close to being an honest person"? (No.) There are many people who do not quite understand what an honest person is, exactly. Some say that honest people are those who are guileless and straightforward, who are bullied and excluded wherever they go, or who are slow and always speak and act half a beat behind other people. Some fools and ignorant people, who engage in such folly that others look down on them, also describe themselves as honest people. And all those uneducated people from the lower rungs of society, who feel themselves to be inferior, likewise say that they are honest people. Wherein lies their mistake? They do not know what an honest person is. What is the source of their misapprehension? The main reason is that they do not understand the truth. They believe that the "honest people" God speaks of are fools and idiots, that they are uneducated, slow of speech and tongue, bullied and oppressed, and easily duped and swindled. The implication is that the objects of God's salvation are those brainless people at the bottom of society who are often pushed around by others. Who will God save if not these lowly, impoverished people? Isn't this what they believe? Are those really the people God saves? This is a mistaken interpretation of God's will. The people God saves are the ones who love the truth, who have caliber and the comprehension ability, they are all people who have conscience and sense, who are able to fulfill God's commissions and do their duty well. They are people who are able to accept the truth and cast off their corrupt dispositions, and they are people who truly love God, obey God, and worship God. Although most of these people are from the bottom of society, from the families of workers and farmers, they are definitely not muddle-headed people, simpletons, or good-for-nothings. On the contrary, they are clever people who are able to accept, practice and submit to the truth. They are all righteous people, who would forsake worldly glory and riches to follow God and gain the truth and life—they are the wisest people of all. These are all honest people who truly believe in God and who truly expend themselves for Him. They can gain God's approval and blessings, and they can be perfected into His people and the pillars of His temple. They are people of gold, silver, and precious jewels. It is those muddle-headed, foolish, absurd, and good-for-nothing people who will be cast out. What do the nonbelievers and absurd people view God's work and management plan as? As a dumping ground, no? These people are not only of poor caliber, they are also absurd. No matter how many of God's words they read, they cannot understand the truth, and no matter how many sermons they hear, they are incapable of entering reality—if they are this foolish, can they still be saved? Could God want this kind of person? No matter how many years they have been a believer, they still don't understand any truths, they still talk nonsense, and yet they still consider themselves honest—do they have no shame? Such people do not understand the truth. They are always misinterpreting God's will, and yet everywhere they go, they bang on about their misinterpretations, preaching them as truth, telling people, "It's good to be bullied a little, people should lose out a bit, they should be a little foolish—these are the objects of God's salvation and they are the people that God will save." People who say such things are disgusting; this brings great humiliation upon God! It is so disgusting! The pillars of God's kingdom and the overcomers that God saves are all people who understand the truth, and who are wise. These are the ones who shall have a share in the heavenly kingdom. All those who are foolish and ignorant, shameless and senseless, who do not have a shred of understanding of the truth, who are simpletons and fools are they not all good-for-nothings? How could such people have a share in the heavenly kingdom? The honest people God speaks of are those who can put the truth into practice once they understand it, who are wise and smart, who open themselves up to God simply, and who act according to principle and obey God absolutely. These people all have God-fearing hearts, they focus on doing things according to the principles, and they all pursue absolute obedience to God and love God in their hearts. Only they are truly honest people. If someone doesn't even know what it means to be honest, if they cannot see that the essence of honest people is absolute obedience to God, fearing God and shunning evil, or that honest people are honest because they love the truth, because they love God, and because they practice the truth—then that kind of person is so foolish, and truly lacking in discernment. Honest people are absolutely not the guileless, muddleheaded, ignorant, and foolish individuals that people imagine; they are people with normal humanity, who have conscience and reason. What is clever about honest people is that they are able to listen to God's words and be honest, and this is why they are blessed by God.

Nothing has greater significance than God's request that people be honest—He is asking that people live before Him, that they accept His scrutiny, and that they live in the light. Only honest people are true members of the human race. People who are not honest are beasts, they are animals walking around in human clothing, they are not human beings. To pursue being an honest person, you must behave in accordance with God's requirements; you must undergo judgment, chastisement, being dealt with and pruned. When your corrupt disposition is cleansed and you are able to practice the truth and live by God's words, only then will you be an honest person. People who are ignorant, foolish, and guileless are absolutely not honest people. By demanding that people be honest, God is asking them to possess normal humanity, to cast off their deceitfulness and disguises, to not lie to or trick others, to perform their duty with loyalty, and be able to truly love and obey Him. Only these individuals are the people of God's kingdom. God demands that people be the good soldiers of Christ. What are the good soldiers of Christ? They must be equipped with the truth reality and be of one heart and mind with Christ. At any time and any place, they must be able to exalt and testify to God, and able to use the truth to wage war with Satan. In all things, they must stand on God's side, bear testimony, and live out the truth reality. They must be able to humiliate Satan and win marvelous victories for God. That is what it means to be a good soldier of Christ. The good soldiers of Christ are overcomers, they are those who overcome Satan. In requiring that people be honest and not deceitful, God is not asking them to be fools, but to rid themselves of their deceitful dispositions, achieve submission to Him and bring glory to Him. This is what can be achieved by practicing the truth. This is not a change in one's behavior, it is not a matter of speaking more or speaking less, nor is it about how one acts. Rather, it is about the intent behind one's speech and actions, one's thoughts and ideas, one's ambitions and desires. Everything that belongs to outpourings of corrupt disposition and to error must be changed at its root, so that it aligns with the truth. If one is to achieve a change in disposition, they must be able to see through to the essence of Satan's disposition. If you can see through to the essence of a deceitful disposition, that it is Satan's disposition and the face of the devil, if you can hate Satan and forsake the devil, then it will be easy for you to cast off your corrupt disposition. If you do not know that there is a deceitful state within you, if you do not recognize the outpourings of a deceitful disposition, then you will not know how to seek the truth to resolve this, and it will be hard for you to change your deceitful disposition. You must first recognize what things pour forth from you, and which aspect of a corrupt disposition they are. If the things that you reveal are of a deceitful disposition, will you despise it in your heart? And if you do, how should you change? You have to deal with your intents and correct your views. You must first seek the truth on this matter to resolve your problems, strive to achieve what God asks and satisfy Him, and become someone who does not try to trick God or other people, even those who are a little foolish or ignorant. Trying to trick someone who is foolish or ignorant is very immoral—it makes you the devil. To be an honest person, you must not trick or lie to anyone. To devils and Satan, however, you must choose your words wisely; if you do not, you are liable to be made a fool of by them and bring shame upon God. Only by choosing your words wisely and practicing the truth, will you be able to overcome and shame Satan. People who are ignorant, foolish, and stubborn will never be able to understand the truth; they can only be duped, toyed with, and trampled by Satan, and ultimately, devoured.

Next, let us speak of the fourth kind of disposition. During gatherings, some people can fellowship a little on their own states, but when it comes to the essence of issues, to their personal motives and ideas, they become evasive. When people expose them as having motives and aims, they appear to nod and admit to it. But when people try to expose or analyze anything deeper, they can't stand it, they get up and leave. Why, at the crucial moment, do they slip away? (They do not accept the truth and are unwilling to face their own problems.) This is a problem of disposition. When they are unwilling to accept the truth in order to solve the problems within them, does this not mean they are sick of the truth? What kinds of sermons are some leaders and workers least willing to hear? (Sermons on how to discern antichrists and false leaders.) Correct. They think, "All this talk of identifying antichrists and false leaders, and about Pharisees—why do you go on about this so much? You're stressing me out." Hearing that there will be talk of identifying false leaders and workers, they find any excuse to leave. What is meant by "leave" here? This refers to slipping away, to hiding. Why do they try to hide? When other people speak facts, you should listen: Listening is good for you. Note down the things that are harsh or that you find hard to accept; then you should think on these things often, take them in slowly, and change slowly. So why hide? Such people feel that these words of judgment are too harsh and that they are not easy to hear, so resistance and antipathy develop within them. They say to themselves, "I am not an antichrist or false leader—why keep going on about me? Why not talk about other people? Say something about identifying evil people, don't talk about me!" They become evasive and oppositional. What disposition is this? If they are unwilling to accept the truth, and always reasoning and arguing in defense of themselves, is there not the problem of a corrupt disposition here? This is a disposition of being sick of the truth. Leaders and workers have this kind of state, so what about ordinary brothers and sisters? (They do, too.) When everyone first meets, they are all so loving and quite happy to parrot words and doctrines. They all seem to love the truth. But when it comes to personal problems and real difficulties, many people go dumb. For example, some people are constantly constrained by marriage. They become unwilling to do a duty or pursue the truth, and marriage becomes their largest obstacle and greatest encumbrance. At gatherings, when everyone is fellowshiping on this state, they match the others' words of fellowship against themselves and feel they are talking about them. They say, "I have no problem with you fellowshiping the truth, but why bring up me? Do you not have any problems? Why only talk about me?" What disposition is this? When you gather to fellowship the truth, you must dissect real issues and allow everyone to speak on their understanding of these problems; only then are you able to know yourselves and solve your problems. Why can't people accept this? What disposition is it when people are incapable of accepting being pruned and dealt with, and cannot accept the truth? Shouldn't you discern this clearly? These are all the manifestations of being sick of the truth—this is the essence of the problem. When people are sick of the truth, it is very difficult for them to accept the truth—and if they cannot accept the truth, can the problem of their corrupt disposition be fixed? (No.) So someone like this, someone who is incapable of accepting the truth—are they able to obtain the truth? Can they be saved by God? Definitely not. Do people who don't accept the truth sincerely believe in God? Absolutely not. The most important aspect of people who truly believe in God is being able to accept the truth. People who cannot accept the truth absolutely do not sincerely believe in God. Are such people able to sit still during a sermon? Are they able to gain anything? They cannot. This is because sermons reveal people's various corrupt states. Through the dissection of God's words, people gain knowledge, and then, by going on to fellowship the principles of practice, they are given a path to practice, and in this way an effect is achieved. When such people hear that the state that is being revealed relates to them that it relates to their own issues—their shame drives them into a fit of rage, and they may even get up and leave the gathering. Even if they don't leave, they may start to feel irritated and wronged inside, in which case there is no point in them attending the gathering or listening to the sermon. Is the purpose of listening to sermons not to understand the truth and solve one's own real problems? If you are always afraid of your own problems being exposed, if you are constantly fearful of being mentioned, why believe in God at all? If in your faith you can't accept the truth, you don't really believe in God. If you are always afraid of being exposed, how are you going to be able to resolve your problem of corruption? If you can't resolve your problem of corruption, what is the point in believing in God? The purpose of faith in God is to accept God's salvation, cast off your corrupt disposition, and live out the likeness of a true human being, all of which are achieved through accepting the truth. If you can't accept the truth at all, or even being dealt with or exposed, then you have no way of attaining God's salvation. So tell Me: In each church, how many are there who can accept the truth? Are those who cannot accept the truth many or few? (Many.) Is this a situation that really exists among the chosen ones in the churches, is it a real problem? All those who are unable to accept the truth and unable to accept being dealt with and being pruned, are sick of the truth. Being sick of the truth is a kind of corrupt disposition, and if this disposition cannot be changed, can they be saved? Certainly not. Today, many people have a hard time accepting the truth. It is by no means easy. To resolve this, a person has to experience some of God's judgment, chastisement, trials, and refinement. So what do you say: What disposition is it when people are incapable of accepting being pruned and dealt with, when they do not compare themselves to God's word or the states revealed during sermons? (A disposition of being sick of the truth.) This is the fourth corrupt disposition: being sick of the truth. How sick are they? (They do not wish to read God's words, or listen to sermons, and do not wish to fellowship the truth.) These are the most obvious manifestations. When someone says, for example, "You truly believe in God. You have put aside family and career to perform a duty, and have suffered much and paid a considerable price over the past several years. God blesses such people. God's word says that those who sincerely expend for God shall be greatly blessed," you say amen and accept such truths. However, when the person goes on to say, "But you must keep striving for the truth! If people always have motives in what they do, and always run amok in accordance with their own intentions, then sooner or later they shall offend God and incur His loathing," when they say things like this, you can't accept it. Hearing the truth being fellowshiped, you are not only incapable of accepting it, but also grow angry, and in your mind, you retort: "You spend all day fellowshiping the truth, but I haven't seen any of you go to heaven." What disposition is this? (Being sick of the truth.) When talk turns to practice, when people get serious with you, there is exhibited in you the utmost aversion, impatience, and resistance. This is being sick of the truth. And how is the kind of disposition that is being sick of the truth chiefly manifested? In refusing to accept being pruned and dealt with. Not accepting being pruned and dealt with is one kind of state manifested by this kind of disposition. In their hearts, these people are especially resistant when they are dealt with. They think, "I don't want to hear it! I don't want to hear it!" or, "Why not deal with other people? Why pick on me?" What is the meaning of being sick of the truth? Being sick of the truth is when a person is completely uninterested in anything connected to positive things, to the truth, to what God asks, or to God's will. Sometimes they have an aversion to these things, sometimes they are aloof to them, sometimes they are irreverent and indifferent, and treat them as unimportant, and they are insincere and cursory toward them, or take no responsibility for them. The chief manifestation of being sick of the truth is not just an aversion when people hear the truth. It also includes unwillingness to practice the truth, shrinking back when the time comes to practice the truth, as if the truth has nothing to do with them. When some people fellowship during gatherings, they seem very animated, they like repeating words and doctrines and making lofty statements to mislead and win others over. They seem full of energy and in high spirits as they do this, and they go on and on endlessly. Others, meanwhile, spend all day from morning to night busy with matters of faith, reading God's words, praying, listening to hymns, taking notes, as if they cannot be apart from God for even a moment. From dawn till dusk, they busy themselves with the performance of their duty. Do these people really love the truth? Do they not have the disposition of being sick of the truth? When can their true state be seen? (When the time comes to practice the truth, they run away, and they are not willing to accept being pruned and dealt with.) Could this be because they don't understand what they hear or is it because they don't understand the truth that they are unwilling to accept it? The answer is neither of these. They are governed by their nature. This is a problem of disposition. In their hearts, these people know full well that God's words are the truth, that they are positive, and that practicing the truth can bring about changes in people's dispositions and make them able to fulfill God's will—but they do not accept them or put them into practice. This is being sick of the truth. In whom have you seen the disposition of being sick of the truth? (The nonbelievers.) The nonbelievers are sick of the truth, that is very clear. God has no way of saving such people. So among the believers of God, in what matters have you seen people being sick of the truth? It may be that when you fellowshiped the truth with them, they did not stand up and leave, and when the fellowship touched upon their own difficulties and issues, they faced them correctly—and yet they still have the disposition of being sick of the truth. Where can this be seen? (They often hear sermons, but they don't put the truth into practice.) People who do not put the truth into practice unquestionably have the disposition of being sick of the truth. Some people are occasionally able to put into practice a little of the truth, so do they have the disposition of being sick of the truth? Such a disposition is likewise found in those who practice the truth, just to varying degrees. Your being able to practice the truth does not mean you do not have a disposition of being sick of the truth. Practicing the truth does not mean your life disposition has changed immediately—that is not the case. You must resolve the problem of your corrupt disposition, this is the only way to attain change in your life disposition. Practicing the truth on one occasion does not mean you no longer have a corrupt disposition. You are capable of practicing the truth in one area, but you are not necessarily able to practice the truth in other areas. The contexts and reasons involved are different, but what's most important is that a corrupt disposition does exist, which is the root of the problem. Therefore, once a person's disposition has changed, all of their difficulties, pretexts and excuses involved in practicing the truth—these problems are all fixed, and all of their disobedience, defects, and faults are solved. If people's dispositions do not change, they will always have difficulty practicing the truth, and there will always be pretexts and excuses. If you wish to be able to practice the truth and obey God in all things, there must first be a change in your disposition. Only then will you be able to solve problems at their roots.

What is the disposition of being sick of the truth mainly in reference to? Let us first discuss a type of state. Some people have a strong interest in listening to sermons, and the more they listen to fellowship on the truth the brighter their hearts become and the more elated they become. They have an attitude of positivity and proactivity. Does this prove they do not have the disposition of being sick of the truth? (No.) For example, some children aged seven or eight are interested when they hear about faith in God, and they always read God's word and attend gatherings with their parents, and some people say, "This child does not have a disposition of being sick of the truth, they are very clever, they were born to believe in God, they were chosen by God." They may well have been chosen by God, but these words are only half right. This is because they are still young, and the direction of their pursuit and their aims in life have yet to take shape. When their outlooks on life and society have yet to take shape, it can be said that their young souls love positive things, but you cannot say that they do not have a disposition of being sick of the truth. Why do I say this? They are of a young age. Their humanity is still immature, they lack any experience, their horizons are limited, and they do not understand, at all, what the truth is. They merely have a taste for positive things. You cannot say that they love the truth, much less that they are possessed of the truth reality. What's more, children have no experience and so nobody can see just what is hidden within their hearts, what kind of nature essence they have. Simply because they are interested in the faith in God and listening to sermons, people determine that they love the truth which is a manifestation of ignorance and foolishness, because children have no knowledge of what the truth is, and so one can't even mention the matter of whether they like the truth or are sick of the truth. Being sick of the truth mainly refers to a lack of interest and an antipathy toward the truth and positive things. Being sick of the truth is when people are able to understand the truth and know what positive things are, and yet still treat the truth and positive things with an attitude and state that is resistant, perfunctory, averse, prevaricating, and indifferent. This is the disposition of being sick of the truth. Does this kind of disposition exist in everyone? Some people say, "Even though I know the word of God is the truth, I still don't like it or accept it, or at least, I can't accept it right now." What is the matter here? This is being sick of the truth. The disposition inside them does not allow them to accept the truth. What specific manifestations are there of not accepting the truth? Some say, "I understand all the truths, but I just can't put them into practice." This reveals that this is a person who is sick of the truth, and that they don't love the truth, and so they can't put any truths into practice. Some people say, "That I have been able to earn so much money is down to God. God has truly blessed me, God has been so good to me, God has given me great riches. My whole family is well-clothed and fed, and they want for neither clothes nor food." Seeing that they have been blessed by God, these people thank God in their heart, they know that this was all governed by God, and that if they had not been blessed by God—if they had relied on their own talents—they would absolutely not have earned all this money. This is what they really think in their heart, what they truly know, and they truly give thanks to God. But a day comes when their business fails, when times are hard for them, and they suffer poverty. Why is this? Because they are greedy for comfort, and give no thought to how to perform their duty properly, and they spend their whole time chasing after riches, becoming slaves to money, which affects their performance of their duty, and so God strips this from them. In their heart, they know that God has blessed them with so much, and given them so much, yet they have no desire to repay God's love, they do not wish to go out and perform their duty, and are timid and constantly fearful of arrest, and they are afraid of losing all these riches and pleasures, and as a result, God strips these things from them. Their hearts are clear as a mirror, they know that God has taken these things from them, and that they are being disciplined by God, and so they pray to God and say, "Oh God! You blessed me once, so You can bless me a second time. Your existence is eternal, and so Your blessings are also with mankind. I give thanks to You! Whatever happens, Your blessings and promise shall not change. If You take from me, still I shall obey." But the word "obey" rings hollow from their mouth. Their mouth says they can obey, but afterward, they think about it, and something doesn't sit right with them: "Things used to be so good. Why did God take it all away? Wasn't staying home and doing my duty the same as going out to do my duty? What was I delaying?" They are always reminiscing about the past. They have a kind of resentment and dissatisfaction toward God, and constantly feel depressed. Is God still in their heart? What is in their heart is money, material comforts, and those good times. God has no place whatsoever in their heart, He is no longer their God. Even though they know it is a truth that "God gave, and God has taken away," they like the words that "God gave," and hate the words that "God has taken away." Clearly, their acceptance of the truth is selective. When God blesses them, they accept it as the truth—but as soon as God takes from them, they cannot accept it. They cannot accept such arrangements from God, and instead they resist, and become disgruntled. When asked to perform their duty, they say, "I will if God gives me blessings and graces me. Without God's blessings and with my family in such a state of poverty, how am I to perform my duty? I don't want to!" What disposition is this? Though, in their heart, they personally experience God's blessings, and how He has given them so much, they are unwilling to accept when God takes from them. Why is this? Because they cannot let go of money and their comfortable life. Though they may not have kicked up a big fuss about it, they may not have held out their hand to God, and they may not have tried to wrest back their former assets by relying on their own efforts, they have already become disheartened toward the actions of God, they are wholly incapable of acceptance, and say, "It is truly inconsiderate that God should act like this. It is beyond comprehension. How can I continue to believe in God? I no longer wish to acknowledge that He is God. If I do not acknowledge that He is God, He is not God." Is this a kind of disposition? (Yes.) Satan has this kind of disposition, Satan denies God in this way. This kind of disposition is one of being sick of the truth and hating the truth. When people are sick of the truth to this extent, where does it lead them? It makes them oppose God and it makes them stubbornly oppose God to the very end—which means it is all over for them.

Just what is the nature of the disposition of being sick of the truth? People who are sick of the truth do not love positive things or anything that God does. Take God's work of judgment during the last days, for example: No one wants to accept this work. Few people are willing to listen to sermons about God exposing people, condemning people, chastising people, testing people, refining people, chastening people, and disciplining people, yet they are happy to hear about God blessing people, encouraging people, and of His promises to people—no one rejects these things. It's like during the Age of Grace, when God did the work of forgiving, pardoning, blessing and bestowing grace upon man, when He healed the sick and cast out demons, and made promises to people—people were willing to accept all that, they all praised Jesus for His great love of man. But now that the Age of Kingdom has arrived and God does the work of judgment, and expresses many truths, no one cares. No matter how God exposes and judges people, they do not accept it, and even say to themselves, "Could God do such a thing? Doesn't God love man?" If they are dealt with and pruned, or chastened and disciplined, they have even more notions, and say to themselves, "How is this the love of God? These words of judgment and condemnation are not loving at all, I do not accept them. I'm not that stupid!" This is the disposition of being sick of the truth. Upon hearing the truth, some people say, "What truth? This is just a theory. It seems so noble, so mighty, so holy but these are just nice-sounding words." Is this not the disposition of being sick of the truth? This is the disposition of being sick of the truth. Is this kind of disposition in you? (Yes.) What state did I just mention that you are most likely to fall prey to, that you see most commonly, and have the deepest appreciation of? (Not wanting to encounter difficulty when performing our duty, not wishing to be judged and chastised by God, wanting everything to go smoothly.) Refusing God's dominion, refusing God's discipline and chastening, clearly knowing that God is doing good in this but still resisting in your heart: this is one kind of manifestation. What else? (Being happy when we have been effective in performing our duty, and being passive, weak, and incapable of actively cooperating when we haven't.) What kind of manifestation is this? (Intransigence.) You must be accurate about this. Do not get confused and make blind assertions. Sometimes, people's states are highly complex; they are not simply one kind, but two or three mixed together. How do you define it then? Sometimes, one disposition will reveal itself in two states, sometimes in three, but despite these states being different, at the end of the day this is still one kind of disposition. You must understand this disposition of being sick of the truth, and you should probe into what the manifestations of being sick of the truth are. In this way, you will be able to truly understand this disposition of being sick of the truth. You are sick of the truth. You know full well that something is right—it doesn't necessarily have to be the words of God or the truth principles, and sometimes it is positive things, correct things, correct words, correct suggestions—yet you still say, "This is not the truth, these are simply the correct words. I don't want to listen—I do not listen to the words of people!" What disposition is this? There is arrogance, intransigence, and being sick of the truth here—all these kinds of dispositions are present. Each kind of disposition can produce many kinds of states. One state can relate to several different dispositions. You must be clear about what kinds of dispositions these states are produced by. In this way, you will be able to discern the various kinds of corrupt dispositions.

Of the four kinds of corrupt dispositions on which we have just fellowshiped, any one of them is enough to condemn people to death—is it going too far to say that? (No.) How do people's corrupt dispositions come about? They all come from Satan. People become imbued with all of the heresies and fallacies released by Satan, devils, and famous and eminent individuals, and thus these various corrupt dispositions come into being. Are these dispositions positive or negative? (Negative.) On what basis do you say they are negative? (The truth.) Because these dispositions violate the truth and resist God, and they are in hostile opposition to God's disposition and all that God has and is, therefore, if one of these corrupt dispositions is found in people, they become a person that resists God. If every one of these four dispositions is found within a person, then this is troublesome and they have become an enemy of God, and they are destined for certain death. No matter what disposition it is, if you weigh it up using the truth, you will see that the essence each manifests is all directed against God, in resistance to God, and in enmity toward God. Therefore, if your dispositions do not change, then you will not be compatible with God, you will hate the truth and you will be an enemy of God.

Next let us talk about the fifth kind of disposition. I'm going to give you an example, and you can try to figure out just what kind of disposition this is. Imagine two people are talking, and one of them is overly direct in what they say, and so the other person takes offense. In their mind, they're thinking, "Why are you being so hurtful to my pride? Do you think I let people pick on me?" and so a hatred develops within them. In reality, this problem is easy to resolve. If one person has said something to hurt another person, so long as the speaker apologizes to the listener, the matter will pass. But if the offended party can't let this matter go and for them, "it is never too late for a gentleman to take his revenge," what disposition is this? (Maliciousness.) That's right—this is maliciousness, and this is a person with a vicious disposition. In the church, some people are pruned and dealt with because they don't do their duty properly. The things said when pruning and dealing with a person often involve that person being reprimanded and perhaps even scolded. This will certainly upset them, and they will want to look for excuses and answer back. They say things like, "Although you dealt with me by saying things that are correct, some of what you said was really offensive, and you humiliated me and hurt my feelings. I've believed in God for all these years, working hard despite never making any contribution—how could I be treated like this? How come you don't deal with anyone else? I can't accept this and I'm not putting up with it!" This is a kind of corrupt disposition, is it not? (Yes.) This corrupt disposition is only manifesting through complaints, disobedience, and antagonism, but it has yet to reach its peak, it has not reached its zenith, though it is already showing some signs, and it has already begun to reach the point where it is about to break through. What is their attitude soon after this? They are recalcitrant, they feel irritated and defiant and start acting out of spite. They start rationalizing: "The leaders and workers aren't always right when they deal with people." The rest of you might be able to accept it, but I can't. That you can accept this is because you are stupid and wimpy. I don't accept it! Let's hash it out and see who's right or wrong." People then fellowship with them, saying, "Regardless of right or wrong, the first thing you must do is obey. Is it possible that the performance of your duty is not in the least bit tainted? Do you do everything right? Even if you do everything right, being dealt with is still helpful for you! We've fellowshiped on the principles with you so many times, but you never listened and chose to just blindly do as you pleased, causing disturbances to the church's work and bringing about massive losses, so how can you not face being pruned and dealt with? The wording may be harsh, and it may be hard to hear, but that's normal, isn't it? So what are you arguing about? Should you just be allowed to do bad things without other people being allowed to deal with you?" But will they be able to accept being dealt with after hearing this? They won't. They'll just continue making excuses and resisting. What disposition did they reveal? Devilishness; it is a vicious disposition. What did they actually mean? "I don't suffer people irritating me. No one should try and touch a hair on my head. If I show you that I'm not easy to mess with, you won't dare deal with me in the future. Won't I have won then?" How about it? The disposition has been exposed, right? This is a vicious disposition. People with vicious dispositions are not just sick of the truth—they hate the truth! When they are subjected to pruning and being dealt with, they either try to flee, or they ignore it—in their hearts, they are incredibly hostile. It's not simply a case of them coming up with excuses. That's not their attitude at all. They are uncompliant and resistant, they even argue back like some harpy. In their hearts, they think, "I understand that you are trying to humiliate me and deliberately embarrass me, and though I do not dare contradict you to your face, I will find the chance to get my own back! You think you can just deal with me and push me around? I'll get everyone on my side, single you out, and then I'll give you a taste of your own medicine!" This is what they're thinking in their hearts; their vicious disposition has finally revealed itself. To achieve their aims and vent their spite, they do their utmost to come up with excuses that will allow them to justify themselves and get everyone on their side. Only then are they happy and mollified. This is malicious, is it not? This is a vicious disposition. When they have yet to be pruned or dealt with, such people are like little lambs. When they are subjected to being pruned and dealt with, or when their real self is exposed, they immediately change from a lamb to a wolf, and out comes their wolfishness. This is a vicious disposition, is it not? (Yes.) So why isn't it visible most of the time? (They haven't been provoked.) That's right, they haven't been provoked and their interests haven't been endangered. It's like how a wolf won't eat you when it's not hungry—could you then say it's not a wolf? If you waited until it tried to eat you to call it a wolf, that would be too late, wouldn't it? Even when it hasn't tried to eat you, you should be vigilant at all times. The wolf not eating you does not mean it does not want to eat you, just that the time has not come yet—and when the time does arrive, its wolfish nature strikes. Being pruned and dealt with lays every kind of person bare. Some people think to themselves, "Why am I the only one being dealt with? Why am I always being picked on? Do they see me as an easy target? I'm not the kind of person you can mess with!" What disposition is this? How could they be the only ones being dealt with? This is not the way things really are. Who among you has not been dealt with or pruned? All of you have. Sometimes leaders and workers are wayward and reckless in their work, or else they do not carry it out according to work arrangements—and most of them are dealt with and pruned. This is done to protect the church's work and to prevent people from going roque. It is not done to target any specific individual. What they said is obviously a distortion of the facts, and this is also manifestation of a vicious disposition.

In what other ways is a vicious disposition manifested? How is it related to being sick of the truth? In fact, when being sick of the truth manifests itself in a serious way, bearing the attributes of resistance and judgment, this reveals a vicious disposition. Being sick of the truth includes a number of states, from lack of interest in the truth to a disdain for the truth, which progresses to judging God and condemning God. When being sick of the truth has reached a certain point, people are liable to deny God, to hate God, and to oppose God. These several states are a vicious disposition, are they not? (Yes.) Therefore, those who are sick of the truth have an even more serious state, and within this is a kind of disposition: the vicious disposition. For example, some people acknowledge that everything is ruled by God, but when God takes from them, and they suffer losses to their interests, they are not outwardly resentful or antagonistic, but inwardly they are without acceptance or submission. Theirs is the attitude of sitting passively and awaiting destruction—which is clearly the state of being sick of the truth. There is also another, even more serious state: They don't sit passively and await destruction, but instead resist the arrangements and orchestrations of God, and resist God's taking things away from them. How do they resist? (By disrupting and disturbing the work of the church, or else by sabotaging things, trying to set up their own kingdom.) That is one form. After some church leaders are replaced, they are always disrupting things and disturbing the church as they lead church life, they resist and disobey everything the newly chosen leader says, and they try to undermine them behind their back. What disposition is this? This is a vicious disposition. What they're really thinking is, "If I can't be a leader, then no one else can keep this position, I'll chase them all off! If I force you out, I'll be in charge like before!" This is not simply being sick of the truth, it is vicious! Jockeying for status, jockeying for territory, jockeying for personal interests and reputation, stopping at nothing for revenge, doing everything one can, employing all of one's skills, doing everything possible to achieve one's aims, to salvage one's reputation, pride, and status, or else to satisfy one's desire for revenge—all these are manifestations of viciousness. Some of the behaviors of a vicious disposition involve saying much that is disturbing and disruptive; some involve doing many bad things in order to achieve one's aims. Whether in their words or actions, everything such people do is at odds with the truth, and in violation of the truth, and it is all an outpouring of a vicious disposition. Some people are incapable of discerning these things. If the mistaken speech or behavior is not blatant, they can't see it for what it is. But for people who understand the truth, everything that evil people say and do is evil, and could never contain anything that is right, or in line with the truth; these things these people say and do can be said to be 100 percent evil and are absolutely the outpourings of a vicious disposition. What are evil people's motivations before they reveal this vicious disposition? What kinds of goals are they trying to achieve? How can they do such things? Can you discern this? I'll give you an example. Something happens at somebody's home. It is placed under surveillance by the great red dragon, and they can't go back, which pains them greatly. Some brothers and sisters take them in, and seeing how nice everything is in their hosts' home, they think to themselves, "How come nothing has happened to your home? How come it happened to my home? That's not fair. This won't do, I must think of a way to make something happen to your home, so you can't go home. I'll give you a taste of the same hardship I suffered." Regardless of whether they do anything or not, or whether or not this becomes a reality, or whether they achieve their aims, they still have this kind of intent. This is a kind of disposition, is it not? (Yes.) If they can't live a good life, they won't let other people do so, either. What disposition is this? (Maliciousness.) A vicious disposition—this person is nasty! They are, as the saying goes, rotten to the core. This describes just how vicious they are. What is the nature of such a disposition? Have a go at dissecting what, when this disposition is revealed in them, are their motivations, intents, and aims? What is the starting point of their revealing this disposition? What do they wish to achieve? Something happened at their own home, and they were being well provided for at their hosts' home—so why would they want to mess this up? Are they only happy when they've messed things up for their hosts, so something happens at their hosts' home and their hosts can't go back, either? For their own sake, they should protect this place, stop anything from happening to it, and not harm their hosts, as harming them is the same as harming themselves. So just what exactly is their purpose in wanting to do this? (When things aren't going well for them, they don't want things to go well for anyone else, either.) This is called viciousness. What they're thinking is, "My home has been destroyed by the great red dragon and now I don't have a home. But you still have a nice warm home that you can go back to. This isn't fair. I can't stand to see you being able to go back home. I'm going to teach you a lesson. I'll make it so you can't go back home and you're just like me. This'll make things feel fair." Is doing this not malicious and ill-intentioned? Of what nature is this? (Viciousness.) Everything that evil people say and do is done to achieve an aim. What kinds of things do they usually do? What are the most common things that people with vicious dispositions do? (They disrupt, disturb, and wreck the church's work.) (They try to curry favor when they are face-to-face with people, but then they try to undermine people behind their backs.) (They attack people, are vengeful and maliciously lash out at people.) (They spread rumors and slander.) (They malign, judge, and condemn others.) The nature of these actions is to disturb and wreck the work of the church, and they are all manifestations of resisting and attacking God, all revelations of a vicious disposition. Those who are capable of doing these things are undoubtedly evil people, and all those who possess certain manifestations of a vicious disposition can be defined as evil people. What is the essence of an evil person? It is that of the devil, of Satan. This is no exaggeration. Are you capable of these actions? Which of these actions are you capable of? (Being judgmental.) So do you dare to attack or take revenge on people? (Sometimes I do have these kinds of thoughts, but don't dare to act on them.) You just have these thoughts, but you dare not act on them. If someone of a lower status is hurtful toward you, would you dare take retribution? (Sometimes I would, I am capable of doing such things.) If this person were really formidable—if they were very articulate, and they hurt you—would you dare take retribution? Perhaps only a few would not be afraid to do this. People like this, people who pick on the weak but fear the strong, do they have vicious dispositions? (Yes.) No matter what kind of behavior it is, and who it is aimed at, if you are capable of performing the evil deed of retaliating against other brothers and sisters, this proves there is a vicious disposition within you. This vicious disposition doesn't seem too different from the outside, but you must be able to distinguish it and you must be able to distinguish who you are targeting. If you are fierce toward Satan and you are able to subdue and humiliate Satan, is this considered a vicious disposition? It is not. This is standing up for what is right and being fearless in the face of one's enemy. This is having a sense of righteousness. In what circumstances would this be considered a vicious disposition? If you were to bully, trample on, and humiliate good people or brothers and sisters, then this would be a vicious disposition. Therefore, you must be possessed of conscience and reason, approach people and matters with principles, be able to discern evil people and the devil, have a sense of righteousness, you must be tolerant and patient toward God's chosen people and brothers and sisters, and you must practice in accordance with the truth. This is totally right, and in line with God's will. People with vicious dispositions do not treat people according to principles like this. If someone, no matter who it is, does something that is hurtful to them, they will try and get their own back—this is viciousness. There is no principle to the way evil people act. They do not seek the truth. Whether it's acting out of personal spite, or picking on the weak and fearing the strong, or daring to take retribution on anyone, all of these pertain to a vicious disposition, and all of these constitute a corrupt disposition. Of this there is no doubt.

What is the most obvious manifestation of a person with a vicious disposition? It is when they encounter a guileless person who is easy to pick on and they start to pick on them and toy with them. This is a common phenomenon. When a person who is relatively kindhearted sees a person who is guileless and cowardly, they will feel a sense of compassion for them, and even if they can't help them, they won't bully them. When you see that one of your brothers or sisters is guileless, how do you treat them? Do you bully them or tease them? (I'd probably look down on them.) Looking down on people is a way of seeing them, of viewing them, a kind of mentality, but how you act and speak toward them involves your disposition. Tell Me, how do you act toward people who are timid and cowardly? (I order them about and pick on them.) (When I see them doing their duty wrong, I discriminate against them and exclude them.) These things you mention are manifestations of a vicious disposition and relate to people's dispositions. There are many more of these things, so there's no need to go into detail about them. Have you ever come across such a person, someone who wished death upon whoever offended them, and even prayed to God, asking Him to damn them, to wipe them from the face of the earth? Although no man has such power, in their heart they think about how good it would be if they did, or else they pray to God and ask that God do this. Do you have such thoughts in your heart? (When we are spreading the gospel and encounter evil people who attack us and report us to the police, I feel hateful toward them, and have thoughts like "the day will come when you are punished by God.") That's quite an objective case. You were attacked, you suffered, you felt pained, your personal integrity and self-respect were utterly trampled on—in such circumstances most people would have a hard time getting over it. (Some people spread rumors about our church online, they make many allegations, and it makes me really angry when I read them, and there is a lot of hatred in my heart.) Is this viciousness, or is it hot-headedness, or is this normal humanity? (It is normal humanity. Not hating demons and God's enemies is not normal humanity.) That's right. This is the revelation, manifestation, and response of normal humanity. If people do not hate negative things or love positive things, if they have no standards of conscience, then they are not people. Under these circumstances, what actions can a person perform to develop into a vicious disposition? If this hatred and loathing morphs into a certain kind of behavior, if you lose all reason, and your actions cross a certain red line for humanity, if you are even liable to kill them and break the law, then this is viciousness, it is acting in a hot-headed way. When people understand the truth, and are able to discern evil people, and they despise wickedness, this is normal humanity. But if people handle things in a hot-headed way, they are acting without principles. Is this any different from committing evil? (Yes.) There is a difference. If a person is extremely bad, extremely vicious, extremely wicked, extremely immoral, and you feel great antipathy toward them, and this antipathy reaches the point that you ask God to curse them, then this is okay. But is it okay if God does not act after you have prayed two or three times and you take matters into your own hands? (No.) You can pray to God and express your views and opinions, then search for the truth principles, in which case you will be able to handle things correctly. But you should not demand or try to force God to exact payback on your behalf, much less should you allow your hotheadedness to make you do stupid things. You should approach the matter rationally. You should be patient, await the time of God, and spend more time praying to God. See how God acts with wisdom toward Satan the devil, and in this way, you can be patient. Being rational means entrusting all of this to God and letting God act. This is what a created being should do. Do not act out of hot-headedness. Acting out of hotheadedness is not acceptable to God, it is condemned by God. At such times, the disposition revealed in people is not human weakness or passing anger, rather it is a vicious disposition. Once it is determined to be a vicious disposition, you are in trouble, and not likely to be saved. That's because when people have vicious dispositions, they are liable to act in violation of conscience and reason, and they become highly disposed to breaking the law, and violating the administrative decrees of God. So how can this be avoided? At a minimum, there are three red lines that must not be crossed: The first is not doing things that are in violation of conscience and reason, the second is not breaking the law, and the third is not violating God's administrative decrees. Additionally, do not do anything extreme or anything that will disturb the work of the church. If you abide by these principles, at the very least your safety will be assured, and you will not be cast out. If you viciously resist when you are being pruned and dealt with because you committed all kinds of evils, then that's even more dangerous. You are likely to directly offend God's disposition and be cleared out or expelled from the church. The punishment for offending God's disposition is much more severe than for breaking the law—it is a fate worse than death. Breaking the law entails a prison sentence at most; a few hard years and you're out, that's it. But if you offend God's disposition, you will suffer eternal punishment. Therefore, if people with vicious dispositions have no rationality, they are in extreme danger, they are liable to commit evil, and they are sure to be punished and suffer retribution. If people have a little rationality, are able to seek and submit to the truth, and can refrain from committing too much evil, then they absolutely have hope of being saved. It is crucial for a person to have rationality and reason. A person with reason is likely to accept the truth and handle being pruned and dealt with in a correct way. A person without reason is in danger when they are pruned and dealt with. Say, for example, someone is very angry after being dealt with and pruned by a leader. They feel like spreading rumors and attacking the leader, but do not dare to for fear of causing trouble. Such a disposition already exists in their heart, however, and it is hard to say whether they would act on it or not. As long as this kind of disposition is in someone's heart, as long as these thoughts exist, then although they might not act on it, they are already in danger. When circumstances permit—when they get the chance they may well act. So long as their vicious disposition exists, if it is not resolved, then sooner or later this person will commit evil. So what other situations are there in which a person reveals a vicious disposition? Tell Me. (I was perfunctory in my duty and didn't get any results, and then I was replaced by the leader in accordance with the principles, and I felt somewhat resistant. Then when I saw that he revealed a corrupt disposition, I thought of writing a letter to report him.) Does this idea come out of thin air? Absolutely not. This was produced by your nature. Sooner or later, the things in people's natures are revealed, there is no knowing in what instance or context they will be revealed and acted out. Sometimes people do nothing, but that is because the situation does not permit it. If they are someone who pursues the truth, however, they will be able to seek the truth to resolve this. If they are not a person who pursues the truth, they will do as they please, and as soon as the situation permits, they will commit evil. Therefore, if a corrupt disposition is not resolved, it is extremely likely that people will get themselves into trouble, in which case they will have to reap what they have sown. Some people do not pursue the truth and are constantly perfunctory in the performance of their duties. They don't accept it when they are pruned and dealt with, they never repent, and eventually they are ostracized for the purpose of reflection. Some people are cleared out of the church because they constantly disturb church life and they have become rotten apples; and some people are expelled because they perform all kinds of evil. Therefore, no matter what kind of person they are, if someone frequently reveals a corrupt disposition and does not seek the truth to resolve this, they are liable to commit evildoing. Mankind's corrupt disposition does not consist of arrogance alone, but also wickedness and viciousness. Arrogance and viciousness are just common factors.

So how should this problem of revealing a vicious disposition be solved? People must recognize what their corrupt disposition is. Some people's disposition is particularly vicious, malicious, and arrogant, and they are totally unscrupulous. This is the nature of the wicked, and these people are the most dangerous of all. When such people hold power, the devil holds power, Satan holds power. In God's house, all wicked people are exposed and cast out because of their performance of all kinds of evil acts. When you try to fellowship the truth to the wicked, or to prune them and deal with them, there is a high chance that they will attack you, or judge you, or even take revenge on you, which are all consequences of their dispositions being so malicious. This is actually very common. For example, there could be two people who get along very well, who are very considerate and understanding of each other—but they end up divided over a single thing concerning their interests, and they cut ties with each other. Some people even become enemies and try to take revenge on each other. They are all highly vicious. When it comes to people doing their duty, have you noticed which things that are manifested and revealed in them fall under a vicious disposition? These things certainly exist, and you must root them out. This will help you to discern and recognize these things. If you do not know how to root them out and discern them, you will never be able to discern evil people. After being misled by antichrists and falling under their control, some people's lives are harmed, and it is only then that they know what an antichrist is, and what a vicious disposition is. Your understanding of the truth is too superficial. Your understanding of most truths stops at the spoken or written level, or you only understand words and doctrines, and these do not match up at all with reality. After hearing many sermons, there seems to be understanding and enlightenment in your heart; but when faced with reality, you still can't discern things for what they really are. You all know, theoretically speaking, what the manifestations of an antichrist are, but when you lay eyes on a real antichrist, you are unable to discern them as an antichrist. This is because you have too little experience. When you have experienced more, when you have been hurt by antichrists enough, you will well and truly be able to discern them for what they really are. Today, though most people listen to sermons conscientiously during gatherings, and want to strive for the truth, once they have heard the sermon, they only understand the literal meaning, they don't get any further than the theoretical level, and they are incapable of experiencing the truth reality. Therefore, their entry into the truth reality is very superficial, which means they lack discernment of wicked people and antichrists. Antichrists have the essence of evildoers, but apart from antichrists and evildoers, do other people not have vicious dispositions? In reality, there are no good people. When nothing's wrong, they are all smiles, but when they are faced with something that harms their own interests, they turn ugly. This is a vicious disposition. This vicious disposition can be revealed at any time; it is involuntary. So what exactly is happening here? Is it a matter of being possessed by evil spirits? Is it a matter of demonic reincarnation? If it is either of these two things, then the person has the essence of an evildoer and they are beyond help. If their essence is not that of an evildoer, and they just have this corrupt disposition, then their condition is not terminal, and if they can accept the truth, there is still hope for them to be saved. So how is a vicious, corrupt disposition to be resolved? Firstly, you must often pray when you encounter matters and reflect on what motivations and desires you have. You must accept God's scrutiny and keep your behavior in check. Moreover, you must not reveal any evil words or behavior. If a person finds themselves with incorrect intents and malice in their heart, wanting to do bad things, they must seek the truth to resolve it, they must find the relevant words of God to understand and resolve this matter, they must pray to God, ask for His protection, swear to God, and they must curse themselves when they do not accept the truth and commit evil. Fellowshiping with God in this way grants protection and stops a person from doing evil. If something happens to a person and evil intentions emerge, but they pay it no heed, and just let things play out, or take it for granted that this is the way they should act, then they are an evil person, and they are not someone who genuinely believes in God and loves the truth. Such a person still wants to believe in God and follow God, and to be blessed and enter the heavenly kingdom—is that possible? They're dreaming. The fifth kind of disposition is viciousness. This is also an issue related to corrupt dispositions, and that's more or less it for this topic.

You should also be familiar with the sixth kind of corrupt disposition: wickedness. Let us start with when people preach the gospel. Some people reveal a wicked disposition when they preach the gospel. They do not preach according to principle, nor do they know what kind of people love the truth and are possessed of humanity; they only ever look for a member of the opposite sex that they click with, who they like and get on with. They don't preach to people they don't like or who they don't get on with. It doesn't matter whether a person aligns with the principles of spreading the gospel—if it's someone they're interested in, they won't give up on them. Other people might tell them that the person does not fit with the principles for spreading the gospel, but they still insist on preaching to them. There is a disposition inside them controlling their actions, making them satisfy their lascivious desires and achieve their own aims under the banner of spreading the gospel. This is nothing short of a wicked disposition. There are even those who know full well that they are wrong in doing this, and that doing so offends God and violates His administrative decrees—yet they do not stop. This is a kind of disposition, is it not? (Yes.) This is one of the manifestations of a wicked disposition, but not only should the outpouring of lascivious desires be described as wicked; the scope of wickedness is broader than just the lust of the flesh. Have a think: What other manifestations of a wicked disposition are there? Since it is a disposition, it is more than just a way of acting, it involves many different states, manifestations and outpourings, that is what defines it as a disposition. (Following along with worldly trends, not letting go of things related to the trends of the world.) Not letting go of wicked trends is one kind. Being attached to the wicked trends of the world, chasing after them, being preoccupied with them, pursuing them with great passion. There are some who never let go of these things regardless of how the truth is fellowshiped, no matter how they are pruned and dealt with; it even reaches the point of infatuation. This is wickedness. So when people follow along with evil trends, what manifestations indicate that they have a wicked disposition? Why do they love these things? What is involved in these evil worldly trends that brings them psychological satisfaction, that satisfies their needs, and satisfies their predilections and desires? Say, for example, they like movie stars: What is it about these movie stars that drives this obsession and makes them follow them? It is the panache, flair, looks, and celebrity of these people, as well as the kind of extravagant life that they long for. All of these things they follow along with—are they all wicked? (Yes.) Why is it said that they are wicked? (Because they run counter to the truth and positive things, and they are not in line with what God asks.) This is doctrine. Have a go at analyzing these celebrities and movie stars: their lifestyle, their demeanor, even the public persona and outfits that everyone worships so much. Why do they lead such a life? And why do they inspire others to follow them? They put a lot of effort into all this. They have makeup artists and personal stylists to create this image of theirs. So what is their aim in creating this image of themselves? To attract people, to mislead them, to make them follow them—and to benefit from this. And so, whether people worship these movie stars' fame, or their looks, or their lives, these are truly stupid and absurd actions. If a person were to be possessed of rationality, how would they worship devils? Devils are things which mislead, trick, and harm people. Devils do not believe in God and they have no acceptance of the truth whatsoever. Devils all follow Satan. What are the goals of those who follow and worship devils and Satan? They want to emulate these devils, to model themselves on them, in the hope that one day they will become a devil, just as beautiful and sexy as these devils and celebrities. They like to enjoy this feeling. No matter which celebrity or eminent individual a person worships, the ultimate goal of these stars is the same—to mislead people, to attract people, and to make people worship and follow them. Is this not a wicked disposition? This is a wicked disposition, and it could not be more obvious.

Wicked dispositions are also manifested in another way. Some people see that gatherings in the house of God always involve reading God's word, fellowshiping the truth, and discussions of self-knowledge, the proper performance of duty, how to act in accordance with principles, how to fear God and shun evil, how to understand and practice the truth, and various other aspects of the truth. Having listened for all these years, they begin to get more fed up the more they listen, and they begin to complain, saying, "Isn't the purpose of faith in God to gain blessings? Why are we always talking about the truth and fellowshiping on God's word? Does it ever end? I'm sick of it!" But they don't want to return to the secular world. They think to themselves, "Faith in God is so dull, it's boring—how can I make it a little more interesting? I must find something interesting," so they go around asking, "How many believers in God are there in the church? How many leaders and workers are there? How many have been replaced? How many are young university students and graduate students? Does anyone know the number?" They treat these things and this data as the truth. What disposition is this? This is wickedness, commonly referred to as "vileness." They've heard so many truths, but not one of them has inspired sufficient attention or focus in them. As soon as someone has some gossip or internal news, their ears immediately prick up, they're afraid of missing it. This is vileness, is it not? (Yes.) What characterizes vile people? They don't have the slightest interest in the truth. They are only interested in external matters, and tirelessly and rapaciously seek out gossip and things that have no bearing on their life entry or on the truth. They think that figuring out this stuff, all this information, and holding it all in their head, means that they possess the truth reality, that they are well and truly a member of God's house, that they will surely be praised by God and able to enter God's kingdom. Do you think that is really the case? (No.) You can see through this, but many new believers in God can't. They are fixated on this information, they think knowing these things makes them a member of God's house—but in fact, God despises such people the most, they are the most vain, superficial, and ignorant of all people. God has appeared in the flesh in the last days to do the work of judging and purifying people, the effect of which is to give people the truth as life. But if people do not focus on eating and drinking of God's word and are always trying to find out gossip and trying to find out more about the internal affairs of the church, are they pursuing the truth? Are they people that do proper work? To Me, these are wicked people. They are not believers. People like this could also be called vile. They only ever focus on hearsay. This satisfies their curiosity, but they are despised by God. These are not people who truly believe in God, much less people who pursue the truth. They are, quite simply, the servants of Satan, who come to disturb the work of the church. More than that, people who are always examining and investigating God are the servants and minions of the great red dragon. God hates and is disgusted by these people most of all. If you believe in God, why do you not trust in God? When you examine and investigate God, are you searching for the truth? Does searching for the truth bear any relation to the family into which Christ was born or the environment in which He grew up? People who are always putting God under the microscope—are they not disgusting? If you constantly have notions about things to do with Christ's humanity, you should spend more time pursuing the knowledge of God's words; only when you understand the truth will you be able to resolve the problem of your notions. Will examining Christ's family background or the circumstances of His birth allow you to know God? Will this allow you to discover the divine essence of Christ? Absolutely not. People who truly believe in God devote themselves to God's words and the truth, only this is conducive to knowing the divine essence of Christ. But why are those who constantly scrutinize God constantly engaging in vileness? These trashy people who lack spiritual understanding should hurry up and get out of God's house! So many truths have been expressed, so much has been fellowshiped during gatherings and sermons—why must you still scrutinize God? What does it mean that you are always scrutinizing God? That you are extremely wicked! What's more, there are even those who think that learning all this trivial information gives them capital, and they go around showing it off to people. And what happens in the end? They are despicable and disgusting to God. Are they even human? Are they not living demons? How are they people who believe in God? They devote all their thoughts to evil and the crooked way. It's as if they think that the more hearsay they know, the more they are a member of God's house, and the more they understand the truth. People like this are utterly absurd. In the house of God, no one is more despised than them.

Some people constantly focus on unrealistic things in their faith. For example, some people are always examining what the kingdom is like, where the third heaven is, what the underworld is like, and where hell is. They are always examining mysteries instead of focusing on life entry. This is vileness, it is evil. No matter how many sermons and fellowship they hear, there are those who still don't understand just what the truth is, nor are they aware of how they should put it into practice. Whenever they have time, they probe into God's word, poring over the wording, searching for some kind of sensation, and they are also always scrutinizing whether God's words have been fulfilled. If they have, they believe that this is the work of God, and if they haven't, they deny that this is the work of God. Are they not absurd? Is this not vileness? Are people always able to see when God's words have been fulfilled? People are not necessarily able to see when some of God's words have been fulfilled. Some of His words, to people, don't seem to have been fulfilled, but to God they have been. People have no way of seeing these things clearly; they're lucky if they can comprehend even 20 percent. Some people spend the whole time studying God's word but pay no attention to practicing the truth or entering reality. Is this not disregarding one's proper duties? They have heard so many truths yet still do not understand them, and they are constantly searching for proof of prophecies being fulfilled, treating this as their life and motivation. For example, when some people pray, they say things like, "God, if You wish me to do this, make me wake up at six o'clock tomorrow morning; if You do not, let me sleep until seven." This is often the way they act, they use this as a principle of theirs, practicing it as if it were the truth. This is called vileness. In their actions they always rely on feelings, focusing on the supernatural, relying on hearsay, and other unrealistic things; they are constantly focusing their energy on vile things. This is wickedness. No matter how you fellowship the truth with them, they think the truth has no use, and is not as accurate as relying on feelings or validation through comparison. This is vileness. They don't believe that God governs and arranges people's fates, and though they say they acknowledge that God's words are the truth, in their hearts they still do not accept the truth, they never see things through God's words. If someone well-known says something, they believe it is the truth, and go along with it. If a fortune-teller or face-reader tells them they will be promoted to manager next year, they believe them. Is this not vileness? They believe in divination, fortune telling, and supernatural things, and these vile things alone. It's just like how some people say, "I understand all the truths, but I just can't put them into practice. I don't know what the problem is." Now we have the answer to this question: They are

vile. It does not matter how you fellowship the truth to such people, it will not get through to them, nor will you see any effect. These people are not only sick of the truth, but also possessed of a wicked disposition. What's the most important manifestation of being sick of the truth? It's that a person understands the truth, but they do not put it into practice. They do not want to hear it, they resist and resent it. They know that the truth is right and good, but they don't put it into practice, they are not willing to take this path, nor do they wish to suffer or pay a price, much less suffer any losses. Wicked people are not like this. They think that wicked things are the truth, that that is the right way, and they chase after these things, and try to emulate them, and constantly focus their energy on them. God's house often fellowships the principles of prayer: People can pray whenever or wherever they wish to, without any time constraints, they simply need to come before God, speak the words in their heart, and seek the truth. These words should be heard often and they should be understood easily, but how do evil people put this into practice? Every morning during the dawn chorus, they unfailingly face south, get down on both knees, and put both hands on the ground, prostrating themselves in prayer before God as much as they can. They think that only at such times will God be able to hear their prayer, because this is when God isn't busy, He has time, and so He listens. Isn't this ridiculous? Isn't it wicked? There are others who say that the most effective time to pray is at one or two o'clock at night, when all is guiet. Why do they say this? They, too, have their reasons. They say that at that time everyone is asleep; God only has time to deal with their affairs when He is not busy. Isn't this absurd? Isn't it wicked? No matter how you fellowship the truth with them, they refuse to accept it. They are the most absurd people and they are incapable of understanding the truth. There are others who say, "When people believe in God, they must do good things and be kind, and they must not kill or eat meat. To eat meat is to kill, to sin, and God does not want people who do this." Do these words have any basis? Has God ever said any such thing? (No.) So who said this? This was said by an unbeliever, by an absurd type. In fact, the people who say this don't necessarily not eat meat—or it may be that they don't eat it in front of other people, but they eat a lot of it in private. These people are really good at pretending, and spread fallacies everywhere they go. This is wickedness. Such people are so vile. They treat these heresies and fallacies as commandments and rules, and they even practice and stick to them as if they were the truth, or God's demands, energetically and shamelessly teaching others to do the same. Why do I say that these people's way of doing things, their way of phrasing things, and the means by which they pursue, are wicked? (Because these have no connection to the truth.) So anything not connected to the truth is wicked? Such an interpretation is highly problematic. There are things in people's everyday lives that are unconnected to the truth. Does it not twist the facts to say that they are wicked? That which is not condemned by God cannot be said to be wicked, only that which is condemned by God can be described as wicked. It would be a major mistake to define everything unconnected to the truth as wicked. The details of life's necessities—eating, sleeping, drinking, resting, for example—are these connected to the truth? Are these things wicked? These are all normal needs, they are part of people's daily regimen, they are not wicked. So why were the actions I just mentioned classed as wicked? Because those ways of doing things take people onto a path that was wrong and ludicrous—it takes them onto the path of religion. Their practicing in this way and their teaching others to act in this way takes people onto the path of evil. This is an inevitable result. When people worship evil worldly trends and walk the path of evil, how do they end up? They become depraved, they lose reason, they have no shame, and ultimately, they are completely carried away by the trends of the world, and they walk to destruction, no different from the unbelievers. Some people not only regard these heresies and fallacies as rules to be followed or commandments to be obeyed, but they also hold onto them as the truth. This is an absurd person utterly lacking spiritual understanding. Ultimately, they can only be cast out. Could the Holy Spirit work in anyone whose understanding of the truth is so skewed? (No.) The Holy Spirit does not work in these people, in which case the evil spirits do, because the path these people walk is the path of evil, they are hastening along the path of the evil spirits—which is precisely what these evil spirits need. And the result? These people are possessed by evil spirits. Before, I said that "The devil Satan, like a roaring lion, stalks abroad, searching for people to devour." When people walk the crooked and evil path, they will inevitably be snatched away by the evil spirits. There is no need for God to give you to the evil spirits. If you do not pursue the truth, you will not be protected, and God will not be with you. God will not care about you if He cannot gain you, and the evil spirits will take this opportunity to slide in and possess you. This is the consequence, is it not? All those who are sick of the truth and who constantly condemn the work of God's incarnation, and who go along with worldly trends, who blatantly misinterpret God's words and the Bible, who spread heresies and fallacies—all these things they do are born of wicked dispositions. Some people pursue spirituality, and because their understanding is skewed, they concoct many fallacies to mislead people, and they become utopians and theorists, which is also committing vileness. They are wicked people. Like the Pharisees, everything they did was hypocritical, they didn't practice the truth and misled people into looking up to them and worshiping them. When the Lord Jesus appeared to work, they even crucified Him. This was evil and in the end, they were cursed by God. Today, the religious world not only casts judgment on and condemns the appearance and work of God but, what is most loathsome is that it also stands on the side of the great red dragon, joining with evil forces in persecuting God's chosen ones and standing as an enemy of God in tandem. This is wicked. The religious community has never hated the wicked forces of Satan, it does not hate the wickedness of the country of the great red dragon, but instead prays for and blesses them. This is wicked. Any behavior that is linked to or cooperating with Satan and evil spirits can collectively be called wicked. Those ways of practicing that are truly deviant, evil, extreme, and immoderate—these are wicked, too. Some people constantly misunderstand God, and these misunderstandings cannot be cleared up no matter how the truth is fellowshiped to them. They are always preaching their own reasoning, insisting on their own fallacies. And is there not a little wickedness to this, too? Some people have notions about God; after the truth has been fellowshiped to them multiple times, they say they understand, and that their notions have been cleared up, yet afterward they still stick to their notions, are always negative, and cling tightly to their own excuses. This is wicked, is it not? This, too, is a kind of wickedness. In sum, anyone who has done something unreasonable and refuses to accept it no matter how the truth is fellowshiped to them is vile, and is somewhat wicked. It is not easy for these people who have wicked dispositions to be saved by God, because they cannot accept the truth and refuse to let go of their wicked fallacies; there really is nothing that can be done for them.

We have just fellowshiped a total of six dispositions: intransigence, arrogance, deceitfulness, being sick of the truth, viciousness, and wickedness. Has dissecting these six dispositions given you a new knowledge and understanding of changes in disposition? Just what are changes in disposition? Does this mean getting rid of a certain flaw, rectifying a certain behavior, or changing a certain character trait? Absolutely not. So are you now a little clearer about just what disposition refers to? Can these six dispositions be described as the corrupt dispositions of man, as the nature essence of man? (Yes.) Are these six dispositions positive things or negative things? (Negative things.) They are, quite simply, the corrupt dispositions of man, they are the main facets of man's corrupt dispositions. Not one of these corrupt dispositions is not hostile to God and the truth, and not one of them is something positive. Therefore, these six dispositions are six aspects, which are collectively referred to as corrupt disposition. Corrupt dispositions are the nature essence of man. How can "essence" be explained? Essence refers to the nature of man. The nature of man means the things that man relies on for their existence, the things that govern how they live. People live by their natures. No matter what you live out, what your goals and direction are, what rules you live by, your nature essence does not change—this is inarguable. And so, when you do not possess the truth, and you live by relying on these corrupt dispositions, everything you live out is against God, contrary to the truth, and at odds with God's will. You should understand this now: Can people attain salvation if their dispositions do not change? (No.) That would be impossible. So, if people's dispositions do not change, can they be compatible with God? (No.) It would be extremely difficult. When it comes to these six dispositions, regardless of which one it is, and irrespective of the extent to what is manifested or revealed in you, if you are not able to free yourself from the constraints of these corrupt dispositions, then regardless of what the motives or aims of your actions are, and whether you are acting deliberately or not, the nature of all you do will inevitably be against God, and will inevitably be condemned by God—which is an extremely serious consequence. Is being condemned by God what everyone who believes in God ultimately wishes for? (No.) And since this is not an outcome that people wish for, what is most important for them to do? They should know their own corrupt disposition and corrupt essence, understand the truth, and then they should accept the truth—gradually, bit-by-bit, freeing themselves from these corrupt dispositions in the settings created for them by God, and attaining compatibility with God and the truth. This is the path to changes in one's disposition.

Previously, there were those who viewed changing their dispositions as very easy and straightforward. They believed that "As long as I force myself to not say things in opposition to God or do anything that will disrupt or disturb the work of the church, and as long as I have the right perspective, my heart is right, and I understand a little more of the truth, put in more effort, suffer more, and pay more of a price, then after a few years I will definitely be able to achieve a change in my disposition." Do these words hold water? (No.) Where is their mistake? (They have no knowledge of their corrupt disposition.) What is the aim of knowing your corrupt disposition? (To change.) And what is the outcome of this change? To gain the truth. Measuring whether there has been a change in your disposition requires looking at whether your actions are congruent with the truth or in violation of the truth, whether they are born of human will or of satisfying the will of God. To see the extent to which your disposition has changed is to look at whether you can reflect on yourself, and forsake your flesh, motives, wild ambitions, and desires, when you reveal a corrupt disposition, and whether you can practice in accordance with the truth when you do this. The extent of your ability to practice in accordance with the truth and God's words and whether your practice is completely in line with the standards of the truth prove how great the change in your disposition has been. This is proportional. Take the intransigent disposition, for example: At the start, when there hadn't been any change in your disposition, you did not understand the truth, nor were you aware that you had an intransigent disposition, and when you heard the truth, you thought to yourself, "How can the truth always lay bare people's scars?" After hearing it, you felt that God's words were right, but if, after one or two years, you have not taken any of them to heart, if you have not accepted any of them, then this is intransigence, is it not? If, after two or three years, there has been no acceptance, if there has been no change in the state within you, and though you have not fallen behind in performing your duty, and you have suffered much, your intransigent state has not been resolved at all or lessened in the slightest, then has there been any change in this aspect of your disposition? (No.) Then why are you running about and working? Regardless of the reason you do so, you are running about and working blindly, because you have run about this much and worked this much, and yet there has not been the slightest change in your disposition. Until a day comes when you suddenly think to yourself, "How is it that I am unable to speak even a single word of testimony? My life disposition hasn't changed at all." At this time you feel just how serious this problem is, and you think to yourself, "I am truly rebellious and intransigent! I am not a person who

pursues the truth! I hold no place for God within my heart! How can this be called faith in God? I have believed in God for several years yet still do not live out the image of man, nor is my heart close to God! I have not taken God's words to heart, either; nor do I have any sense of reproach or inclination to repent when I do something wrong—is this not intransigence? Am I not a son of rebellion?" You feel troubled. And what does it mean that you feel troubled? It means that you wish to repent. You are aware of your own intransigence and rebelliousness. And at this time, your disposition begins to change. Without realizing it, there are certain thoughts and desires within your consciousness that you want to change, and you no longer find yourself at an impasse with God. You find yourself wanting to improve your relationship with God, to no longer be so intransigent, to be able to put God's words into practice in your everyday life, to practice them as the truth principles—you have this consciousness. It is good that you are conscious of these things, but does it mean you will be able to change straight away? (No.) You must go through several years of experience, during which time you will have an ever clearer awareness in your heart, and you will have a powerful need, and in your heart you will think to yourself, "This isn't right—I must stop wasting my time. I must pursue the truth, I must do something proper. In the past I've been neglecting my proper duties, only thinking about material things like food and clothing, and I was only pursuing name and gains. As a result, I've gained no truth at all. I regret this and I must repent!" At this point, you embark on the right path of faith in God. So long as people begin to focus on practicing the truth, does this not take them a step closer to changes in their disposition? No matter how long you have believed in God, if you can sense your own turbidity—that you have always just been drifting along, and that after several years of just drifting along, you have gained nothing, and you still feel empty—and if this makes you feel uncomfortable, and you begin to reflect on yourself, and you feel that not pursuing the truth is wasting time, then at such a time you will realize that God's words of exhortations are His love for man, and you will hate yourself for not listening to God's words and for being so lacking in conscience and sense. You will feel regret, and then you will want to conduct yourself anew, and to truly live before God, and you will say to yourself, "I cannot hurt God anymore. God has spoken so much, and every word has been for the benefit of man, and to point man on the right way. God is so lovely, and so worthy of man's love!" This is the beginning of people's transformation. It is such a good thing to have this appreciation! If you are so numb that you don't even know these things, then you are in trouble, aren't you? Today people realize that the key to faith in God is reading more of God's words, that understanding the truth is most important of all, that understanding the truth and knowing oneself is crucial, and that only being able to practice the truth and make the truth their reality is entering the right track of faith in God. So how many years of experience do you think you must have in order to have this knowledge and feeling in your heart? People who are shrewd, who are insightful, who have a strong desire for God—such people may be able to turn themselves around in one or two years and begin entry. But people who are muddleheaded, who are numb and dull-witted, who lack insight—will pass three or five years in a daze, unaware that they haven't gained anything. If they perform their duties with enthusiasm, they may pass more than ten years in a daze and still make no obvious gains or be able to speak on their experiential testimonies. It is not until they are sent away or cast out that they finally wake up and think to themselves, "I really don't have any truth reality. I really haven't been a person who pursues the truth!" Is their awakening not a little late by this point? Some people drift along in a daze, constantly hoping for the day of God to come but not pursuing the truth at all. As a result, more than ten years pass without them making any gains or being able to share any testimony. It is only once they are harshly pruned, dealt with, and warned that they finally feel God's words pierce their heart. How intransigent their hearts are! How is it okay for them not to be dealt with, pruned, and punished? How is it okay for them not to be severely disciplined? What must be done to make them aware, for them to react? Those who don't pursue the truth won't shed a tear until they see the coffin. It is only once they've done a great deal of demonic and evil things that realization comes to them and they say to themselves, "Is my faith in God over? Does God not want me anymore? Have I been condemned?" They begin to reflect. When they are negative, they feel that all these years of believing in God have been a waste, and they are full of resentment, and are inclined to give up on themselves as hopeless. But when they come to their senses, they realize that "Am I not just hurting myself? I must get back on my feet. I was told I do not love the truth. Why was I told this? How do I not love the truth? Oh no! Not only do I not love the truth, but I can't even put the truths I do understand into practice! This is a manifestation of being sick of the truth!" Thinking this, they feel somewhat remorseful, and somewhat afraid, too: "If I carry on like this, I will surely be punished. No, I must quickly repent—God's disposition must not be offended." At this time, is their level of intransigence reduced? It is like a needle has pierced their heart; they feel something. And when you have this feeling, your heart is stirred, and you start to feel interested in the truth. Why do you have this interest? Because you need the truth. Without the truth, when you are pruned and dealt with, you cannot submit to it or accept the truth, and you cannot stand firm when you are tested. If you were to become a leader, would you be able to refrain from being a false leader and from walking the path of an antichrist? You would not. Can you overcome having status and being praised by others? Can you overcome the situations you are put in, and the tests you are given? You know and understand yourself all too well, and you will say, "If I do not understand the truth, I cannot overcome all of this—I am trash, I am capable of nothing." What kind of mentality is this? This is needing the truth. When you are in need, when you are at your most helpless, you will only want to depend on the truth. You will feel that nobody else can be depended on, and that only depending on the truth can solve your problems, and allow you to make it through being pruned and dealt with, and trials, and temptations, and help you make it through any situation. And the more you depend on the truth, the more you will feel that the truth is good, useful, and of the greatest help to you, and that it can solve all your difficulties. At such times, you will begin to yearn for the truth. When people reach this point, does their corrupt disposition start to diminish or change little by little? From when they begin to understand and accept the truth, the way people see things begins to change, following which their dispositions also begin to change. This is a slow process. In the early stages, people are not able to perceive these tiny changes; but when they truly understand and are able to practice the truth, there begin to be essential changes, and they are able to feel such changes. From the point when people begin to have a longing and hunger for the truth, and wish to seek the truth, to the point when something happens to them and, based on their understanding of the truth, they are able to put the truth into practice and satisfy God's will, and not act according to their own will, and are able to overcome their motives, and overcome their own arrogance, rebelliousness, intransigence, and traitorous heart, then bit-by-bit, does the truth not become their life? And when the truth becomes your life, the arrogant, rebellious, intransigent, and traitorous dispositions within you cease to be your life, and can control you no more. And what guides your comportment at this time? The words of God. When the words of God have become your life, has there been a change? (Yes.) And afterward, the more you change, the better things get. This is the process by which people's dispositions change, and achieving this effect takes a long time.

Just how long changes in disposition take depends on the person; there is no set time frame for this. If it is someone who loves and pursues the truth, then changes in their disposition will be seen in seven, eight, or ten years. If they are of average caliber, and also willing to pursue the truth, it may take around fifteen or twenty years before changes are seen in their disposition. What's key is the person's determination to pursue the truth and how insightful they are, these are the determining factors. Every kind of corrupt disposition exists in every person to varying degrees, they are all the nature of man, and they are all deeply rooted. However, by pursuing and practicing the truth, and by accepting God's judgment and chastisement, by being dealt with and pruned, and by accepting the trials and refinement of God, varying degrees of change can be achieved in every disposition. Some people say, "If that's the case, are changes in disposition not just a matter of time? When the time comes, I will know what changes in disposition are, and I will be capable of entry." Is this the case? (No.) Absolutely not. If time is all it takes to achieve changes in disposition, then all those people who have believed in God their whole lives should have achieved changes in their disposition as a matter of course. But is this how things really are? Have these people gained the truth? Have they achieved changes in their disposition? They have not. People who believe in God are as numerous as hairs on an ox, but those whose dispositions have changed are as rare as unicorns. For people's dispositions to truly change, they must rely on pursuing the truth to achieve this; they are made perfect by relying on the work of the Holy Spirit. Changes in disposition are achieved through pursuing the truth. On the one hand, people must pay a price, they must pay a price when it comes to pursuing the truth, and no amount of hardship in order to gain the truth is too small. In addition, they must be validated by God as the right kind of person, a person who is kindhearted, and a person who truly loves God, for the Holy Spirit to work and make them perfect. People's cooperation is indispensable but gaining the work of the Holy Spirit is even more crucial. If people do not pursue or love the truth, if they never know to heed God's will, much less to love God, if they have no sense of burden toward the work of the church, and no love toward others—and if, in particular, they have no devotion when performing their duty—then they are not beloved of God, and can never be made perfect by God. So people must not make blind assertions, but must understand God's will. Regardless of what God says or does, they must be able to obey, and to protect the work of the church, their hearts must be right, and only then can the Holy Spirit work. If people wish to pursue being perfected by God, then they must have a heart that loves God, a heart that obeys God, a heart that fears God, and when performing their duty they must be loyal to God, and bring satisfaction to God. Only then will they be able to gain the work of the Holy Spirit. When people have the work of the Holy Spirit, they are enlightened when they read God's words, they have a path to practice the truth and principles in the performance of their duty, God guides them when they are in trouble, and their hearts are joyous and at peace no matter how much they suffer. As they undergo the guidance of the Holy Spirit in this way for ten or twenty years, without even noticing it, they will change. The sooner the change, the sooner the peace; the sooner the change, the sooner they can become happy. Only when people's dispositions change can they find true peace and joy, only then can they lead truly happy lives. Those who do not pursue the truth have no spiritual peace or joy, their days grow ever more empty, and ever harder to bear. For those who believe in God but do not pursue the truth, their days are filled with pain and suffering. And so, when people believe in God, nothing is more important than gaining the truth. To gain the truth is to gain the life, and the earlier the truth is gained, the better. Without the truth, people's lives are empty. To gain the truth is to find peace and joy, to be able to live before God, to be enlightened, guided, and led by the Holy Spirit's work, there will be more and more light in their heart, and their faith in God will grow ever greater. So now, is the truth relating to changes in disposition clearer to you? (Yes, we understand now.) If this is truly clear to you, then you have a path, and you know how to be effective in pursuing the truth.

What Is the Truth Reality?

There are many people who believe in God, but few who pursue the truth. How can you discern whether someone pursues the truth? How can you evaluate whether someone is a person who pursues the truth? Suppose there is a person who has believed in God for seven or eight years. They can speak many words of doctrine, their mouths are full of spiritual vocabulary, they often help others, they seem to be very enthusiastic, they are able to forsake things, and they perform their duties with great vigor. Yet one cannot see them practicing much of the truth, nor are they able to discuss real experiences of life entry, much less can one perceive a change in their life disposition. It can be said with certainty that someone like this does not pursue the truth. If someone genuinely loves the truth, after a period of time, they will be able to talk about their understanding, and at least be able to act according to principles in some things; they will have some experience of life entry, and at the very least they will show some changes in behavior. Those who pursue the truth have a constantly improving spiritual state, their faith in God gradually increases, they have some understanding of what they reveal and of their corrupt dispositions, and they have personal experience of and genuine insight into how God works to save people. These things all become gradually elevated in them. If you see these manifestations in a person, you can know with certainty that this is someone who pursues the truth. People are fairly enthusiastic when they first come to believe in God, but they do not know anything about believing in God. They think that believing in God means being a good person and walking the right path. Later, through eating and drinking God's words and listening to sermons and fellowship, they are able to discern various matters. They realize that people have corrupt dispositions and that they should seek the truth to resolve them, and that they should accept God's salvation, and they understand what it means to believe in God. They gradually gain some understanding of God's work and God's intention to save mankind. This is accumulated little by little, and they gradually embark upon the right path of belief in God. Their understanding and experience of the truth realities are gradually elevated, and they don't get stuck on literal interpretations or on the words of doctrine. If a person has believed in God for several years and continues to speak the words of doctrine, often saying some catchphrases about believing in God, and it seems their faith is going quite well, but they cannot talk about life experience or about knowing themselves, and they are unable to discern nonbelievers and evil people, if these problems exist in them, it means that they do not know the work of God, and it can be determined that they have not pursued the truth in the few years that they've believed in God. This is a very clear sign.

To measure whether a leader or a worker has the truth reality, first look at whether their fellowship contains true testimony and new light. When you have not seen some people in a few years, their fellowship may feel new and fresh initially because they can speak with a new light after hearing a sermon. However, after you spend two or three days with them, they start speaking again about little experiences and testimonies from their past, about how God saved them and how He bestowed grace and blessings upon them. In less than a week, they repeat those superficial experiences and knowledge that they talked about before. Is this progress? With one look you can see that it is not progress. After believing in God for several years, they are equipped with a lot of words of doctrine and they can say some things that are correct, but when things befall them, they still get confused and cannot handle them. They cannot find the truth principles, nor can they discern people. Is this progress? (No.) This is not progress. Although they have performed their duties for several years, if you ask them whether they have achieved loyalty to God, they themselves do not understand. In any case, they are on time for every gathering and they appear to perform their duties normally. But if you ask them whether they have undergone any genuine transformation, they cannot provide a clear answer. This is a problem. It shows that they do not understand the truth. If they understood the truth, they would be able to see these problems clearly. Some people get some results in their duties, but if you ask them why they perform their duties, they can only say that created beings should perform duties, but they are not clear about the details. If you ask them if they possess principles of practice in the performance of their duties, they cannot gauge this. Would you say that they can perform their duties adequately? (No, they cannot.) This is not progress. Is it not bothersome to make no progress? If you ask them how they approach being dealt with and pruned while performing their duties, they say that they listen, obey, and do not resist. They had this principle several years ago, and they still have this same principle now, and it has not changed. In any case, they just do what they are told. If you ask them if they've gained any understanding from being dealt with and pruned, if they've discovered their own rebellious state and corrupt nature, or if their self-knowledge has become more profound, they do not know or understand any of that. At any rate, they hold to one rule: When faced with being dealt with and pruned, they must obey, adjust their mentality, not resist or justify themselves, and they must endure and meekly submit. This was their viewpoint before, and it is even more so now. Is this a manifestation of gaining the truth? (No.) In the process of believing in God, these people have not entered into the reality of any aspect of the truth, and they have not grasped the principles of any aspect of the truth firmly. Even though they are told, "When things befall you, you must practice the truth, grasp the truth principles firmly, and not stray from this scope," they still do not know how to seek the truth principles when things befall them, they are not meticulous, and they muddle their way through. It seems that they hold to the overarching direction, that they are obedient and listen, that they do the work they have at hand well, not perfunctorily and carelessly, and that they can protect the interests of the church, but do they understand the details of each aspect of the truth? Can they put them into practice? This depends on whether people have true knowledge and experience of each aspect of the truth. They don't know the relationship between each aspect of the truth, or which

aspects of the truth and which state are specifically involved when something happens, or which disposition caused that state. If two people say the same thing, they don't know the differences between the natures of those two people, nor how to treat them. Is this understanding the truth? This is not understanding the truth. If you have believed in God for three to five years but do not know the practical side of these truths, and if you have believed in God for eight or ten years and you still don't know it, then you have not gained the truth. What are you lacking now? Most people believe in God like they are holding on to a battle line, thinking that as long as they hold on to the words "belief in God" until the very end, they will succeed. However, they don't take the initiative to seek or accept the truth; they fail to perform their duties well, to stand firm in their testimony, and to defeat the enemy, Satan; and they have not gained the truth and the life. What a grave mistake! This is how pitiful it is, to have believed in God for many years without any life experiences. When people fall into such a state, they are only keeping busy every day on the surface, holding on to some regulations, not violating the administrative decrees within this scope, and finishing the work they have at hand. This is considered appropriate in the eyes of man, and if you measure this state using the truth, they have not committed a horrible mistake. What do you think of this way of believing? (God does not like it.) This response is just doctrine. From your own perspective, this kind of belief cannot obtain the truth because you never make progress. When, for a period of time, God's house speaks of truths about knowing God, you focus on knowing God; when it talks about dispositional change, you focus on dispositional change; when it talks about knowing God incarnate, you focus on knowing God incarnate; when it talks about the visions of God's work, you focus on truths relating to visions; when it speaks of truths about spreading the gospel, you focus on this aspect of the truth. You listen to and understand whatever God's house says, so when no one preaches sermons to supply you, will you have your own path? Will you still be able to move forward? How will you walk? For example, when people fellowship at gatherings on what obedience to God is, you say, "I don't have very deep experience of this, I just feel that obedience to God is crucial." When people ask you how you practice obeying God, you say, "To obey God is to think about what it is that God says when things befall you, and to practice according to His words." When people ask you to fellowship more details, and what to do if you are unable to obey when something befalls you, or what to do when your personal interests are involved, you say, "I haven't experienced those things yet." This means you have not yet gained entry. For a while, God's house speaks on truths about knowing God. When a person asks you if you have made progress in your knowledge of God, you say, "I have made progress. I think that knowing God is the most important thing in belief in God. If people don't know God, they will always offend God's disposition, and if people always do this, they will fall into the darkness, only be able to speak superficial words, and they won't understand any truths, they will be just like unbelievers—they will always do things that go against the truth, and they will always do things that resist God." That person asks again, "So, how do you know God? When you experience God's work, God's sovereignty, and God's guidance in your daily life, which things do you recognize as God guiding you, and in what things can you clearly feel God's sovereignty? How do you understand God's sovereignty? In real life, based on what you sense and feel, what aspect of God's disposition do you see in His sovereignty?" If you are unable to say anything, it proves that you have no experience. If you say, "There is one thing in which I feel God's guidance," this is just having a bit of a feeling, and it does not mean that you have knowledge of God. In fact, in real life, everything is ruled over, arranged, and ordained by God. If people have experienced a lot, they can feel that nothing is simple, and that everything happens so that people can learn lessons, and see God's sovereignty and His omnipotence, and ultimately come to know God's disposition. Only when you achieve this result will you know how to obey God in line with His will, then you will completely have a path forward in your practice. With this level of experience, not only does a person's faith get stronger and stronger, but the most important thing is that they have an understanding of God's disposition, and they know how to obey God. This is gaining the truth.

Some people always have deviations in their pursuit of the truth; they always focus on empty talk about some spiritual doctrines and hollow theories in order to show off. What do you think of this kind of pursuit? Regardless of whether you think you are a person who pursues the truth or not, the most crucial question right now is whether you have gained some practical things, namely, practical knowledge? (I have gained some.) What have you gained? Can you evaluate it? (I have gained some understanding and insight into how people are corrupted by Satan, and into this evil world.) You have gained a bit of knowledge. So, can this knowledge change your life direction, your goal in life, and your principles of comportment in your real life? No matter which group of people you live among, can this knowledge or the truths you've understood influence your life and your goal in life? If they can't completely change you, there must at least be some changes and some restraint in what you say and do. Right now, aren't most of you still stuck at this level in terms of your stature? (Yes.) This requires growth. If your understanding of the truth is too superficial, that's no good, nor is it any good to only be able to speak a bit of doctrine and to be a bit restrained. You must understand the truth to have a path to practice it and to be able to change your goal in life. If all of the truths you understand and the sermons you have listened to have already been accepted in your heart and can influence your life, change the direction and goal of your comportment, and change your principles of comportment, isn't this a bit better than the effects achieved by accepting a bit of restraint? Right now, you are stuck at accepting restraints and following rules—is this the path for actively practicing and entering? Absolutely not. If you remain stuck forever at accepting restraints or following rules, what will be the consequences? Will you be able to enter into the truth reality? Will you be able to undergo real change? Additionally, while being restrained and following rules, have you gotten any results in practicing the truth? Not at all. Therefore, focusing on understanding the truth is still the most important thing. Being restrained and following rules does not mean that you understand the truth, let alone that you are practicing the truth. Being restrained and following rules for a lifetime will not achieve the effect of understanding the truth and practicing the truth. It is futile! Therefore, no matter how much suffering one endures from being restrained and obeying rules, it does not have the slightest value or meaning.

After listening to sermons and understanding the truth, have you experienced any real changes? For example, thinking that your previous pursuits of specious knowledge and theories, and your pursuit of prestige, profit, and status is not belief in God, and that rather, it belongs to religious belief, and that pursuing prestige, profit, and status is vile, and that if you live and comport yourself like that, you will completely become a demon who should go to hell, and that living like that is too painful. Do you possess this experience and knowledge? What personal experience do you have? That pursuing knowledge and prestige, profit, and status is so tiring! You feel that there are too many disputes, that there is too much trouble, and that life is tiring and too painful living among unbelievers. You say, "I can't live like that. If I live like them, I'll be in as much pain as they are. I need to break away from their way of life." Is this your firsthand experience? You have deeply experienced that corrupt mankind does not accept the truth in the slightest, that they all fight, scheme, and try to cheat each other, that they undermine each other in secret, and that they beat each other until blood is shed for just a little profit. You have experienced how none of them want to walk the right path of life, and that instead, they rely on tricks and schemes to do things. What do you feel the most when living in such an environment? You feel that there is no fairness or righteousness in that world, that it is too evil and too dark, and that people live like demons there. You think if you were to try to be a good person, it would not be easy and you couldn't achieve it. You feel that if you wanted to adapt to that world, you would also need to become a demon and live like a demon, so that you could blend in with groups of demons and join with social trends; in order to fight for a bite of food and for your own livelihood and survival, you'd have to contend with them and say and do things that go against your will. Living like this each day would be so exhausting, but if you didn't live like that, people would exclude you, and you would have no way to live. In this kind of living environment, what have you experienced? Pain, torment, and helplessness. You have experienced evil, cruelty, and darkness that exists between people, and you cannot see the light of human life. When you came to believe in God and focused on reading God's words, what did you experience? (I understood the truth in my heart, I felt that it is better to believe in God, and I felt comfort in my heart.) While living in God's house, you feel blissful, you have God's blessings, and you can understand many truths; when you are with your brothers and sisters, you can help and support each other, treat each other equally, and live in harmony. Every day, you feel at ease in your heart, and free and liberated. You do not need to worry about being deceived and you are no longer oppressed and mistreated by others. Evildoers are gradually exposed and cast out, and they become fewer and fewer in number. The house of God is reigned by the truth and by God. God's chosen people can speak freely without restriction, they have the right to elect, and the right to expose wicked people. Those who do not accept the truth and are furthermore capable of doing evil are gradually cleared out. No phenomena exist of people being tormented or suppressed in the house of God. If there is an issue, everyone discusses it. If there is a problem, leaders and workers fellowship on the truth to solve it. People gradually come to understand the truth, and fewer and fewer of those lawless things occur. God's chosen people can all accept the truth, be restrained by the truth, and make some changes in terms of their words and deeds. If anyone does evil, everyone can clearly see it and reports it. Therefore, there are fewer and fewer evil people in God's house. Now, you feel more and more that the environment of God's house is truly good—the brothers and sisters love each other and anyone who has difficulties or deviations can obtain help; anyone who has hardships can have them resolved, and if there are problems that cannot be resolved, people can look to God and lean on Him, and resolve them according to His words. Living in God's house makes you feel blissful and hopeful, you can see the light, and you can fully enjoy God's love and salvation. This environment is very beneficial to people's progress in life. By living in the church, in this environment that has the truth, you can gradually understand the truth, your heart gradually becomes brighter, and you will feel free and liberated. These are results attained by understanding the truth. There is an obvious characteristic of people who have gained the truth: They are relatively free and liberated. They do not need to be restrained, the truth will influence their words and deeds, and it will change their way of life and their life's direction. When a heart of fear for God emerges within you, and when you have a heart that fears God guiding you, the nature of the things you do will be completely different from what you did before when you adopted self-control and restraint. Under these circumstances, if you were given status, and you had the opportunity and the right conditions to torment others, would you still do it? (No.) Why not? Is it because you don't plan to torment people, or because you don't have the ability to torment people? (It's because my disposition will have changed.) That's right, you will have a heart of fear for God, and you will have principles and a baseline in your actions. At this point, no matter what temptations you face, you will be able to say from your heart, "Doing this does not please God, and I cannot do things that offend God." Your stature will naturally reach this step, and you will be able to say such words. Right now, can you accomplish this step so naturally? (Not yet.) This proves that the truth has not yet had an effect within you; it merely restrains your behavior, but it cannot firmly restrain your heart, or change your life's direction, nor the principles and goal of your comportment.

You have all now begun focusing on pursuing the truth in your belief in God, so what do you base your conduct on? Conscience, the baseline for human conduct, and morality. How far are these things from the truth? Are conscience, the baseline for human conduct, and morality related to the truth? Far from it. At best, conducting yourself based on conscience can make you a good person, but it falls far short of God's requirement. God's requirement is for people to conduct themselves based on the truth and to live by His words. When a person who believes in God can grasp the truth, understand and practice the truth, and restrain themselves according to the principles of the truth, they will have grown up. If they do not pursue the truth, they will never grow up. Some people have begun to pursue the truth, and they have resolve, saying, "I must do my utmost to strive toward the truth and endeavor to practice according to God's words and the truth, to do things according to the rules, to act with principles and boundaries, and to refrain from doing things that offend God's disposition or that sin again God, without needing anyone to manage, restrain, or supervise me in order to do so. Although no one is supervising me, if doing something will offend the disposition of God, lacks a heart of fear for God, and will offend God, I absolutely will not do it. Even if I have that idea in my heart, I can restrain myself—I must not carry it out." This state is active and positive. For example, say that God's house asks someone to safeguard a precious object, and only a few people know about this. When other people know about this matter, that person is able to take good care of that object, to be concerned about it, and to prevent it from being lost, damaged, stolen, or ruined. At the same time, they are also able to refrain from being greedy and possessive, and in their heart, they thoroughly sanctify this object. Is this not a good person? From the present perspective, it can be said that they are a good person because they have no ideas or thoughts of misappropriating the object. Going one step further, they are able to safeguard this object with utter loyalty to their post, and shoulder this responsibility wholeheartedly and to the best of their ability, and it can be said that they are giving it their whole heart, and doing their job well. But one day things change. Some of the people who knew about this matter are arrested and imprisoned, and some are transferred to different locations. That person is the only one left who knows about this object. Under these circumstances, hasn't their environment changed? Yes, their environment has changed, and the test has arrived. At first, their heart remains unmoved, and they still seriously and responsibly safeguard the object without any other thoughts. Later, they hear that the people who knew about it have disappeared. Even then, they still think, "I cannot hatch any plans about this object; I must continue to safeguard it well. Even if people don't know about it, God knows!" Is this not a good person? (At present they still appear to be a good person.) Why is that? Because, when measured by the standards of being a good person, if one can reach this level, they are already very good. But one day, a major crisis occurs in their family, they urgently need money, and they don't have enough of it on hand. Their environment has changed again, and when the environment changes, the time has come once again for them to be tested. At first, they still consider borrowing money, but after two or three unsuccessful attempts, their heart starts to stir: "Don't I have a precious object in my possession? Isn't it foolish for me to go borrow money, when I have some right in front of me? No one knows that I'm safeguarding this object. Besides, this object is just gathering dust here. Isn't it just right for me to use it? I might as well!" They then have a better, logical thought, "Wasn't this prepared for me by God? God is showing me grace, thanks be to God!" The more they think about it, the more they feel that this is the appropriate thing to do. After contemplating for two or three days, they feel at peace in their heart, and their conscience does not rebuke them. Finally, they decide, "I'll just use this money!" What happened? (A change in their thinking began to occur.) How did this change in their thinking come about? (It was caused by the environment.) So, is there a problem with the environment? Did the environment change them? (No.) Then how can we accurately describe this? When their environment changed twice before, why didn't their heart waver then? (It was not yet a time of extreme poverty and frustration.) Before this point is reached, a person's true inner thoughts and true dispositions will not be exposed. At that time, can we say that this person is loyal to God? Or that they love the truth? We could say that, because when they safeguarded the offering, they were able to do their duty with all their heart and strength, without any other ideas or active thoughts. They never hatched any plans about that object—what a great person! However, when their living environment changed and they felt trapped with no way out, their active thoughts emerged, and they began to hatch plans about the offering. In fact, it's not that they didn't have these thoughts before, but that they hid them in their heart. Upon encountering a suitable environment, their thoughts naturally surfaced like spring water. In the end, they even found "grounds" for this, saying that it was prepared for them by God. When these "grounds" were found, wasn't their evil nature exposed? Where did their loyalty, goodness, and sense of justice go? (They are gone.) So, were their previous manifestations just an act? They were not an act; they were also natural outpourings, but they weren't deep ones. They were the most superficial outpourings, they were surface-level phenomena. There are some illusions among the surface-level phenomena of humanity, and sometimes people can't see through them and are easily deceived. For example, some people appear to perform their duties very well for six months or a year, but after one year, they become negative. After two years, they might run away and return to the secular world; some to make money, and some to live their own lives. So, it would be wrong for you to determine that they are a person who sincerely expends for God based on their performance within six months or a year. Their behavior for those six months or a year is actually an illusion, a temporary enthusiasm. When faced with some environments and temptations, their true countenance, and the adulterations in the intentions behind their belief in God are exposed. Isn't this a fact? They haven't changed at all. What exactly does God want to change in people? What problems does God want to solve by getting people to accept the truth? (Things within man's nature.) That's right, it is the things within man's nature that must be solved. When nothing has befallen them, people have a fundamental moral baseline and they don't take advantage of others. Especially the elderly often say, "Don't covet the possessions of others, and do not part with your own." That is to say, do not casually give away your own belongings, and do not become greedy or have covetous thoughts toward other people's belongings. This is just what normal humanity should possess and it falls short of the truth. So, can people achieve this? (They cannot.) People can't even achieve this, and yet they say not to have covetous thoughts. Seizing other people's belongings without even waiting for covetous thoughts to arise within oneself—this is the result of the domination of one's nature. As long as the environment permits, people don't even need to think about it, they will pour forth the evil nature within them, and their vicious, greedy, and deceitful dispositions. Regarding the person who misappropriated the offering in the example I just mentioned—which of their ideas and manifestations were deceitful? (They seized God's offering, while claiming that God prepared this and opened up a way out for them.) This is deceitful, it is deceiving oneself as well as others. They tricked themselves and they tried to trick God too. They used these pleasant-sounding words to prevaricate themselves, and to comfort their own conscience so that they could avoid its accusations. Moreover, they fabricated a beautiful lie for themselves, and they wanted to use this lie to fool and trick God. Isn't this deceitful? (Yes.) It is deceitful. When you are faced with such environments, and your nature gives birth to thoughts and makes you want to do something, first of all, your conscience will take effect inside you, and then the truths that you understand will also take effect, making you realize that thinking in this way will get you nowhere, that it's despicable and evil, and that what you think and believe are not the truth. Although you temporarily have the impulse to do this thing, after praying to God, you think, "I cannot do this; it would offend God. It is evil! Doing this is incompatible with the truth, and wouldn't it be tricking God? I can never do this. This is something that is sanctified, it belongs to God, and it absolutely must not be touched. Although no one knows about this thing, and only God knows about it, because only God knows about it, I absolutely can't touch it." If a person can think in this way, then they have real stature. If they relied on their good intentions and moral baseline, could they restrain themselves? Could they guarantee that they would not steal the offering? (They could not.) What must a person possess in order to achieve this? (They must have fear of God in their heart.) Only the truths that you understand, your knowledge of God, and the fear of God in your heart can restrain your heart and actions, and determine what path you choose and how you conduct yourself in accordance with God's will. Besides the truth and the words of God, is there a second thing that can help people to achieve this? No, there isn't. This is the only way; this can enable you to fear God and shun evil. No matter what kind of environments you encounter, whether they're trials or temptations, they can't change your loyalty and obedience to God. Once you solidify your resolve, it will never change. No matter how difficult an environment you encounter, even if it is an especially big temptation for you, your resolve will remain unchanged, and your principles for doing things will remain unchanged. In this way, you will stand firm in your witness, and you will obtain the truth. God will not test you again with regard to this matter. You will have overcome it and you will have stood firm. Right now, can most people reach this stature? (They cannot.) They still cannot reach it, which proves that the truth has not become their life. Then what things are their life now? Satan's philosophies for living, Satan's poisons, and some human instincts, that is, to hold on to the baseline of morality and human conduct, as well as some spiritual doctrines and expressions that they acquired after coming to believe in God. Having grasped these things, people always think, "I have obtained the truth. I have understood so much in my belief in God. I have changed and I have gained something." What is it that they have gained? In fact, it is only surface-level things. It is just having some restraint in their behavior, and their behavior being somewhat more regulated. Additionally, they can ponder in a more positive way in their mind and heart and think more about positive things. Due to the influence of their environment, listening to sermons often, as well as performing their duties, and being in contact with positive things more and more frequently, they are affected in some positive ways. These are the benefits and changes that the environment of the church brings to people. But how big and how numerous are the changes that the truth brings to people? This depends on their pursuit. If you are truly a person who pursues the truth, then you will always gain something in terms of the practical aspects of the truth, and you will gain a little bit and understand a bit at each stage. In their hearts, people understand and have a feeling about whether they have gained something or not. What do most people feel now? That, based on their good intentions, they are often diligently and deliberately doing some good deeds, things that people believe possess conscience and sense, and things that won't get them accused or criticized by others. Even though they are good deeds, it cannot be said that they are the practice of the truth. Is this not the case? (Yes.) Most people have a fundamental principle for their actions, which is to act according to their conscience. They feel that the truth is too profound, too abstract, and that it seems too distant from people. People don't understand the truth well and they can't explain it clearly, so they merely act according to their conscience, and muddle through day after day. Some people don't even have any of the awareness of conscience, and they don't act according to the standards of conscience. Some people perform their duties without getting any results at all; they are just freeloading and enjoying God's grace but not giving anything in return, without any guilt in their hearts. Do these people have conscience and sense? If you ask them, "How do you feel about living like this?" They say, "God's will is too great, I cannot reach it. In any case, I am a person who sincerely believes in God, and I have not done evil. I feel peace in my heart." Do people such as this practice the truth? Although they perform their duties, are they sincerely expending themselves for God? From man's perspective, it seems that they are performing their duties, but they get no results in them at all. Can God commend them? They might say, "I perform my duties based on my conscience, I'm not idle, I'm not lazy, and I pay a price." But does this standard of conscience represent that they are practicing the truth? When you have time, you should ponder, come up with a topic to fellowship on together, and see how you should act in order to practice the truth. Don't just stop at the standard of conscience, or at the standards of being a good person and having good behavior. Don't be satisfied with being a people-pleaser. You need to pursue and enter into the height of the truth. Only in this way can you satisfy God's will and enter into the truth reality. If you always seek to satisfy your conscience, and think that you're doing fine so long as you do not breach the moral baseline, then you will always stay within this scope when you do things, and you won't go beyond this scope, which means that the truth will never have anything to do with you. If your actions and words never have anything to do with the truth, can you still obtain the truth? It will be difficult for you to obtain the truth.

In ancient times, scholars often studied the books "The Analects of Confucius," "Tao Te Ching," and "Three Character Classic." They shook their heads all day long, as if chanting scriptures, with classical sayings always on their lips. After reading a few books and memorizing a few Tang and Song poems, they considered themselves knowledgeable and spent their days lecturing others, thinking themselves very impressive. In their whole lives, they weren't able to accomplish anything righteous and just conducted themselves based on those few books of sages that they had read. They didn't understand anything, and they couldn't figure anything out. They muddled through life, achieving nothing. And yet, they still felt pleased with themselves in their hearts, thinking they understood a lot and were superior to all others. There is a phrase called "being holier-than-thou"—it is very correct, and you absolutely must not live in such a state. Some people always feel that they have knowledge and benevolence and righteousness in their hearts. Consequently, they feel all holier-than-thou, and think that they are entirely worthy of being called a good person and a gentleman. Some people especially value loyalty and would take a bullet for their friends. Some people especially value conscience and are able to fulfill the words: "The kindness of a drop of water should be repaid with a gushing spring." Some people don't get married, and they cultivate their minds and bodies through self-reflection, and pursue immortality. Some people devote themselves entirely to studying books of sages and pay no attention to outside matters. Are these so-called good people truly good people? They live by their knowledge, and they speak and act with a little conscience, so can these people be considered to have the truth reality? Can they really be guaranteed to not do evil? Some people have good intentions toward others, and frequently offer charity and assistance, so they believe themselves to be great philanthropists. But is it accurate to judge whether a person is good or evil by always relying on the claims of traditional culture? Always using moral standards to evaluate others and show yourself off is being holier-than-thou. Do these holier-thanthou people have the truth? Can they accept and submit to the truth? Certainly not. If they were to gain power and status, could they oppose God and cruelly persecute people who believe in Him? They are more than capable of doing this, which illustrates that they still have malice in their nature, and that their nature is that of Satan. Based on this, it can be determined that those who always live by knowledge and traditional culture are all hypocrites, who can do evil and resist God. Some people have believed in God for several years, yet surprisingly, they have no discernment of traditional culture and knowledge. They cannot thoroughly understand that, in essence, these things are satanic philosophies, logic, and laws, and they are a knowledge and culture that harms people. Do such people have the truth reality? People who cannot see through traditional culture and knowledge, and have no discernment of them, are people who do not understand the truth at all, and who do not possess the slightest truth reality. There are people who think that some kinds of knowledge can also help people to be good and that these kinds of knowledge instruct people to do good deeds. This is very wrong. Knowledge is not the life; it is a kind of rule, it is in opposition to the truth, and it is a fallacy. No matter how lofty or deep a person's knowledge is, they can't even see through mankind's corrupt essence, or their own nature, or what corrupt mankind is. What is the use of their knowledge then? Isn't it the most superficial and misleading doctrine? Like Confucianist theory and the "Tao Te Ching"—the words in these so-called classical Chinese sage books are specious, they are lies that deceive, they are hypocritical heresies and fallacies, and they are satanic poisons and logic. Some people worship these things as the truth—are they still believers in God? If you believe in God in your heart and listen to sermons and read God's words every day, why can't you understand the truth? Why can't you make the truth the goal of your pursuit? These people are the most foolish and utterly ignorant people, they are beasts in human clothing, and they are inhuman.

What is the truth? First of all, it must be determined that philosophies for dealing with the world are definitely not the truth, and that the mottos of celebrities and great figures are not the truth. The sayings from Confucianism and Taoism, the good behaviors and actions that are inherited and commonly recognized by corrupt mankind, the things and theories that guide people's minds, and so on—none of these things are the truth. Is deriving pleasure from helping others the truth? (No.) Deriving pleasure from helping others and being charitable are good acts, and a warm-hearted person is at least kindhearted and able to take pity on others—why is this not in line with the truth? (There are no principles to how they help people.) Is helping people without principles being a good person? That's being a people-pleaser and trying to be on good terms with everyone. Is showing filial piety toward one's parents the truth? (No, it's not.) Being filial to one's parents is a correct and positive thing, but why do we say that it is not the truth? (Because people do not show filial piety to their parents with principles and they are not able to discern what kind of people their parents truly are.) How a person should treat their parents relates to the truth. If your parents believe in God and treat you well, should you be filial to them? (Yes.) How are you filial? You treat them differently from brothers and sisters. You do everything they say, and if they are old, you must stay by their side to care for them, which stops you from going out to perform your duty. Is it right to do this? (No.) What should you do at such times? This depends on the circumstances. If you are still able to look after them whilst performing your duty near your home, and your parents do not object to your faith in God, then you should fulfill your responsibility as a son or daughter and help your parents with some work. If they are ill, look after them; if something is troubling them, comfort them; if your financial circumstances allow, buy them the nutritional supplements that suit your budget. However, what should you choose to do if you are busy with your duty, there is no one to look after your parents, and they, too, believe in God? What truth should you practice? Since being filial to one's parents is not the truth, but only a human responsibility and obligation, what then should you do if your obligation conflicts with your duty? (Prioritize my duty; put duty first.) An obligation is not necessarily one's duty. Choosing to perform one's duty is practicing the truth, whereas fulfilling an obligation is not. If you have this condition, you may fulfill this responsibility or obligation, but if the current environment does not allow it, what should you do? You should say, "I must do my duty—that is practicing the truth. Being filial to my parents is living by my conscience and it falls short of the practice of the truth." So, you should prioritize your duty and uphold it. If you have no duty now, and don't work far from home, and live close to your parents, then find ways to take care of them. Do your best to help them live a little better and lessen their suffering. But this also depends on what kind of people your parents are. What should you do if your parents are of poor humanity, if they constantly hinder you from believing in God, and if they keep dragging you away from believing in God and performing your duty? What is the truth that you should practice? (Rejection.) At this time, you must reject them. You have fulfilled your obligation. Your parents don't believe in God, so you have no obligation to show filial respect to them. If they believe in God, then they are family, your parents. If they do not, then you are walking different paths: They believe in Satan and worship the devil king, and they walk the path of Satan; they are people who are walking different paths to those who believe in God. You are no longer a family. They regard believers in God as their adversaries and enemies, so you have no more obligation to take care of them and must cut them off completely. Which is the truth: being filial to one's parents or performing one's duty? Of course, performing one's duty is the truth. Performing one's duty in God's house is not simply about fulfilling one's obligation and doing what one is supposed to do. It is about performing the duty of a created being. Herein is God's commission; it is your obligation, your responsibility. This is a true responsibility, which is to fulfill your responsibility and obligation before the Creator. This is the Creator's requirement of people, and it is the great matter of life. But showing filial respect to one's parents is merely the responsibility and obligation of a son or daughter. It is certainly not commissioned by God, and less still does it accord with God's requirement. Therefore, between showing filial respect to one's parents and performing one's duty, there is no doubt that performing one's duty, and that alone, is practicing the truth. Performing one's duty as a created being is the truth, and it is a bounden duty. Showing filial respect to one's parents is about being filial to people. It does not mean that one is performing their duty, nor does it mean that they are practicing the truth. After fellowshiping about these things in this way, you should be able to differentiate these things on your own, and know what is the truth and what is not the truth. Have a think now about what other things people esteem that are regarded as the truth? (The term "positive energy" is often used in society; this is also a negative thing and not the truth.) Most of the terms that unbelievers speak about are devilish things. From what background did the term "positive energy" emerge? These popular sayings, strange theories, or buzzwords that emerge in society all have a background. Do you know the background from which this buzzword emerged? In China, the social climate is becoming increasingly wicked, and people advocate for wickedness. No matter what the devils say or do, people follow. Although some people cannot stand this and comment on it, it is of no use, and no one responds. In China, wickedness has become a trend, and no group of people can stop this wicked trend. Everyone feels that the country's morals are declining more with each passing day. Evil demons hold all the power, and completely control the country and its people. The devils do whatever they want, and no one can stop them. In order to fool the public, those in power have done many specious things to confuse and deceive people, even claiming that these actions all belong to positive energy. This is the background from which "positive energy" emerged. What do unbelievers mean by "positive energy"? It's what they call righteousness or a kind of good behavior. In actuality, can this positive energy have an effect in society? Can it resolve the inundation of wicked trends? Can it stop the tendency of wicked trends to develop? It cannot; it cannot change anything. Why can't it change anything? The term "positive energy" sounds very powerful, so why can't it change anything or solve any problems? It can't even change or solve the problem of children being addicted to the internet all day long. In the past, there was still a bit of affection and a bit of conscience and reason between people, and there was still a bit of propriety between neighbors, but now it is different. Human relationships have become fickle and inconstant, and people are all like strangers to each other. People don't even care when they see accidents befall their neighbors, nor do they dare to get involved when they see someone calling for help. What is the problem here? Is it because there is no positive energy that people become like this? Could it be that there was positive energy in society before? No, it was just the same. "Positive energy" is just a pleasant-sounding term, there is nothing practical in it. It is an empty theory that is completely ineffective.

Tell Me, who's worse: people in the past or people today? (People are worse now.) How do you measure that? Your point of view is that people today are hard-hearted, and lacking in familial love and genuine friendships, that no one cares about loyalty or conscience, and that people always say, "How much is conscience worth?" "What about conscience? Making money comes first!" You think that people have lost their consciences, and that it's normal now for people to shortchange others when selling goods and earn dirty money, and that everyone swindles and defrauds each other. By contrast, you believe that skilled merchants in ancient times had principles in selling goods, that they sold their goods at fixed prices, were honest with all their customers, both young and old, and did not deceive anyone. Therefore, you think that people in the past were much better than people are now. So, what is this "better" referring to? It's actually based on conscience and the behaviors they live out. If you measure people based on this, people in the past were better than people are now. People in the past were simpler and more guileless, and they had a sense of conscience and shame. They had a baseline for their conduct and at least didn't do anything too lacking in conscience, nor did they do anything to make people criticize them behind their backs or that would give them a bad name. People today don't care about those things; they don't have a sense of shame. They only want to make money and a name for themselves. That's why it's said that people today are thoroughly bad. So, how did the thoroughly bad people of today develop this way? Haven't they just multiplied from generation to generation, from ancient times to the present? People today are no different from people in ancient times. Their DNA has not changed and neither has their appearance. It's just that the living conditions are better than in ancient times. Today, people learn more complex things and are proficient in more fields, their knowledge is higher than that of ancient people, they possess more skills than ancient people did, and they have the capital of arrogance. If we look at it from this perspective, is it accurate to say that people today are worse than people in the past? How can we evaluate whether this statement is accurate and in line with the truth? Let's expound on it like this: If you watch historical dramas, whether they are about the imperial court, Jianghu,^a or the lives of ordinary people, the plots will be filled with conflict. This is the true side of humanity. Humans fight each other for power and for their own desires in life-or-death struggles. In this, human nature is exposed very thoroughly and vividly and it is exactly like Satan. So, is it true that all those things you see happening now have only occurred in one time period? Do people fight so fiercely in certain places on earth because there's bad feng shui there, and because unclean demons swarm there? Or is it that those people have bad genes, making them aggressive by nature? (Neither.) Then how do these conflicts come about? They're all fought for the sake of power, status, and self-interest. No matter the social stratum, from high to low, people have always been constantly fighting and competing, fighting until they're exhausted, and competing within an inch of their lives. What can we see from these phenomena? Judging from these microcosms of the development of all of human history and from the perspective of historical facts, the nature of mankind has never changed. As long as people live under Satan's power, the content of life that plays out in each era and each stage remains the same, as does its essence. This is because the goals, causes, and roots of human conflicts are always the same—they are all fought for the sake of power, status, and ultimately, for self-interest. All means of conflict stem from one source—the nature and disposition of Satan. Why have the means and methods of human conflict remained unchanged? This is entirely due to human nature. People rack their brains and look for every means to fight and harm each other, defrauding, deceiving, and cheating one another—they use all kinds of deceitful means. Whether in major political struggles or in conflicts among humble families, they are always fighting for their own interests. This is the true face of humanity, the true colors of mankind. The mankind that has developed to the present is still the same mankind and it is still the same Satan that corrupts mankind. Even though the external environment is gradually changing, this doesn't mean that human nature has changed. Although the methods and means of human conflicts may have slightly changed, the fighting nature of man and the starting point of these conflicts have not changed at all. Man still has one nature, and there is still one goal and one source of these conflicts—these things haven't changed at all. You said that people in the past were better. In what way were they better? They were restrained a bit by traditional culture, so they were more or less capable of doing some good deeds. Now mankind has developed to this day, and no matter how high the quality of life is, how much knowledge and education people acquire, or the breadth of their experience, human nature has not changed. Moreover, with the development of society, revelations of human nature are becoming increasingly evil, blatant, and unscrupulous. No matter how many words God speaks or how many truths He expresses, people ignore them. People don't love the truth at all, instead they have become even more sick of the truth, and feel even more hatred for it. Are there any people who do good things in society now? (Yes, but fewer than before.) Then, can you say that these people are good, and that they haven't become bad? (No.) Surely they are not living in a vacuum? What kind of good things do they do? They are merely good behaviors and good intentions. If you talk to them about matters of believing in God, such as believing in God in order to be a good person and to worship God, observe their reactions. If they hear that people will end up being persecuted by the government if they believe in God, they will treat you as an enemy and ridicule you. If you are being pursued and persecuted, and you try to hide at their homes for a bit, they will report you and hand you over to the government. They will take a victim of a car accident to the hospital to save their life, yet they will also send a good person who believes in God into the hands of evil demons, to be abused or even persecuted to death. How do you explain this? Which behavior reflects their nature? The latter is their nature. They save other people, and they also place other people in deadly situations. Are such people humans or demons? If there is just one day where a person does not cast off their satanic nature, they will be capable of doing evil and resisting God. As long as they can resist God, they are not a good person. Is this statement right? (Yes.) What is right about it? (What they practice is not the truth. No matter how good their external actions and behavior are,

a. Jianghu is a Chinese term that refers to the fantastical world of martial artists and criminals in ancient China.

their nature is still hostile to God.) Their nature is hostile to God. This statement is true. How do we explain this statement? Why do we say that someone who is hostile to God is not a good person? (God is a symbol of all positive things. If someone can be hostile to God, then what's inside them is all negative.) In theory, that's how it is, and that statement is true. No matter how good or pious someone may appear on the outside, no matter how much they derive pleasure from helping others or how kind they are to others, if they feel aversion and antipathy when they hear positive things, and if they cannot accept the truth when they hear it and feel sick of it, then what kind of person are they? They are not a good person. People who are enemies of positive things and the truth are not good people. In general, you can say that. Of course, there are many details within this. Let Me give you an example, and then you will understand why this statement is the truth. For example, some people abandon their families because they believe in God and perform their duties. They become famous because of this and the government frequently searches their house, harasses their parents, and even threatens their parents to hand them over. All their neighbors talk about them, saying, "This person has no conscience. They don't care for their elderly parents. Not only are they unfilial, but they also cause so much trouble for their parents. They are an unfilial child!" Are any of these words in line with the truth? (No.) But aren't all these words considered right in the eyes of the unbelievers? Among unbelievers, they think this is the most legitimate and reasonable way of looking at it, and that it is in line with human ethics, and in accordance with the standards of human conduct. No matter how much content is included in these standards, such as how to show filial respect to parents, how to take care of them in their old age and arrange their funerals, or how much to repay them, and regardless of whether these standards accord with the truth or not, in the eyes of unbelievers, they are positive things, they are positive energy, they are right, and they are considered irreproachable within all groups of people. Among unbelievers, these are the standards for people to live by, and you have to do these things to be an adequately good person in their hearts. Before you believed in God and understood the truth, didn't you also firmly believe that such conduct was being a good person? (Yes.) Moreover, you also used these things to evaluate yourself and restrain yourself, and you required yourself to be this kind of person. If you wanted to be a good person, you must have surely included these things in your standards of conduct: how to be filial to your parents, how to make them feel less worried, how to bring them honor and credit, and how to bring glory to your ancestors. These were the standards of conduct in your heart and the direction of your conduct. However, after you listened to God's words and His sermons, your viewpoint began to change, and you understood that you have to forsake everything to fulfill your duty as a created being, and that God requires people to conduct themselves this way. Before you were certain that performing your duty as a created being was the truth, you thought you should be filial to your parents, but you also felt you should perform your duty as a created being, and you felt conflicted inside. Through the continuous watering and shepherding of God's words, you gradually came to understand the truth, and it was then that you realized that performing your duty as a created being is perfectly natural and justified. Up until this day, many people have been able to accept the truth and completely abandon the standards of conduct from man's traditional notions and imaginings. When you completely let go of these things, you are no longer constrained by words of judgment and condemnation from unbelievers when you follow God and perform your duty as a created being, and you could cast them off easily. So, why have those old, traditional notions disappeared from your heart? Could it be that you have become bad? Has your heart hardened and your conscience disappeared? (No.) In fact, your conscience hasn't changed, you are still the same person, and your personality, preferences, and standards of conscience and morals haven't changed. So, why don't you feel sad or pained when unbelievers say those words of judgment and condemnation, and instead feel peace and joy in your heart? This is guite a transformation, how have you become like this? (Through eating and drinking God's words, and coming to understand some truths, I have gained the correct standards of evaluation, and been able to discern that their words are just fallacies.) Unbelievers spread rumors about us, saying, "After these people start believing in God, they don't take care of their families, they have no love for their families, and they are particularly cold—they become like cold-blooded animals." It may seem that way on the outside, but it's not the reality. There is an essential problem here that blind people have no way of seeing. Could it really be that the truth makes people cold-hearted after they begin believing in God? (No.) So, what is really going on? (Those believers' perspectives on things have changed; they have understood the truth and gained discernment.) This is a result achieved through eating and drinking God's words. How is this result achieved? What changed your perspective on things? When did it begin to change? It is God's words that change people's perspectives, changing all their perspectives on life and various matters, making them different from those of unbelievers.

In the past, people always acted on their consciences and used them to measure others. People constantly had to pass the test of conscience, they always felt that gossip was a frightening thing, and were afraid of being laughed at or of gaining a bad reputation, or of being called "without a conscience, a bad person." So, they had to reluctantly say and do some things to cope with the environment. How should these things be measured now? (By the truth principles.) How were things back then, when people's lives were bound by the notions and fallacies of unbelievers? By way of example, since you were small, your parents kept indoctrinating you with such words as: "When you grow up, you must make us proud; you must bring honor to our family!" What have these words been to you? An encouragement, or a restraint? A positive influence, or a kind of negative control? The fact is that they are a kind of control. Your parents set a goal for you based on some statement or theory that people think is right and good, making you live your life in service of that goal, and you end up losing your freedom.

Why do you end up losing your freedom and falling under its control? Because people think that bringing honor to their family is a good thing that should be done. If you don't share that thought or aspire to do things that bring honor to your family, you are seen as a foolish waste of space, a good-for-nothing loser, and people will look down on you. In order to be successful, you must study hard, gain ever more skills, and bring honor to your family name. That way, people won't bully you in the future. Are all the things you do for the sake of this goal not, in effect, shackles that bind you? (They are.) Since pursuing success and bringing honor to the family is what your parents demand, and since they are acting in your best interests so that you live a good life and do your family proud, it is only natural that you would aspire to such a lifestyle. But effectively, these things are troubles and shackles of a sort. When people do not understand the truth, they think that these things are positive, the truth, the right way, and therefore, they take them for granted and abide by them or obey them, and they absolutely comply with these words and requirements that come from their parents. If you live by these words, working hard and dedicating your youth and your whole life to them, and finally you get to the top, live a good life, and do your family proud, you may be brilliant to other people, but inside, you are increasingly hollow. You don't know what the point of life is, or what destination the future holds, or what kind of path people should take in life. You haven't understood or gained anything at all about those mysteries of life whose answers you yearn for, and want to know, and want to understand. Have you not effectively been ruined by your parents' good intentions? Have your youth and your whole life not been ruined by your parents' demands, which, in their words, are "in your best interests"? (They have.) So, are your parents right or wrong to make demands that are "in your best interests"? It may be that your parents genuinely think that they are acting in your best interests, but are they people who understand the truth? Do they have the truth? (They do not.) Many people spend their whole lives hanging on their parents' words, "You must make us proud, you must bring honor to the family"—words that inspire them, and that influence them throughout their lives. When the parents say, "It's in your best interests," this becomes the impulse behind a person's life, providing a direction and goal to work toward. As a result, no matter how glamorous that person's life, no matter how dignified and successful it is, their life is actually ruined. Is that not so? (It is.) Does this mean that if someone doesn't live according to their parents' demands, they are not ruined? No; they also have a goal of their own. What goal is that? It is still the same, namely to "live a good life and do their parents proud," not because their parents have told them to, but because they have accepted this goal from elsewhere. They still want to live by these words, and do their family proud, and get to the top, and become an honorable, dignified person. Their goal hasn't changed; they still dedicate their whole life, and live their whole life, trying to achieve these things. So, when people do not understand the truth, and accept many so-called correct doctrines, correct statements, and correct views that prevail in society, they turn those correct things into the direction, foundation, and motivation for their own life's efforts. In the end, people live uncompromisingly and unreservedly for the sake of these goals, struggling through life until they die, at which point, some are still unwilling to see the truth. What pitiful lives people lead! However, once you understand the truth, do you not then gradually leave behind these so-called correct things, correct teachings, and correct statements, as well as your parents' expectations of you? Once you gradually leave behind these so-called correct things, and the standard by which you measure things is no longer based on the statements of traditional culture, are you not then no longer bound by those statements? And if you are not bound by these things, do you live freely? You may not then be completely free, but at least the shackles will have been loosened. In their belief in God people still have a lot of notions, imaginings, intentions, and impurities, as well as their philosophies for dealing with the world, deceitful thoughts, corrupt natures, and so on. When these things are resolved, and people are able to live entirely by the truth, they will live before God and be truly liberated and free.

What is the first priority when it comes to pursuing and obtaining the truth now? It is to first dissect the specious fallacies and sayings that you previously thought were right and that belong to traditional notions, and to cast them off once you have thoroughly understood their essence. These things are the first layer of shackles that bind people. Now, how many of these things do you still keep in your hearts? Have you completely cast them off? (Not completely.) Is it easy to cast these things off? For example, some people want to perform their duties but also feel that they must honor their parents, which involves feelings. If you just keep dealing with your feelings, telling yourself not to think about your parents and family, and to only think about God and focus on the truth, but you still can't help but think about your parents, this cannot solve the fundamental problem. To solve this problem, you need to dissect the things you thought were right, along with the sayings, knowledge, and theories that you inherited and that align with human notions. In addition, when dealing with your parents, whether you fulfill your obligations as a child to take care of them must be entirely based on your personal conditions and God's orchestrations. Doesn't this explain the matter perfectly? When some people leave their parents, they feel that they owe their parents a lot and that they do nothing for their parents. But then when they do live together, they are not filial to their parents at all, and they do not fulfill any of their obligations. Is this a truly filial person? This is saying empty words. No matter what you do, what you think, or what you plan, those things are not important. What is important is whether you can understand and truly believe that all created beings are in the hands of God. Some parents have that blessing and that destiny to be able to enjoy domestic bliss and the happiness of a large and prosperous family. This is God's sovereignty, and a blessing God gives them. Some parents don't have this destiny; God has not arranged this for them. They are not blessed to enjoy having a happy family, or to enjoy having their children stay by their side. This is God's orchestration and people cannot force this. No matter what, ultimately when it comes to filial piety, people must at least have a mindset of obedience. If the environment permits and you have the means to do so, then you can show your parents filial piety. If the environment does not permit and you lack the means, then do not try to force it—what is this called? (Obedience.) This is called obedience. How does this obedience come about? What is the basis for obedience? It is based on all of these things being arranged by God and ruled over by God. Though people may wish to choose, they cannot, they do not have the right to choose, and they should obey. When you feel that people should obey and that everything is orchestrated by God, don't you feel calmer in your heart? (Yes.) Then will your conscience still feel rebuked? It will no longer feel constantly rebuked, and the idea of not having been filial to your parents will no longer dominate you. Occasionally, you may still think about it as these are some normal thoughts or instincts within humanity, and no one can avoid them. For example, upon seeing that their mother is sick, normal people feel distressed and wish they could suffer in her place. Some people say, "If only my mother could be cured, even if it means shortening my life by a few years!" This is the positive side of humanity; it is human instinct. So, when you see that your mother is sick and you feel distressed, is this feeling of misery a problem? No, it is not a problem, because this is something that normal humanity should possess. Feeling distressed in your heart is a good thing; it proves that you have a heart and that you have humanity. In this world, your mother is the person God has arranged for you to be closest to. If she is sick and in pain, and you are indifferent, then are you still human? If you say, "I have no feelings for her and I have no feelings about her pain, I only feel pain when God feels pain!" Is this statement true? It is not true; it is false. Your mother gave birth to you, she raised you for so many years, she is the closest person to you, and she loves you the most. When she is sick and in pain, if you feel no distress in your heart, then your heart must be very hardened! This is not normal; don't strive to be this kind of person. Feeling distressed over this is very normal, but if you stop performing your duty because of this feeling of distress and you complain about God, is this normal? (No, it's not normal.) Why is it not normal? Because your thinking does not align with the truth and it is not what normal humanity should have, it is not normal. People have Satan's nature, they live by their corrupt dispositions, so they can violate the truth and lose their consciences and reason, just like suddenly becoming mentally ill. This is not normal, so how does this come about? It is caused by people's corrupt dispositions. Once their corrupt dispositions are revealed, they can resist God anytime and anywhere, and they can produce some thoughts that are not in line with the truth and that rebel against God on a whim anytime and anywhere. That's how it is.

Corrupt human beings all have feelings and are often constrained by them, which makes them unable to obey God or act according to the truth principles. To achieve obedience to God, one must resolve the issue of feelings. Which kind of feelings most obstruct people from practicing the truth and must be cast off? Which kind of feelings are a part of what normal humanity should possess and not a problem? Which kind of feelings belong to a corrupt disposition? These things must be clearly discerned. For example, say that your child is bullied, and as their mother, you protect them and go look for the family that bullied your child to reason with them—is this normal? That is your child, so it is proper and normal for you to protect them. But if your child bullies other children, if they even bully well-behaved children, and you see this but don't care, and you believe your child is pretty awesome, and you even secretly teach them to hit other people, and when others come to reason with you, you still defend your child, is this behavior right? No, it is not. What is the problem with this behavior? It is driven by feelings. Why do I say that it is driven by feelings? You think it's unacceptable for others to bully your child, and if your child suffers a little, you immediately go to resolve the problem and ask for an explanation, so why are you blind to your child bullying other people's children? You even encourage your child to hit others, isn't that malicious? People who do this are malicious in terms of their disposition. How can this be explained in terms of feelings? What characterizes feelings? Certainly not anything positive. It is a focus on physical relationships and satisfying the predilections of the flesh. Favoritism, defending other people's shortcomings, doting, pampering, and indulging all fall under feelings. Some people place great stock in feelings, they react to whatever happens to them based on their feelings; in their hearts, they know full well this is wrong, and yet are still incapable of being objective, much less of acting according to principle. When people are always constrained by feelings, are they capable of practicing the truth? This is extremely difficult! Many people's inability to practice the truth comes down to feelings; they regard feelings as especially important, they put them in the first place. Are they people who love the truth? Certainly not. What are feelings, in essence? They are a kind of corrupt disposition. The manifestations of feelings can be described using several words: favoritism, unprincipled protection of others, maintenance of physical relationships, and partiality; these are what feelings are. What are the likely consequences of people's having feelings and living by them? Why does God most loathe people's feelings? Some people are always constrained by their feelings, they cannot put the truth into practice, and though they wish to obey God, they cannot, so they feel tormented by their feelings. There are many people who understand the truth but cannot put it into practice; this, too, is because they are constrained by feelings. For example, some people leave their homes to perform their duties, but they are always thinking about their family, day and night, and they cannot perform their duties well. Is this not a problem? Some people have secret crushes, and there is only a place for that person in their hearts, which affects their performance of their duties. Is this not a problem? Some people admire and idolize others; they won't listen to anyone except for that person, to the extent that they don't even listen to what God says. Even if someone else fellowships the truth with them, they won't accept it; they only listen to that person's words, to their idol's words. Some people have an idol in their hearts, and they do not permit other people to speak about or touch their idol. If anyone talks about their idol's problems, they become angry and have to defend their idol and turn that person's words around. They won't allow their idol to suffer an injustice undefended and they do everything in their power to protect their idol's reputation; through their words, their idol's wrongs become right, and they do not let people speak true words or expose them. This is not justice; these are called feelings. Are feelings only directed toward one's family? (No.) Feelings are quite broad; they are a kind of corrupt disposition, they are not just about fleshly relationships between family members, they are not limited to that scope. They can also involve your superior, or someone who has shown you favor or helped you, or someone who has the closest relationship with you or who gets along with you, or your fellow townsman or friend, or even someone you admire—this is not fixed. Then is casting off feelings merely as simple as not thinking about your parents or family? (No.) Is it so easy to cast off feelings? When most people reach their 30s and can live independently, they don't miss home as much, and by their 40s, this becomes completely normal. When people have not yet reached adulthood, they feel very homesick and cannot leave their parents because they do not yet possess the ability to survive independently. Missing your family and missing your parents is normal. It's not a matter of feelings. It's when your attitude and viewpoint about doing things get adulterated with feelings that it becomes a matter of feelings. Because there is a blood tie between you and your parents on a fleshly level, and you have lived together for so many years, it is normal for you to miss your parents. Some people say they don't miss their parents at all, but perhaps they have just recently left home, and everywhere they look is fresh and new, they have finally gotten away from their parents' nagging, and no one is trying to control them, so they feel happy. But does feeling happy mean they have no feelings? No, it does not. Some people say, "I have believed in God for several years, and I have come to understand some truths. I perform my duty without being constrained by feelings at all and I have no feelings anymore." Is this statement practical? These are clearly the words of someone who doesn't understand the truth. When people listen to many sermons, understand some words and doctrines, and can talk about some spiritual theories, they think, "I have grown in stature and understood many truths. If I am arrested, I won't be a Judas. At least I have this faith and resolve. Isn't this stature? When I think back to my enthusiasm from when I first came to believe in God, I was willing to dedicate my whole life to God. That enthusiasm and that oath have not changed and have not faded in the slightest. Isn't this progress?" Is this a superficial phenomenon? (Yes.) These are all superficial phenomena. If people want to make real progress, they must understand the truth. Can being able to talk about doctrines and spiritual theories achieve real change? (No, it cannot.) If you can't even solve your own problems and you can't put any of the truth into practice, can you be of benefit to others? Just listening to sermons and understanding doctrines is useless; you must practice and experience God's words. When you understand the truth, you must practice it; only then will you possess reality. You can only understand the truth more deeply by practicing it, you can only gain the truth when you truly understand it, and you can only grow up by gaining the truth.

What do you understand now that I've fellowshiped with you and helped you to distinguish what the truth is and what correct words are? (That we have to view things based on the truth principles, and that we can't treat usual outward good behaviors or spiritual doctrines as the truth.) Good behaviors and correct sayings cannot change a person. No matter how true they are, not only are they not the truth, but they have nothing to do with the truth. If you always cling to them and treat them as the truth, then you will never understand the truth and you will never gain the truth. This is one aspect. There is another aspect, which is: Can spiritual doctrines enable a person to understand the truth? (No, they cannot.) Why? Although spiritual doctrines can all be considered to be correct words, they cannot achieve the result of changing a person's corrupt dispositions. So, what exactly can be relied on to change a person's corrupt dispositions? Some people say to rely on the truth, some people say to rely on understanding and accepting the truth, and others say to rely on practicing the truth. Are these words correct? From a literal perspective, there is a correct side to all of them, but they are all the shallowest doctrines; these doctrines cannot save you or solve your difficulties. When you face a situation and people tell you that you must accept the truth, you'll say, "How can I accept it? I have difficulties, and I can't let go!" Can these doctrines become your path for practicing the truth? (No, they cannot.) Some people say that when you face a situation, you should eat and drink more of God's words. You have heard this many times, but which of your difficulties has it solved? It is right to eat and drink more of God's words, but which aspect of God's words should you eat and drink? How should you link them to your difficulties? After you link them to your difficulties, how do you resolve them? What is the path of practice? Which aspect of the truth should you use to solve your difficulties? Aren't these real problems? (Yes.) These are the real problems. Therefore, correct doctrines cannot solve people's practical difficulties, let alone solve people's corrupt dispositions. What exactly can solve people's corrupt dispositions? Everyone knows that only the truth can resolve the problem of people's corrupt dispositions, but if people do not understand what the truth is, or if they do not seek or accept the truth, can their corrupt dispositions be solved? (No.) Therefore, to solve one's corrupt dispositions, one must experience God's work. That is to say, it is only by experiencing God's judgment and chastisement that one's corrupt dispositions can be purified. This requires people to pursue the truth and cooperate with God's work in order to achieve results. If you do not pursue the truth and only focus on understanding spiritual doctrines, not even knowing whether they are the truth or not, but accepting them as the truth, can this solve your corrupt dispositions? Additionally, if you do not understand the truth, when you reveal a corrupt disposition, can you discern this? Can you check it against God's words for comparison? You one hundred percent cannot. You might blindly apply rules, which is even less capable of solving your corrupt dispositions. What is the most important thing in solving corrupt dispositions? The most important thing is that people must understand the truth. Right now, most people regard doctrines as the truth and do not understand what the truth is. Just like the example of feelings I just mentioned, the first approach of the mother was to protect her child from being bullied, which is justified. From your point of view, "These are feelings; you cannot do that. This kind of behavior must be criticized and condemned." You define things that do not involve the truth, that are unrelated to the truth, and, in fact, some things that people should do instinctively, as things that violate the truth, and then you reject those things. You think that adhering to this principle is practicing the truth. And as for the second approach of the mother condoning her child's bullying of other people's children, when it really involves the revealing of a corrupt disposition and practicing the truth, you think, "As long as it is not doing evil, it is not such a big problem." Why do you have such thoughts and understanding? (Because we do not understand the truth.) The problem lies here! So, because they do not understand the truth, a lot of the time people choose an approach that they regard as right, and think that they are practicing the truth. Many times, because they do not understand the truth, people can only apply and abide by rules, and when faced with matters, they do not know how to handle them, so they treat abiding by rules as practicing the truth. Can people who believe in God like this achieve progress in life? Can they achieve an understanding of the truth and enter into reality? Many people believe that being able to talk about words and doctrines is understanding the truth and being an adequate believer in God. So, why do they still reveal corrupt dispositions in many matters? Why can't they solve the practical problems they encounter? This proves that being able to talk about words and doctrines is not understanding the truth at all. No matter how many doctrines you can speak about, it does not prove that you have obtained the truth. You must be able to solve practical problems and find the principles of practice, only that is truly understanding the truth. Many people think that as long as they can perform their duties, suffer, and pay the price, no matter what corrupt dispositions they reveal, it is not a big problem. They think that, as long as they perform their duties, as long as they can suffer, and not blame God, they are loving God and showing loyalty. There are many times where, because people do not understand the truth, they show some good intentions, but in fact they are disrupting and disturbing the work of the church, and yet they think that they are safeguarding the interests of God and God's house. What is going on? This happens because people do not understand the truth and do not have practical knowledge of the truth, which leads them to constantly do things that are contrary to the truth. Meanwhile, they think that they are doing the right thing, that they have practiced the truth, and that they have satisfied God's will. This is their greatest difficulty. Although it is a difficulty, there is always a way to solve it. The only way is that whenever you encounter a problem and reveal a corrupt disposition, you must reflect on yourself and seek the truth to understand it. As long as there are corrupt dispositions within you, then many kinds of states will arise in you. When people live in different environments and states, they will reveal some thoughts, perspectives, and intentions—these are their true inner states. By observing people's thoughts, perspectives, and intentions, you can see their dispositions and know what their natures are. By reflecting on yourself and discerning others in this way, it is easy to achieve results. It is only by knowing your own corrupt dispositions and thoroughly understanding their essence that you can fully achieve results in knowing yourself. Then you will naturally have a path for how you should seek the truth to resolve your corrupt dispositions. As long as people can accept the truth, their corrupt dispositions can be purified, and the problem of their corruption can be easily solved. If people cannot accept the truth, then they will never achieve a change in their life dispositions. Now, you are all willing to pursue the truth, so you must focus on the truth.

To solve people's nature, we must excavate it from its root, and from people's dispositions, rather than from people's ways of doing things. We also should not emphasize objective reasons and conditions, instead we must compare it against the truth. The truth expressed in God's words is targeted at people's corrupt dispositions. Take the example of feelings mentioned earlier: People think that sometimes missing one' parents or feeling homesick are feelings. Are these the same as what God refers to as feelings? (No.) Then the feelings you comprehend cannot be spoken of in the same breath as the feelings God talks about. The feelings you talk about belong to normal human states, they do not belong to a corrupt disposition. If you treat your fleshly kin as idols, and this causes you to not follow or obey God, then your feelings are too strong, and this belongs to a corrupt disposition. Therefore, this involves the issue of whether you have a pure comprehension of the truth. When you treat what you believe to be homesickness or being a bit kinder to one's parents as feelings, isn't this a distorted comprehension of the truth? In fact, what you comprehend is not the truth, and it does not align with the truth; it is merely an external phenomenon. What are the feelings that God speaks of? They are the second approach of how the mother treated her child that was mentioned earlier, which is a state of favoritism and giving unprincipled protection to someone. These are the feelings God exposes—the mother's revelation of a corrupt disposition in this matter. Aren't those two approaches radically different? The first approach is a normal phenomenon, and there is no need to deal with it, nor to dig deep into it, dissect it, and even less so to hold it up against the truth for comparison, or to practice a certain aspect of the truth or let go of something. Then, is this approach proper? Is it necessary to act in this way? It is not necessary; there is no right or wrong in this approach. The second approach involves a disposition. What kind of manifestations of feelings involve corrupt dispositions? (Favoritism, unprincipled protection of others, maintaining relationships of the flesh, and a lack of justice.) These are the things embodied by the word "feelings" that God speaks of. If you can understand this much and truly link these things to yourself, then you should put effort into resolving these corrupt dispositions. It is only when you are no longer constrained by these feelings, that your actions will all be the practice of the truth. Then the states that you understand feelings to encompass will completely correspond with the word "feelings" as spoken by God. This is the truth that you will understand. If you were asked to fellowship on what feelings are, and you speak about the first approach of the mother, this is a manifestation of not understanding the truth. If you fellowship about the second approach of the mother and dissect her corrupt disposition, then you understand the truth. If the things you fellowship about, experience, and understand are in line with the truth of God's words, and there are no contradictions or inconsistencies, this proves that you understand God's words, that you have grasped their meaning, that you have understood them, and that you can practice and apply them. Then you will have gained the truth and the life, and the implication of this is that you will have already entered into the truth reality. At that time, when you see this kind of thing again, you will be able to discern it, and you will know what kind of revelations are normal, and what kind of revelations are those of a corrupt disposition, and you will be completely clear about this in your heart. In this way, won't your actions be accurate? Won't your actions conform to the truth? Won't you have the truth reality? If you act accurately and understand the truth, then won't the understanding and experiences you fellowship on be able to help others and solve their difficulties? (Yes.) This is the practical side of the truth.

Some people do not perform their duties well because of their poor caliber, but they always claim it's because they lack conscience. Which explanation is accurate? (That they have poor caliber.) Sometimes, when a person performs a duty, they may grasp the basics of that professional knowledge, but not understand more advanced aspects of it, because they never learned them before. Their leader labels them as careless, perfunctory, slippery, and work-shy, but actually, they just lack professional knowledge, and have not learned those things yet, but they are already trying their best. Yet their leader says that they are careless and perfunctory—this is not in line with the facts. This is an indiscriminate use of terminology and indiscriminate labeling. Why do people use terminology and label others indiscriminately? Isn't it because they do not understand the truth? Some people will definitely say yes, some people will say that it is because they have poor caliber and are too muddled, and some other people will say that it is because their humanity is too evil and they have the wrong intentions. Which explanation is correct? In fact, all three of these states exist, and a judgment must be made according to the specific case. If it is caused by them not understanding the truth, but someone says that it is because they have poor caliber and are too muddled, then these words are not accurate. If it is clearly caused by their evil humanity and ulterior motives, but someone says that it is because they have poor caliber and are too muddled, this is distorting the facts, and it is likely to enable wicked people to slip through the cracks. There are other cases that are caused by people not understanding the truth, but others say that they're caused by those people's evil humanity. This way of looking at things is not accurate, and it is likely that they'll treat good people as evil people, which will have bad consequences. There are many people who can't discern these things and can't thoroughly understand the essence of the problem. They blindly apply rules and draw conclusions based on their own ideas, and then feel that they have discernment and that they can see things clearly. Isn't this arrogance and self-righteousness? If someone has bad humanity, and labels and condemns people indiscriminately based on their own ulterior motives, this is the nature of a wicked person. Such people are a minority; most people do this kind of thing because they do not understand the truth. Those who do not understand the truth indiscriminately apply rules and indiscriminately use spiritual terms. For example, some people clearly have a problem with their humanity, they always look for ways to slack off and do not put in effort while performing their duties, but those without discernment say this is poor caliber. Some people clearly have a sense of justice, and when they see something that violates the principles, they will bring it up and safeguard the interests of the church, but they are often labeled as arrogant and selfrighteous by people who do not understand the truth, and are even treated as evil people, which is truly being unjust to good people. Some people are clearly small in stature, and they momentarily become weak while constrained by their feelings, and people who do not understand the truth will characterize them as having too strong feelings and lacking a sincere heart for God. This is how people who lack the truth are—without considering the background or the actual situation, they keep indiscriminately applying rules, saying one thing at one moment, and another thing the next. Can such people use the truth to solve problems? (They cannot.) When people who don't understand the truth try to solve problems, they can't prescribe the right medicine. It's like they're trying to treat a person with stomach pain by treating their head; they can't find the root of the problem. They don't understand where the root of the problem is or what God's words say and refer to. This is not understanding the truth. Do you understand a lot or a little of the truth now? (A little.) For example, say that someone asks, "Why can't you obey when this matter befalls you?" People often say, "Because I don't know God!" Is this explanation right? Sometimes it's right and sometimes it's not. Most of the time it is not right, and this is just indiscriminate labeling. People grasp a bit of spiritual terminology and then apply it and use it indiscriminately, and as a result, many problems arise. Some are misinterpretations and some are judgments, and this creates harmful results, and even causes chaos. When those who do not have spiritual understanding learn something, they apply it and use it indiscriminately. They are the most likely to make mistakes and prone to make mistakes of principle. Whereas, people who have comprehension ability may make a few mistakes, but these mistakes are not issues of principle and they can learn lessons from those mistakes. If people have absurd comprehension, if they misinterpret God's words when they read them, if they have deviations in their understanding when they listen to sermons, and if they're liable to find fault and nitpick, this is very troublesome. Not only is it impossible for them to enter into the truth reality, but over time they will start to act recklessly and cause disturbances to the work of the church. This is a serious outcome.

Now, you should ponder: Are the words, doctrines, and spiritual theories you often talk about the truth? Do you understand the truth, or do you only understand doctrines? How many truth realities are there within your understanding? Once you understand these things you will truly have self-knowledge and you will know your own measure. For example, you have fellowshiped a lot on the truths of how to be an honest person, but have you truly understood them? Maybe you can fellowship some words and talk about some understanding, but how many of these realities have you entered into? Are you truly an honest person now? Can you speak clearly about this? Some people say, "Being an honest person means not telling lies, saying whatever is in your heart, not hiding anything, and not evading anything. This is the standard of being an honest person." What do you think of this statement? Does it conform to the truth? (No.) You can speak about words and doctrines, but when it comes to details of practice or specific problems, you are at a loss for words. This is not understanding the truth. People don't understand the truth, but they always think, "I already understand a lot, but God doesn't use me. If God were to use me, and I became a church leader, I could ensure that every brother and sister came to understand the truth." Isn't this very big talk? Do you really have that ability? Are people who can boast and brag honest people? These people don't understand the truth, yet they boast and brag—aren't they pitiful? (Yes, they're pitiful.) You are listening to many sermons now but if you never understand the truth, sooner or later you will walk the same path as the Pharisees, and then you will be a modern-day Pharisee. Isn't this a possibility? (Yes.) It is all too likely. People's satanic natures are deeply ingrained. If they acquire some knowledge or education, and can preach some correct theories and lofty sermons, it is very likely that they will become Pharisees. If you do not want to become a Pharisee or walk the path of a Pharisee, the only way to avoid this is to endeavor to understand the truth and enter into reality, and to turn the doctrines you understand into the reality of the truth. So what is considered as truly understanding the truth of being an honest person? You should contemplate this on your own and fellowship on this when you have some free time. What exactly is an honest person? What are the standards required in God's words for the honest people that He speaks of? Which of these standards that God requires can people practice? What is the honest person that God speaks of like? Which aspect of people's corrupt dispositions does being an honest person target? Aren't these questions worth delving deeply into? The words and truths that God requires people to practice are not aimed at people's ways of doing things or behavior. They are aimed at people's satanic natures and dispositions. That is why these words are said to be the truth. If their only purpose was to change people's behavior and teach people how to think, then they wouldn't be the truth, they would just be a kind of theory. It may be said that any educator can have a bit of influence on people and change their behavior a little, and by putting these teachings into practice and summarizing them, people's behavior can gradually be regulated. There's a lot of this kind of knowledge, but these things are not the truth because they cannot resolve people's corrupt dispositions, nor can they solve the problem of the root of their sins. Only God's words can purify and solve people's corruption, only God's words can thoroughly solve people's satanic natures, and therefore, only God's words are the truth. What is the true significance of the truth of God's words? This is worth contemplating, thinking about, and fellowshiping on often together. Never forget this: Things that can only change people's behavior are not the truth; they are merely knowledge and laws. The truth can not only change people's behavior but also change their corrupt dispositions. Moreover, it can change their ideas and notions, and become a person's life. That is the truth. Now, there are too few people who can see this matter clearly. Many people never realize that those things which regulate behavior and enable people to live outwardly decent lives are not the truth, and that they are all knowledge, doctrines, and satanic philosophies. When people accept those things, although their outward behavior becomes increasingly noble, dignified, and refined, their hearts are filled with insidiousness and wickedness, and become darker and darker. These things are the poisons and theories of Satan, things that Satan uses to deceive and corrupt people. They are not the truth at all, and they do not come from God. Only things that enable people to become honest, liberated, and free, that enable them to know the Creator, have God-fearing hearts, and obey God's orchestrations and arrangements, are the truth. No matter what point of view you accept and no matter what path you follow, if your behavior improves and you gain popularity, but you have too little of a God-fearing heart, and too little true faith in God, and your relationship with God is very poor, and your heart drifts further from God, then the things you cling to are not positive things and they are definitely not the truth. If you choose a path or a way of life, and you accept some things, and these things make you become real and honest, and make you love positive things and hate evil and negative things, and make you have a God-fearing heart and willingly accept the sovereignty and arrangements of the Creator, then these things are the truth, and they truly come from God. You can measure things according to these standards. There are some doctrines that many people are able to say and have said for many years. However, after saying these things many times, people's inner dispositions have not changed, their states have not transformed in the slightest, and people's viewpoints, ways of thinking, and the starting point and intentions behind their actions haven't changed in any way. So you should hurry to give those things up and stop clinging to them; they are definitely not the truth. When people first start practicing some words, doing so seems arduous and difficult, and they cannot grasp the principles. However, after they experience and practice them for a period of time, they feel that their inner states have improved, that their hearts have drawn closer to God, that they have God-fearing and God-dreading hearts, that they aren't so intransigent or rebellious when things befall them, that their personal intentions and desires aren't as strong, and that they can obey God. This state is positive; these words are the truth, and they are the right path. You can discern things based on these principles. It won't be easy to define the truth in a single sentence. If I defined it in a sentence, and you could understand the truth after hearing it, then that would be good. But if you treated it as a rule and a doctrine to follow, then that would be troublesome that is not having spiritual understanding. So, I have given you these principles, and you should go draw comparisons, experience, practice, and gain experiential knowledge according to these principles. Do not just act and comport yourself according to these principles, you should also view people and things, and evaluate people according to these principles. By experiencing and practicing in this way, you will know what the truth is. If people don't understand what the truth is, and if they don't know that God's words are the truth, then can they gain life? Can they obtain a change in life disposition? Though the requirements that God puts forward for people in His words are not such high standards, and they are quite simple, if you don't understand what the implied meaning of the truth is, or how much practical content the truth includes, and you only understand the truth in terms of words and doctrines, you will never be able to enter into the truth realities that God requires people to enter into.

What Is It, Exactly, on Which People Rely to Live?

Which aspect of the truth do you most want to hear today? I'll give you a few topics to choose from, and we can fellowship on whichever you'd like. Here's the first question: How do you know yourself? What is the way to know yourself? Why should you know yourself? The second question is: What have people lived by in all their years of belief in God? Have you lived by God's word and the truth, or have you lived by satanic dispositions and philosophies? What behavior demonstrates that you live by God's word and the truth? If you live by satanic dispositions and philosophies, how will your corruption manifest and reveal itself? The third question is: What is a corrupt disposition? We previously discussed six aspects of corrupt dispositions, so I will talk about which states are the specific manifestations of these corrupt dispositions. Now it's your choice. Which question do you understand least, but want to understand most, and find the most difficult to grasp? (We choose the second question.) Then we'll fellowship on this topic. Contemplate for a moment. What have people lived by in all their years of belief in God, and what things does this topic involve? The main point of this sentence is the word "what." What is included in the scope of this "what"? What of it can you understand? The things you think are most critical, should be practiced when believing in God, and should be possessed by human beings fall within the scope of this word "what." Whatever things you come into contact with in your daily life, whatever things your caliber and comprehension ability allow you to grasp, that you think are positive, that you think are close to and aligned with the truth, that you think are the reality of positive things, and that you think are in line with God's will, are the things you have been living by while following God and performing your duty over these years, so we can bring them out and fellowship on them. What are the things you can think of? (I think that, in my belief in God, I just have to suffer, pay a price, and get results in my duty in order to gain God's salvation.) This view is something that you regard as positive. Then what is the difference between this view and Paul's view? Isn't the essence the same? (It is.) The essence is the same. Isn't the essence of this view just an imagining? (Yes.) Over the years, you have lived by this imagining and what you think is right. You have also relied on this to believe in God, perform your duty, and live the church life. This is one situation. First, you need to confirm whether your thoughts and views are correct and whether they have a basis in God's word. If you think they are correct, that they have a basis, and that what you do is practicing the truth, but you are actually wrong, that is what we will be discussing in our fellowship today.

The simplest way to communicate the aspect of the truth of exactly what people have lived by is to start with a subject that everyone can understand, the case of Paul, and then relate it to your own state. Why talk about Paul? Most people know the story of Paul. What stories or topics are there about Paul in the Bible? For example, what are Paul's famous sayings, or what are his characteristics, personality, and talents? Tell Me. (Paul was educated by the doctor of the law Gamaliel, which was a good brand for him, equivalent to graduating from a prestigious university.) In modern terms, Paul was a theological student who graduated from a prestigious school of theology. This is the first relatively representative topic about Paul, regarding his background, education level, and social status. As for the second topic, what is Paul's most well-known saying? ("I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: From now on there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness" (2 Timothy 4:7–8).) This is the motivation for his running about. In modern terms, Paul suffered and paid the price, worked, and preached the gospel, but his motivation was to gain a crown. This is the second topic. You can continue. (Paul said, "To me to live is Christ, and to die is gain" (Philippians 1:21).) This is also one of Paul's classic sayings. This is the third topic. We just mentioned three topics. The first was that Paul was a student of the doctor of the law Gamaliel, the equivalent of a present-day seminary graduate. He was certainly more learned about the Bible than ordinary folks. Paul had knowledge of the Old Testament, having graduated from a school like that. That was the educational background Paul had. How did that sway his future preaching and provisioning of the churches? It may have had some benefit—but did it cause any harm? (Yes, it did.) Does theological learning line up with the truth? (No, it doesn't.) Theological learning is all specious stuff, all empty theory. It's not practical. What was the second topic? (Paul said, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: From now on there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness.") Paul lived by these words; he pursued by them. Might we say, then, that they were Paul's intent and aim in his suffering, in the price he paid? (Yes.) His intent, put plainly, was to be rewarded, which means that he ran his course, paid his price, and fought his good fight to trade those things in for a crown of righteousness. This goes to show that the years of Paul's pursuit were about being rewarded and gaining a crown of righteousness. If this hadn't been his intent and aim, would he have been able to undergo such suffering and pay such a price? Would he have been able to do the work he did and pay the price he did by merit of his own moral quality, ambition, and desires? (No.) Assume the Lord Jesus said to him in advance, "When I worked on the earth, you persecuted Me. People like you are punished and cursed. No matter what you do, you can't make up for such mistakes; no matter how you repent, I will not save you." What kind of attitude would Paul have? (He would have abandoned God and stopped believing.) Not only would he not have believed in God, he would have denied God, denied that the Lord Jesus was Christ, and denied the existence of God in heaven. So what did Paul live by? He didn't love God sincerely, and he wasn't someone who obeyed Him, so why was he able to persist through so many tribulations in preaching the gospel? It's fair to say that his main support was his desire for blessings; that's what gave him the strength. Also, back when Paul had seen God's great light on the road to Damascus, he'd been blinded. He fell prostrate on the ground, trembling all over. He'd felt God's greatness and His awesomeness, and was afraid of God smiting him, so he didn't dare refuse God's commission. He had to keep preaching the gospel, however great the hardships. He wouldn't risk slackness. That was part of it. The greatest part of it, though, was his excessive desire to be blessed. Would he have done as he did without the desire to be blessed, that glimmer of hope? Certainly not. The third topic was that Paul testified that to him, to live is Christ. Let's first take a look at the work Paul did. Paul had plenty of religious knowledge; he had a degree of renown and a fairly distinctive educational background. You could say he was more learned than ordinary folks. So, what did he rely on to do his work? (His gifts and talents, and his knowledge of the Bible.) By appearances, he may have been spreading the gospel and testifying to the Lord Jesus, but he testified only to the name of the Lord Jesus; he didn't truly testify that the Lord Jesus was God manifest and at work, that the Lord Jesus was God Himself. So, who was Paul really testifying to, then? (He testified to himself. He said, "To me to live is Christ, and to die is gain.") What do his words imply? That Paul was the Christ, the Lord, and God, not the Lord Jesus. Paul was able to run around and preach in this way because of his intentions and ambitions. What was his ambition? To make all people, those who he preached to or those who heard of him, think that he lived as Christ and God. This is one aspect, he lived by his desires. Also, Paul's work was based on his biblical knowledge. His preaching and words all displayed that he had knowledge of the Bible. He didn't talk about the work and enlightenment of the Holy Spirit or the truth

realities. These topics are nowhere to be found in his letters and he certainly didn't have this type of experience. Nowhere in his work did Paul testify to the words the Lord Jesus spoke. Take the Lord Jesus' teaching for how people should practice confession and repentance, for instance, or the many words of teachings that the Lord Jesus spoke to people—Paul never preached those. None of the work Paul did had anything to do with the Lord Jesus' words, and everything he preached was stuff from the theological learning and theory he'd studied. What does that stuff of theological learning and theory consist of? Human notions, imaginings, philosophies, and inferences, as well as derivative experiences, lessons, and so on. In short, all that stuff arises from human thinking and reflects human thoughts and views; none of it is the truth, much less in line with the truth. It all flies in the face of the truth.

After hearing the example of Paul, compare yourselves to him. With regard to the topic we are talking about today, "What have people lived by in all their years of belief in God," are you reminded of some of your own states and behaviors? (It makes me think of the fact that I believe if I never have a family, never betray God's commission, make no complaints against God when great trials come to me, in the end, God won't let me die.) That's living by wishful thinking, which comes sort of close to the topic of today's fellowship and touches on an actual state. It's a view on practical pursuit in real life. Anything else? (I have a view: I feel that as long as I follow God to the end in my faith, I'm bound to be blessed and to obtain a wonderful outcome and destination.) Lots of people have such a view, don't they? It's basically a view that everyone can sort of agree on. Does anyone have a different view? Let's hear it. I'll point something out to you: Some people believe in God for many years, and based on their own personal experiences, imaginings, or some kind of experience and some examples that they have obtained from reading spiritual books, they summarize some approaches relating to practice, such as how believers in God should act in order to become spiritual, how they should act in order to practice the truth, and so on. They think what they do is practicing the truth, and that by doing these things, they can satisfy God's will. For example, when some people suffer from sickness, this matter requires seeking God's will and the truth. This is one of the most basic things believers in God should know. But how do they practice? They say, "This illness was orchestrated by God, and I have to live by faith, so I won't take medicine, get injections, or go to the hospital. What do you think of my faith? Strong, isn't it?" Does this kind of person have faith? (Yes.) You agree with this view, and this is also how you practice. You think that if you are sick, not getting injections, taking medicine, or going to a doctor is equivalent to practicing the truth to satisfy God's will. So, on what basis do you say that this is practicing the truth? Is it correct to practice this way? What is the basis? Have you seen it verified? You aren't certain. Since you don't know whether this is or is not in accordance with the truth, why insist on practicing in this way? If you are sick, you just persist in praying to God, not getting injections, not taking medicine, not seeing a doctor, and you just inwardly rely on and pray to God, asking God to get rid of this sickness or putting yourself at His mercy—is practicing this way correct? (No.) Do you only think it is incorrect now, or did you realize that it was incorrect before? (In the past, when I got sick, I felt that seeing a doctor or taking medicine was an external method, and that this was an expression of faithlessness, so I was relying on prayer or other methods to handle the matter.) Does this imply that if God gives you a sickness, and you have it cured, then you are betraying God and disobeying God's arrangements for you? (That was my viewpoint.) So, do you think that this view is right or wrong? Or are you still confused, and don't know if it is right or wrong, and think that, after all, that's how you've always acted, and no one else has said that it's wrong, and you don't feel guilty about it, so you just keep practicing in that way? (I always practiced this way, and I didn't feel anything in particular.) Then do you feel a bit confused about doing this? Let's put aside whether you are right or wrong, but we can be sure of at least one thing, which is that practicing like this doesn't accord with the truth. Because, if it did accord with the truth, you would at least know which truth principle you were following and under the scope of which principle such practice fell. But when we look at it now, we see that people act this way based on their own imaginings. It is a constraint they put on themselves. In addition, people set this as a standard for themselves based on their own imaginings, thinking they should do this when they are sick, yet they do not know exactly what God requires or means. They just determine a kind of method for their behavior based on their own imaginings, not knowing what result will come from acting in this way. What do people live by when they are in this state? (Their own imaginings.) Is there a notion within these imaginings? What is their notion? (That they can win God's approval by practicing this way.) This is a notion. Is this the correct understanding of the matter? (No.) There is a definition and a result here: When you live by such a notion and such imaginings, you are not practicing the truth.

By this point, you will have pondered a fair amount on the topic of "What Is It, Exactly, on Which People Rely to Live," and you know more or less what will be fellowshiped on in this topic. So, let's talk about a few kinds of states. Listen carefully and contemplate as you listen. What is the aim of this contemplation? To compare the states I speak about to your own states, to grasp them, and to know that you have those kinds of states and problems, and then to seek the truth to resolve them, striving to live by the truth instead of living by various things that are completely unrelated to it. "What Is It, Exactly, on Which People Rely to Live" is a topic that touches on a lot of things, so let's begin with gifts. Some people can speak clearly and eloquently. They talk and interact with people with glib, silver tongues, and they are particularly quick thinkers. In every situation, they know exactly what to say. In God's house, they also perform their duties with their silver tongues and quick wits. Their false, sweet words turn ordinary problems into non-issues. They seem able to resolve lots of problems. With their bright minds, coupled with their experience in society and their insightfulness, they can see what's going on with any ordinary thing that happens to them; all it takes is a few words from them to resolve the problem. Others admire them, thinking, "They can deal with things so easily. Why can't 1?" They also feel very pleased with themselves, and they think, "Look, God gave me this eloquence and glib tongue, this clever mind, this insight, and this ability to react quickly, so there's nothing I can't handle!" And this is where the problem arises. Someone who is glib-tongued and guick-witted may use their talents and abilities to perform some duties, and in the course of performing their duty, they solve some problems or do a few things for God's house, but if you examine everything they do in detail, you will only come away with a question mark regarding whether everything they do accords with the truth, whether it accords with the truth principles, and whether it satisfies God's will. Such people often don't understand the truth or how to act in accordance with the truth, yet they still perform their duties. But no matter how well they perform their duties, what is it that they rely on? What is the point of origin of their performance of their duties? Their thinking, insight, and their silver tongues. Is there anyone like this among you? (Yes.) Does the person who lives by their mind, high IQ, or glib tongue know whether what they do accords with the truth principles? (No.) Do you have principles when you act? Or, to put it another way, when you act, do you do so by satanic philosophies, by your own wits, by your own intelligence and wisdom—or do you do so according to God's words and the truth principles? If you're always acting by satanic philosophies, by your own preferences and ideas, then there aren't any principles to your actions. But if you're able to seek the truth, and act according to God's words, to the truth principles—that's acting with principles. Is there anything in how you speak and act now that goes against the truth? Do you go against the principles? When you do, do you know it? (Sometimes.) What do you do at those times? (We pray to God, steel our resolve to repent, and swear to God we'll never act that way again.) And the next time something similar happens to you, do you act that way again, and steel your resolve again? (Yes.) You always fall back on steeling your will whenever things happen to you well, once your will is steeled, do you actually put the truth into practice? Do you actually act with principles? Is it clear to you? Many people don't seek the truth when things happen to them, but live by their petty devices, by their gifts. Is having a good head on your shoulders and being a smooth talker the only sort of gift there is? How else does living by gifts manifest? For example, some people like to sing very much, and they can sing an entire song after listening to it two or three times. They therefore have duties in this field, and they think that this duty is given to them by God. This feeling is correct and accurate. Over the years, they learn many hymns, and the more they sing, the better they get. However, there is a problem they're not aware of. What is it? Their singing gets better and better, and they regard this gift as their life. Isn't this wrong? They live by their gift every day, and as they sing hymns every day, they believe they have gained life, but isn't this just an illusion? Even if you are moved by the singing, others enjoy it, and others benefit from it, can this prove you have gained life? It's hard to say. It depends on how much you understand the truth, whether you can practice the truth, whether you have

principles in your actions and duty, and whether you have real experiential testimony. Only from these aspects can you judge whether people possess the truth realities. If they possess the truth realities, they are ones with life, especially those who can fear God and shun evil, as well as those who can truly love and obey God. If a person has gifts and talents, and they also get good results in their duty, but they don't pursue the truth and they only live by their gifts, show off their qualifications, and never submit to anyone, can such a person possess life? The key to whether someone has life or not is whether they possess the truth realities. How can a person with talents and gifts gain the truth? How can they live without relying on gifts? How can they escape living in this way? They should seek the truth. First, they should clearly know the difference between what gifts are and what life is. When someone is gifted or has a talent, it means that they are inherently better at something or excel in some way compared with others. For example, you may react a little faster than others, understand things a little guicker than others, have mastered certain professional skills, or you may be an eloquent speaker, and so on. These are gifts and talents that a person may have. If you have certain talents and strengths, how you understand and handle them is very important. If you think that you are irreplaceable because no one else has your talents and gifts, and that you are practicing the truth if you use your gifts and talents to perform your duty, is this view right or wrong? (Wrong.) Why do you say it is wrong? What exactly are talents and gifts? How should you understand them, use them and deal with them? The fact is that no matter what gift or talent you have, it doesn't mean that you have the truth and life. If people have certain gifts and talents, it is appropriate for them to perform a duty that utilizes these gifts and talents, but it does not mean that they are practicing the truth, nor does it mean that they are doing things according to the principles. For example, if you are born with a gift for singing, does your ability to sing represent the practice of the truth? Does it mean that you sing according to the principles? It does not. Let's say, for example, that you have a natural talent for words and are good at writing. If you don't understand the truth, can your writing accord with the truth? Does it necessarily mean that you have experiential testimony? (No, it does not.) Hence, gifts and talents are different to the truth and they cannot be compared. No matter what gift you have, if you do not pursue the truth, you won't perform your duty well. Some people flaunt their gifts often and generally feel that they are better than others, so they look down on other people and are unwilling to cooperate with others when performing their duties. They always want to be in charge, and as a result they often violate the principles when performing their duties, and their working efficiency is also very low. The gifts have made them arrogant and self-righteous, made them look down on others, and made them always feel that they are better than other people and that no one is as good as them, and because of this they become smug. Have these people not been ruined by their gifts? They have indeed. People who are gifted and have talents are most likely to be arrogant and self-righteous. If they don't pursue the truth and always live by their gifts, that is a very dangerous thing. No matter what duty a person performs in God's house, no matter what kind of talent they possess, if they don't pursue the truth then they will certainly fail to fulfill their duty. Whatever gifts and talents a person has, they should perform that kind of duty well. If they can also understand the truth and do things according to the principles, then their gifts and talents will have a role to play in the performance of that duty. Those who don't accept the truth, and don't seek the truth principles, and only rely on their gifts to do things won't achieve any results from performing their duties, and risk being cast out. Here's an example: Some people are talented at writing but don't understand the truth, and there's no truth reality at all in the stuff they write. How can that edify others? It has less of an effect than someone who is uneducated but understands the truth talking about their testimony. Many people live amid gifts and think that they are useful figures in God's house. But tell Me, if they never get around to pursuing the truth, are they still valuable? If someone has gifts and talents but lacks the truth principles, can they perform a duty well? Whoever truly sees through this issue and makes sense of it will know how gifts and talents are to be treated. What should you do, if your state is one where you're always boasting of your gifts and thinking that you have the truth reality, that you're better than others while privately looking down on them? You need to seek the truth; you must see through to the essence of boasting of gifts. Isn't it the height of foolishness and ignorance, to boast of gifts? If someone's a smooth talker, does that mean they have the truth reality? Does having gifts mean that someone has the truth and life? Isn't someone who shows off with their gifts, despite having no reality at all, shameless? If they saw through these things, they wouldn't brag. Here's another question: What's the greatest challenge these fairly gifted, talented people face? Do you have experience of such a thing or exposure to it? (Their greatest challenge is that they always think they're better than others, that they're good in every way. They're so arrogant and conceited; they look down on everyone. It's not easy for people like that to accept and practice the truth.) That's part of it. What else? (It's hard for them to let go of their gifts and talents. They always think that they can resolve a lot of problems by putting their gifts and talents to use. They just don't know how to view things according to the truth.) (Gifted people always think they can handle things themselves, so when things happen to them, it's hard for them to rely on God, and they're unwilling to seek the truth.) What you're saying are the facts, and nothing but the facts. People who are gifted and have talents think they are very clever, that they understand everything—but they do not know that gifts and talents do not represent the truth, that these things have no connection to the truth. When people rely on their gifts and imaginings in their actions, their thoughts and opinions often run contrary to the truth but they can't see this, they still think, "See how clever I am; I've made such smart choices! Such wise decisions! None of you can match me." They forever live in a state of narcissism and self-appreciation. It is hard for them to guiet their hearts and contemplate what God asks of them, what the truth is, and what the truth principles are.

So it is hard for them to understand the truth, and even though they perform duties, they are not able to practice the truth, and so, too, is it very difficult for them to enter into the truth reality. In short, if a person cannot pursue the truth and accept the truth, then irrespective of what gifts or talents they have, they will not be able to perform their duty well—of this there cannot be the slightest doubt.

Gifts and talents can be regarded as the same kind of thing. What talents are there? Some people are particularly proficient with a certain kind of technology. For example, some men like to fiddle with gadgets, and there are some people who are guite skilled with electronics, who are very much in their element when it comes to using those internal computer codes or software programs. They can master these things and remember them very quickly—that is, their ability to understand and memorize these things is extraordinary. This is a talent. Some people are good at learning languages. No matter which language they learn, they learn very quickly, and their memory exceeds that of ordinary people. Some people are good at singing, dancing, or art, some are good at makeup and acting, some can be directors, and so on. Regardless of the sort of talent, as long as someone engages in a kind of work, this touches on the topic of "What Is It, Exactly, on Which People Rely to Live." Why do we need to analyze human gifts and talents? Because people enjoy living by their gifts and talents, and people regard them as capital, as the source of their livelihoods, as life, and as the value, pursuit goal, and significance of their lives. People feel that it's natural for them to rely on these things to live, and see them as an indispensable part of human life. Almost everyone today lives by their gifts and talents. What kind of gifts do each of you live by? (I think I've got a gift with language. So I spread the gospel with that gift—when I'm talking with someone who's investigating the true way, I can draw them in close, and they want to hear what I say.) Well, is it good or not that you have this gift? (Now that I've heard God's fellowship, I think this gift would get in the way of my seeking the truth principles.) You're saying that it's not good to have a gift with language, and that you won't want to use this gift anymore, is that right? (No.) What are you saying, then? You now need to understand what the focus of today's discussion is, which of your problems it will resolve, what is wrong about living by these gifts, and what is right about it. You must be clear on these things. If you don't understand these things, and if, in the end, after so much talking, you feel that the right things are wrong, and that the wrong things are also wrong, and that everything you do is wrong, can you resolve the problem of living by your gifts? (No. By relying on my gift with language to spread the gospel, I think that my intention is not to perform my duty well to satisfy God, and that it is instead to show off, admire myself, and feel good about myself.) You have just expressed the reason why living by your gifts is wrong. You think this gift is your capital, a realization of your self-worth, and these thoughts and this point of origin are wrong. How can you solve this problem? (I need to know that my gift is only a tool for fulfilling my duty. The purpose of using my gift is to perform my duty well and to complete God's commission.) After thinking in this way, will you suddenly be able to practice the truth? (No.) So how can you come to practice the truth and not live by these gifts? If, when you are carrying out your duty, you are using your gifts to show off your personal skills and abilities, then you are living by your gifts. However, if you use your gifts and knowledge to perform your duty well and show your loyalty, and you are then able to satisfy God's will and achieve the results that God requires, and if you ponder on how to speak and what to say so that you can better testify to God, and do better at helping people to understand and be clear about what work God is doing, and finally help people to accept God's work, then you are practicing the truth. Is there a difference here? (Yes.) Have you ever gotten carried away while flaunting your gifts, talents, or abilities, and forgotten that you were performing your duty, and instead showed off in front of others, just like an unbeliever? Has this ever happened to you? (Yes.) So in these situations, what is a person's inner state like? It is a state of indulgence, where they lack a God-fearing heart, restraint, or guilt, where there are no goals or principles in their mind when they do things, and where they have already lost the basic dignity and decency that a Christian should have. What does this become? It becomes them showing off their skills and selling their personality. In the course of performing your duty, do you often experience states where you only care about displaying your talents and gifts, and where you do not seek the truth? When you are in such a state, can you realize it on your own? Can you reverse your course? If you can realize this and reverse your course, then you will be able to practice the truth. But if you are always like this, and experience this state time and time again, for a long period of time, then you are someone who lives entirely by their gifts and who does not practice the truth at all. Where do you think that your restraint comes from? What is the power of your restraint determined by? It is determined by how much you love the truth and how much you hate evil or negative things. When you've understood the truth, you won't want to do evil, and when you hate negative things, you won't want to do evil, either—and just like that, a sense of restraint comes about. It's impossible for people who don't love the truth to hate evil things. That's why they have no sense of restraint, and without that, they're liable to give in to dissolution, without restraint. They're arbitrary and reckless, and they don't care a bit about how much evil they do.

There is another state that people who live by relying on their gifts experience. No matter what talents, gifts, or skills people have, if they just do things and labor, and have never sought the truth, nor tried to grasp God's will, as though the concept of practicing the truth does not exist in their minds, and their only impetus is to finish the job and get the task done, is this not living completely by their gifts and talents, and by their own abilities and skills? In their belief in God, they just want to labor so that they can gain blessings, and exchange their own gifts and skills for God's blessings. This is the state that most people are in. Most people harbor this perspective especially when the house of God assigns them some kind of routine work—all they do is labor. In other words, they want to rely on laboring to accomplish their goals. Sometimes it is by talking or taking a look at something; sometimes it is by working with their hands or running around. They think that by doing this, they have contributed a lot. This is what it means to live by relying on one's gifts. Why do we say that living by your gifts and talents is laboring rather than doing your duty, to say nothing of practicing the truth? There is a difference. For example, say that the house of God gives you a task, and after you have taken it on, you think of how to complete the task as soon as possible, so you can report back to your leader and receive their praise. You may even have a fairly conscientious attitude and set out a step-by-step plan, but you only focus on completing the task and doing it for others to look at. Or, you may set yourself a standard while doing it, thinking about how to do the task in a way that satisfies you and makes you happy, and which meets the standard of perfection you seek. No matter how you set standards, if what you do bears no relation to the truth, if it is not done after seeking the truth, and coming to understand and confirm God's requirements, and if it is instead done blindly and with a muddled mind, it is laboring. This is doing things by relying on your own mind, gifts, abilities, and skills while harboring a mindset of wishful thinking. What is the result of doing things this way? Maybe you complete the task, and no one points out any problems. You are very happy, but in the process of doing the task, for starters, you did not understand God's will. Second, you did not do it with all your heart, mind, and strength; your heart did not seek the truth. If you had sought the truth principles and sought God's will, then your performance of the task would have been up to standard. You also would have been able to enter into the truth realities, and would have been able to accurately understand that what you had done was in line with God's will. However, if you do not put your heart into it, and do the task in a muddle-headed way, even though the job will be completed and the task done, you will not know in your heart how well you did it, you will not have any standards, and you will not know whether the task was done in line with God's will or the truth. In that case, you're not performing your duty, you are rendering service.

Everyone who believes in God should understand His will. Only those who perform their duties well can satisfy God, and only by completing God's commission can one's performance of their duty be satisfactory. There is a standard for the accomplishment of God's commission. The Lord Jesus said: "You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind, and with all your strength." "Loving God" is one aspect of what God requires of people. Where should this requirement manifest itself? In that you must complete God's commission. In practical terms, it is performing your duty well as a human. So what is the standard for performing your duty well? It is God's requirement that you do your duty as a created being with all your heart, soul, mind, and strength. This should be easy to understand. In order to meet God's requirement, you mainly need to put your heart into your duty. If you can put your heart into it, then it will be easy for you to act with all your soul, with all your mind, and with all your strength. If you perform your duty by just relying on the imaginings of your mind, and by relying on your gifts, can you meet God's requirement? Absolutely not. So, what is the standard that must be met in order to fulfill God's commission, and to perform your duty loyally and well? It is to do your duty with all your heart, with all your soul, with all your mind, and with all your strength. If you attempt to perform your duty well without a God-loving heart, it will not work. If your God-loving heart grows ever stronger and more genuine, then you will naturally be able to perform your duty with all your heart, with all your soul, with all your mind, and with all your strength. All your heart, all your soul, all your mind, all your strength—the one that comes last is "all your strength"; "all your heart" comes first. If you're not doing your duty with all your heart, how could you be doing it with all your strength? That's why merely trying to do your duty with all your strength can't achieve any results—or live up to the principles, either. What is the most important thing that God requires? (With all one's heart.) No matter what duty or thing God entrusts to you, if you only labor, run around, and exert effort, can you be in accord with the truth principles? Can you walk in God's will? (No.) Then how can you accord with God's will? (With all our hearts.) The words "with all your heart" are easy to say, and people often say it, so how can you do it with all your heart? Some people say, "It's when you do things with a little more effort and sincerity, think more, don't let anything else occupy your mind, and just focus on how to do the task at hand, isn't it?" Is it that simple? (No.) So let's talk about a few fundamental principles of practice. According to the principles that you usually practice or observe, what should you do first to do things with all your heart? You must use all of your mind, use your energy, and put your heart into doing things, and not be careless or perfunctory. If a person is unable to do things with all their heart, then they have lost their heart, which is just like losing one's soul. Their thoughts will wander while they speak, they will never put their heart into doing things, and they will be mindless no matter what they do. Consequently, they won't be able to handle things well. If you don't perform your duty with all your heart and don't put your whole heart into it, you'll perform your duty badly. Even if you perform your duty for several years, you won't be able to do so adequately. You can't do anything well if you don't put your heart into it. Some people are not diligent workers, they are always unstable and capricious, they aim too high, and they don't know where they have left their hearts. Do such people have hearts? How can you tell if a person has a heart or not? If someone who believes in God rarely reads God's words, do they have a heart? If they never pray to God no matter what happens, do they have a heart? If they never seek the truth no matter what difficulties they face, do they have a heart? Some people perform their duties for many years without getting any clear results, do they have hearts? (No.) Can people who don't have hearts perform their duties well? How can people perform their duties with all their hearts? First of all, you should think of responsibility. "This is my responsibility, I have to bear it. I can't flee now when I'm needed most. I have to do my duty well and give an account of it to God." This means you have a theoretical basis. But does merely having the theoretical basis mean you are doing your duty with all your heart? (No.) You are still far from fulfilling God's requirements of entering into the truth reality and doing your duty with all your heart. So, what does it mean to do your duty with all your heart? How can people come to do their duties with all their hearts? First of all, you need to think, "Who am I performing this duty for? Am I doing it for God, or the church, or some person?" This must be figured clearly out. Also: "Who commissioned this duty to me? Was it God, or was it some leader or church?" This needs clearing up, too. This may seem like a small thing, but still, the truth must be sought to resolve it. Tell Me, was it some leader or worker, or some church, that commissioned you with your duty? (No.) That's good, so long as you're sure at heart about it. You must confirm that it was God who commissioned you with your duty. It may seem to have been given to you by a church leader, but in fact, it all comes from God's arrangement. There may be times when it clearly comes from human will, but even then, you must first accept it from God. That's the right way to experience it. If you accept it from God, and deliberately submit to His arrangement, and step up to accept His commission—if you undergo it like that, you will have God's guidance and work. If you constantly believe that everything is done by man and comes from man, if you experience things in this way, then you won't have God's blessing or His work, for you are too conniving for that, too lacking in spiritual understanding. You don't have the right mindset. If you regard all matters with human notions and imaginings, you won't have the work of the Holy Spirit, because it's God who rules over all matters. No matter who God's house arranges to do whatever kind of task, it comes from God's sovereignty and arrangement, and God's good will is in it. You must know this first. It's very important to see it clearly; just understanding the doctrine won't do. You must confirm in your heart, "This duty was entrusted to me by God. I am fulfilling my duty for God, not for myself, not for anyone else. This is my duty as a created being, and it was entrusted to me by God." Since this duty was entrusted to you by God, how did God entrust it to you? Does this involve doing things with all your heart? Is it necessary to seek the truth? You must seek the truth, the requirements, standards, and principles of the duty entrusted to you by God, and what God's word says. If His words are put quite clearly, then it's time for you to contemplate how to practice them and make them real. You should also fellowship with people who understand the truth, and then act according to God's requirements. That's what it means, to do it with all your heart. Furthermore, say that before you perform your duty, you seek God's will, come to understand the truth, and know what to do, but when it comes time to act, there're discrepancies and contradictions between your own thoughts and the truth principles. When this happens, what should you do? You must hold to the principle of doing your duty with all your heart, and put your whole heart into obeying and satisfying God, without any personal adulterations, and certainly without acting on your own will. Some people say, "I don't care about those things. This duty was entrusted to me after all, so I should have the final say. I have the right to act on my own initiative, I'll do what I think should be done. I'm still doing my duty with all my heart, so what faults are there for you to pick at?" And then, they put some effort into figuring out what to do. Although the work gets done in the end, is this method of practice and this state correct? Is this doing their duties with all their hearts? (No.) What is the problem here? This is arrogance, being a law unto oneself, and being arbitrary and reckless. Is this performing their duties? (No.) This is engaging in personal enterprise, not performing their duties. It is merely doing what satisfies them and what they like based on their own will, it is not doing their duties with all their hearts.

Just now I mainly talked about talents and gifts. Do these talents and gifts include knowledge? Is there any difference between knowledge and talents? A talent refers to a skill. It may be an area where a person is more outstanding than others, a part of their caliber that is more prominent, what they are best at, or a skill in which they are relatively competent and well-versed. These are all called talents and gifts. What is knowledge? What exactly does knowledge refer to? If an intellectual has studied for many years, read many classics, has studied a certain profession or area of knowledge in great depth, has achieved results, and possesses specific and in-depth mastery, does this have anything to do with talents and gifts? Can knowledge be included in the category of talents? (No.) If a person uses talents to do their work, it is possible that they are an uncouth and rural person, that they lack an advanced education, haven't read any famous books, or can't even understand the Bible, but they might still have a little caliber, and be able to speak eloquently. Is this a talent? (Yes.) This person possesses such a talent. Does this mean that they have knowledge? (No.) So what does knowledge mean? How is it defined? Let's put it this way, if a person has studied education, for example, do they have knowledge of this profession? Things like how to educate people, how to impart knowledge to others, what knowledge to impart, and so on? They have knowledge of this field, so are they an intellectual in this field? Can they be called a talented individual who possesses knowledge in this area? (Yes.) Let's use this as an example, if a person is an intellectual engaged in education, what will such a person usually do when they work or lead the church? What are their usual practices? Do they talk to everyone like a teacher talks to a student? The tone of voice they use doesn't matter, what matters is what they instill in others and teach to others. They have lived by this knowledge for many years, and this knowledge has basically become a part of their life, to the point that in every aspect of their behavior or life, you can see that they possess this knowledge and live out the knowledge they have acquired. This is very normal to see. So what do people like this often rely on to do their work? The knowledge they have acquired. Say, for example, they hear someone say, "I can't read God's words. I hold them there, but I just don't know how to read them. How will I know what the truth is, if I can't read God's words? How will I understand His will, if I can't read His words?" They say, "I know how, I have knowledge, so I can help you. This chapter is divided into four paragraphs. Usually, if the article is a narrative, there are six elements: time, place, characters, the cause of the event, the development process, and the conclusion. The time when this chapter of God's word was published is at the end—October, 2011. This is the first element. As for the characters, this chapter of God's word mentions 'I,' so the first person is God, and then God mentioned 'you,' which refers to us. Then it analyzes the states of some people, that some people are rebellious and arrogant, which refers to those who are arrogant and rebellious, who do not do actual work, who do mischief, bad people and evildoers. The course of things is that people do bad things. There are also some other things that relate to different aspects." What do you think of this method of work? It is a good thing that they so lovingly help people, but what is the basis of their actions? (Knowledge.) Why do I bring up this example? To help people understand more clearly what knowledge is. Some people don't know how to read God's word, but they received an education and perhaps did well in humanities subjects in school, so they may open a page of God's word, read, and say, "This chapter of God's word is expressed so well! In the first section, God speaks straightforwardly, and then in the second, the tone shows a bit of majesty and wrath. In the third section, everything is revealed specifically and clearly. This is how God's word ought to be. The fourth section, the general summary, gives people the path of practice. God's word is perfect!" Does their conclusion and summary of God's word come from knowledge? (Yes.) Although this example may not be too apt, what is it that I want you to understand by saying this? I want you to clearly see the ugliness of using knowledge to approach God's word. It's disgusting. Such people rely on knowledge to read God's word, so can they rely on the truth to do things? (No.) Absolutely not.

What are the characteristics of how people who live by knowledge do things? First of all, what advantages do they think they possess? Their knowledge and learning, the fact that they are intellectuals, and the fact that they have worked in knowledge-based industries. Intellectuals possess the style, characteristics, and patterns of intellectuals when they do things, so they can't help but bring a kind of intellectual air to the things they do, which makes other people admire them. That is how intellectuals do things; they always focus on that intellectual air. Regardless of how weak and gentle they outwardly appear, the things inside them are certainly not weak or gentle, and they always have their own views on everything. In everything, they always want to show off, to use their petty devices, and to analyze and handle things based on the views, attitudes, and thought patterns of knowledge. The truth is something extraneous for them, and it is something that is very difficult for them to accept. Therefore, such a person's first attitude toward the truth is to analyze it. What is the basis of their analysis? Knowledge. I'll give you an example. Do people who have studied directing possess knowledge of directing? Regardless of whether you have studied directing systematically in books, or studied it practically and done that kind of work, in short, you have a grasp on knowledge in this area. Whether you have studied directing in depth or just superficially, if you were engaged in the work of directing in the secular world, the knowledge you acquired in this field or your experience with directing would be very useful and valuable. However, does possessing this kind of knowledge mean that you will definitely be able to do well in the film work of God's house? Can the knowledge you have acquired really help you to use movies to testify to God? Not necessarily. If you keep emphasizing what textbooks taught you and the rules and requirements of industry knowledge, can you do your duty well? (No.) Isn't there a point of contention or conflict here? When the truth principles clash with this aspect of knowledge, how do you resolve it? Do you accept your knowledge as your guide, or the principles of truth? Can you guarantee that every shot, every scene, and every piece you film is not adulterated with or that it contains very little of the adulteration of your knowledge, and that it is completely in accordance with the standards and principles required by God's house? If this is not possible, then none of the knowledge you acquired is of use in God's house. Think about this, what is the use of knowledge? What knowledge is useful? What kind of knowledge contradicts the truth? What does knowledge bring to people? When people acquire more knowledge, do they become more pious and possess more of a God-fearing heart, or do they become more arrogant and self-righteous? Having acquired a lot of knowledge, people become complicated, dogmatic, and arrogant. There is something else fatal that they might not have realized: When people have mastered a lot of knowledge, they become chaotic inside, and devoid of principles, and the more knowledge they master, the more chaotic they become. In knowledge, can answers be found to the questions of why people live and the value and meaning of human existence? Can conclusions be found as to where people come from and where they go? Can knowledge tell you that you come from God and were created by God? (No.) So, what is it, exactly, that people study within knowledge? Or what things is it, exactly, that knowledge instills in them? Material things, atheistic things, things that people can see and things of the mind that they can recognize, many of which arise from people's imaginings and are simply not practical. Knowledge also instills in people philosophies, ideologies, theories, natural laws, and so on, yet there are many things it cannot explain clearly. How thunder and lightning is formed, for example, or why the seasons change. Can knowledge give you those true answers? Why is the climate currently changing and becoming abnormal? Can knowledge explain this clearly? Can it resolve this problem? (No.) It cannot tell you about issues relating to the source of all things, so it cannot solve those problems. There are also those who ask, "Why do some people come back to life after dying?" Has knowledge given you the answer to this? (No.) What is it, then, that knowledge tells you? It tells people about many customs and rules. For instance, the idea that people must raise children and show filial piety toward their parents is a kind of knowledge about human life. Where does this knowledge come from? It is taught by traditional culture. What, then, does all this knowledge bring to people? What is the essence of knowledge? In this world, there are many people who have read the classics, received a high level of education, who are knowledgeable, or who have mastered a specialized field of knowledge. So, on the path of life, do such people have the right direction and goals? Do they have a baseline and principles for their conduct? Furthermore, do they know to worship God? (They do not.) To go a step further, do they understand any element of the truth? (They do not.) So, what is knowledge? What does knowledge give people? People probably have a bit of experience of this. In the past, when they did not possess knowledge, relationships between people were simple—are they still simple now that people have gained knowledge? Knowledge makes people more complicated and no longer pure. Knowledge makes people more lacking in normal humanity and devoid of life goals. The more knowledge people acquire, the farther they are from God. The more they acquire knowledge, the more they deny the truth and God's word. The more knowledge people have, the more extreme, stubborn, and absurd they become. And what is the result? The world gets progressively darker and increasingly wicked.

We've just mentioned how conflicts or clashes between the application of knowledge and the truth principles are to be resolved when they arise. What do you do whenever you're in such a situation? Some of you would offer doctrine: "What's hard about practicing according to the truth principles? What is there that can't be let go of?" But when something happens to you, you go on as before, following your own will and your notions and imaginings, and though there may be times when you'd like to practice the truth and act according to the principles, you just can't seem to do it, no matter what. Everyone knows that it's right, as a matter of doctrine, to act according to the truth principles; they know that knowledge is sure not to line up with the truth principles, and that when the two come into conflict or combat, they're to begin by practicing according to the truth principles and letting go of their knowledge. But is it that simple, as a factual matter? (No.) No, it's not that simple. So, what difficulties are there when practicing? How should one practice in order to act according to the truth principles? These are practical problems, no? How should they be resolved? First and foremost, one should submit. But people have corrupt dispositions, and sometimes, they can't bring themselves to submit. They say, "'You can lead a horse to water, but you can't make him drink'—trying to get me to submit is a case of that, isn't it? What's bad about my acting on the strength of my knowledge? If you insist that I act according to the truth principles, I won't submit." What do you do at these times, when a rebellious disposition is set to cause trouble? (Pray.) Sometimes prayer can't resolve the issue. Your attitude and mindset may be a bit better after praying, and you may turn a part of your state around, but if you don't understand or lack clarity about the relevant truth principles, your submission may end up as no more than a mere formality. At these times, you need to understand the truth, seek the relevant truths, and strive to be able to know how what you're doing benefits the work of God's house, testimony to Him, and the spread of His words. You must be clear at heart about these things. Whatever your duty, whatever you're doing, you must begin by thinking of the work and interests of God's house, of spreading God's words, or what performing your duty is meant to achieve. That comes first. There's never room for ambiguity about this, nor for compromise. If you compromise at times like these, you're not performing your duty sincerely, and you're not practicing the truth—and what's worse, it's fair to say, is that you're engaging in your own business. You're doing things for yourself instead of performing the duty of a created being. If one would complete God's commission and perform man's duty well, the truth they should understand and practice first is that they must satisfy God's will. You must have this vision. Performing a duty is not about doing things for yourself or engaging in your own business, much less testifying to yourself and promoting yourself, nor is it about your reputation, fortune, and status. That's not your goal. Instead, it's about performing your duty well and testifying to God; it's about taking up your responsibility and satisfying God; it's about living out the conscience and reason of normal humanity, living with the semblance of a human being, living before God. With this sort of correct mindset, one can easily vault over the hurdle of living by one's knowledge. Even if a few challenges remain, they'll gradually shift throughout this process, and circumstances will change for the better. So, what's your experience like currently? Is it getting better, or is it stagnant? If you're always acting by knowledge and your brain, and you never seek the truth principles, will you be able to grow in life? Have you come to a conclusion about that? It seems you all are still pretty confused about the matter of life entry and don't have specific principles for it, meaning that you're missing a deeper or more genuine experience of the principles and path for practicing the truth. Some people always act with their knowledge, no matter what happens to them. They only uphold a few truth principles in a big-picture way with simple matters, letting their knowledge take the lead all the while, with the truth principles subordinate. They practice in this sort of mediated, compromised way; they don't strictly require of themselves full submission or action that's in absolute accord with the truth principles. Is this right of them, or no? What's the danger in this kind of practice? Isn't it liable to stray off course? To resist God and offend His disposition? This is the thing that people ought most to figure out. Is it clear to you now, what the difference is between performing a duty in God's house and getting a job and muddling through life in the world? Do you have a clear awareness of it in your heart? You should think on this issue and ponder it often. What is the greatest difference between the two? Do you know? (Performing a duty in God's house is about gaining the truth and bringing about a change to our corrupt disposition; getting a job in the world is about the life of the flesh.) That's pretty close, but there's one thing you didn't mention: To perform a duty in God's house is to live by the truth. What is the significance of living by the truth? For people, it's that their disposition can change, and that they can be saved in the end; for God, it's that He can gain you, a created being, and acknowledge that you're His creation. What do people live by when they get a job in the world, then? (Satan's philosophies.) By Satan's philosophies—taken collectively, this means they live by the corrupt disposition of Satan. It's the same whether you're out for fame, fortune, and status, or for wealth, or to get through your days and survive—you're living by corrupt dispositions. When you get a job in the world, you have to rack your brain trying to make money. To climb the ladder to fame, fortune, and status, you need to depend entirely on things like competition, fighting, struggle, ruthlessness, malice, and killing—that's the only way to stay on your feet. To perform a duty in God's house, you must live by God's words, and you must understand the truth. The negative things of Satan aren't just useless—they must also be cast off. Not one satanic thing is tenable. If someone lives by satanic things, they must be judged and chastised; if someone lives by satanic things and is dead set on impenitence, they must be cast out and abandoned. That's the biggest difference between performing a duty in God's house and getting a job in the world.

When people live by their knowledge, what sort of state are they living in? What is it that they experience most deeply? As soon as you learn something in some realm, you feel that you're competent, that you're terrific—and then you're fettered by your knowledge as a result. You've taken knowledge as your life, and when something happens to you, it's that knowledge of yours that emerges, to dictate that you do suchand-such. You'd like to cast it off, but you can't, because it's been etched into your heart, and nothing else can replace it. This is what "first impressions are last impressions," as it were, means. There are some bodies of knowledge that one would be better off not having studied at all. It's a liability to have learned them, and a nuisance. Knowledge encompasses many fields: education, law, literature, math, medicine, biology, and so on, all of which are derived from people's hands-on experience. These are forms of practical knowledge; people can't live without them, and they ought to study them. But there are some forms of knowledge that are poisonous to mankind—they're satanic poisons, they come from Satan. Take the social sciences, for instance, whose teachings include such things as atheism, materialism, and evolutionism, as well as Confucianism, communism, and feudal superstitions: These are all negative forms of knowledge that come from Satan, and the main purpose they serve is that of infesting, corroding, and twisting human thought, binding and controlling people's thinking, toward the end of corrupting, harming, and destroying people. Passing on the family name, for example, and filial piety, and glorifying one's family, and the formula that runs, "Cultivate oneself, put one's family in order, govern the nation, and bring peace to all"—all these are the teachings of traditional culture. And beyond these are the various theological theories, current in civil society, of Buddhism, Taoism, and modern religion. These, too, fall within the scope of knowledge. Some people, for instance, have served as pastors or preachers, or they've studied theology. What comes of having acquired such knowledge? Is it a blessing or a curse? (A curse.) How does it come to be a curse? If such people don't talk, then so be it—but when they open their mouths, religious doctrine comes out. They're always trying to preach spiritual doctrine; they instill in people the hypocritical ways of the Pharisees, rather than letting them understand the truth. Theological knowledge is primarily about theological theory. What's the most notable feature of theological theory? It instills things in people that they hold to be spiritual, and once people have taken in such pseudo-spiritual stuff, it's their first and last impression. Even if you've listened to the words that God expresses, you won't be able to understand them at that moment, and you will be governed by the knowledge and theories of the Pharisees. This is a very dangerous thing. Won't it be hard for a person like that to accept the truth? To sum up, if you live by doctrine and knowledge, and if you perform your duty and act in reliance on your gifts, you may be able to do a few good things, as they seem to others. But when you're living in a state like that, do you know it? Can you recognize that you're living by your knowledge? Can you feel what consequences living by knowledge can bring about? Don't you wind up with a hollow feeling in your heart, a sense that there's no significance to a life like that? And why is that, exactly? These questions should be cleared up. That's where we are on the issue of knowledge.

We've just discussed the issues of knowledge and gifts. There's one more issue: Many people have come from their initial belief in God to the present without ever knowing what the truth is, or how they should practice and pursue it. They've been living this whole time by a conviction, or by human notions and imaginings. To put it simply, they live by things they believe to be right. They go around obsessively upholding these things, and even take them to be the truth. They think that so long as they persist in their practice until the end, they'll be overcomers, and they'll survive onward. They believe in God by virtue of such a notion. They can suffer, and give up their families and careers, and let go of the things they love—and they go on to sum things up in a few rules, which they practice as though they were the truth. For example, when they see someone is having a hard time, or someone's family is going through a rough patch, they take it upon themselves to reach out and help them. They ask after them, care for them, and look after them. Where there's dirty or demanding work to be done, they'll proactively go and do it. Dirt and demands don't bother them. They're not picky. They don't argue with others in their dealings with them, and they try their best to reach amicable accord with any and everyone. They don't bicker with others, and they learn to be benevolent and tolerant of people, such that everyone who spends any time with them will say they're a good person and a true believer. When it comes to God, they do whatever He has them do and go wherever He has them go. They don't resist. What are they living by? (Zeal.) It's not just a simple form of zeal—they're living by a conviction that they hold to be right. Such people won't understand the truth even after years of believing in God, nor know what it is to practice the truth, or what it is to submit to God, or what it is to satisfy God, or what it is to seek the truth, or what the truth principles are. They won't know these things. They won't even know what an honest person is or how to be one. They believe, "All I have to do is live like this and keep on following. Whatever sermons God's house preaches, I'll hold fast to my ways of doing things; however God treats me, I won't give up my belief in Him or leave Him. I can perform whatever duty I'm asked to." They're under the impression that they can be saved by practicing like this. What a pity, though, that despite not having any big problem with their attitude, they understand no truths, even after hearing sermons for so many years. They don't understand the truth of submission or know how to practice it, they don't understand the truth of being an honest person, or the truth of loyally performing one's duty, or what it means to be careless and perfunctory. They don't know whether they lie or are a deceitful person. Aren't such people to be pitied? (They are.) What do they live by? Might it be said that they're living by their naked, childlike heart? Why might it? Because, as they believe, "My heart is out there for the universe to see. It's not clear to people; they can't see it—but Heaven knows it." That's how "sincere" their heart is: No one can understand it, and it's out of reach to all. Why call this a naked, childlike heart? Because they have a mood of some sort, an emotion, and they use that personal emotion or wishful thinking of theirs to interpret what a believer in God should do and what it is to perform a duty. They also use such emotions to codify God's requirements. They believe, "God doesn't actually require that people do anything, nor that they have much skill or understand much truth. It's enough for someone to have a naked, childlike heart. It's so simple to believe in God—all you have to do is keep on acting on the strength of a naked, childlike heart." Yet their lies don't stop, nor their resistance, nor their rebelliousness, nor their notions, nor their betrayal. Whatever they do, they don't feel that it matters, but think, "I have a God-loving heart. No one can rupture my relationship with God, no one can dampen my love for God, and no one can impinge on my loyalty to God." What kind of mentality is this? An absurd one, no? It's absurd, and it's to be pitied. There's a state in the spirit of such a person parched, impoverished, and pitiful. Why "parched"? Because when they're faced with some simple thing—they've told a lie, say—they don't know it or realize it. They feel no self-reproach; they have no feeling of any sort. They've followed God up till now without rigorous criteria for measurement in anything they do. They don't know what sort of person they are, nor whether they're a deceitful person, or whether they've really been able to be an honest person, or whether they're able to submit to God's requirements. They know none of these things. They're as pitiful as that, and they're parched in their spirit. Why say they're parched in their spirit? Because they don't know what God requires of them, or why they believe in God, or what sort of person they should pursue being. They don't know what acts are senseless, or what acts violate the truth principles. They don't know what attitude to adopt with evil people and what attitude to adopt with good people; they don't know whom they should interact with or whom they should draw close to. When they get negative, they don't even know what states they've fallen into. That's what it is to be parched in spirit. Are you like this? (Yes.) I don't like it, to hear you say that, but that's the sort of state you're in. You're always emotional, and no one knows when that's going to change.

What is being emotional? We'll look at an example. Some people feel themselves to love God very much. In particular, they feel greatly honored and twice blessed for having been born in the last days, for having accepted this stage of God's work, and for being able to hear His words with their own ears and experience His work in person. Consequently, they think they ought to find some way to express their naked, childlike hearts. And how do they do that? Their emotions come to the surface, their ardor is fit to burst forth, they get a bit irrational, and their emotions grow abnormal. And ugliness emerges from that. Back in mainland China, they were in an abhorrent environment for belief in God, and they lived lives of oppression. They had ardor then, and wished to shout out, "Almighty God, I love You!" But there was nowhere to do so—they couldn't, for fear of being arrested. Now they're abroad and are free to believe; they finally have a place to give vent to their naked, childlike heart. They need to express how much they love God. So, they go out into the streets and find a place without many people around, where they'll shout as they wish. Before they can, though, they feel as though they don't have the confidence to proceed. They look at the scene around them, and their shout doesn't come to them. What's going through their mind? "This won't do. It's not enough just to have a naked, childlike heart. I don't have a God-loving heart yet. No wonder I've got nothing to shout." And so, saddened and in pain, they go home and pray in tears to God, "Oh God, I didn't dare shout 'I love You' back when I was in a setting that didn't allow it. Now, I'm in a setting that allows it, but I still don't have the confidence. My shout won't come. It seems my stature and my confidence are just too paltry. I don't have the life." From then on, they pray about this issue, and make preparations, and apply themselves to it. They often read God's words and are moved to tears by them, and those emotions and enthusiasm of theirs brew and accumulate in their heart. This goes on until one day, they feel full enough of emotion that they could go to a public square with a several-thousand-person capacity and shout "I love You, Almighty God" in front of the crowd—yet when they go to the square and see all the people there, their shout doesn't come. Maybe they still haven't shouted it out, even now. But whether they have or not, what would it mean? Is it practicing the truth to shout like that? Is it testimony to God? (No.) So, why are they set on shouting that out? They hold the belief that that shout of theirs would be stronger and more effective than any other method of spreading God's words and testifying to God. That's what it means to be a person with a naked, childlike heart. Is it a good thing or a bad thing for a person to have such emotions? Is it normal or abnormal? Can it be classified as within the ambit of normal humanity? (No.) Why not? What is God's goal in having people perform duties and in having them understand and practice the truth? Is it to heighten people's emotion of love for Him or their emotion in performing their duty? (No.) Do you have such emotions sometimes, or maybe often? (Yes.) When you do, do you feel that they come on suddenly and abnormally, or that they're hard to suppress? You must restrain them, as hard to suppress as they are. All else aside, these are merely emotions, not the achievements that come after people understand and practice the truth, or after they've followed God's way. They're an abnormal state. Can this abnormal state be classed under radical obstinance, then? That varies by case. There are different degrees; some can be classed under radical obstinance, and some rise to the level of absurdity. It's normal for someone to pour forth a bit of this mood on occasion. So, what manifestations of it are abnormal, then? Doing something out of insuppressible emotion. When one lives their every day and scrambles around for that thing's sake, reading God's words and spreading the gospel for its sake, too, and performing any and all duties for its sake when everything revolves around that thing, and it becomes the value and significance of their existence and life—that spells trouble. That person's goal and direction get skewed. There's an ugliness to people who live by their naked, childlike hearts. There's something obstinate about them, and they have abnormal emotions. If someone lives by these things and often lives in such a state, can they understand the truth? (No.) If they can't understand the truth, what's their frame of mind when they listen to sermons? What intention do they have in reading God's words? Can one who's always believing in God with a naked, childlike heart and religious ceremony understand and gain the truth? (No.) Why not? All that they do isn't based in the truth, but in religious theory and in notions and imaginings. It isn't about pursuing and practicing the truth, either. They don't care at all about what the truth really is or what God's words say. They don't care about that, as if all one needed to believe in God was a naked, childlike heart, as if all they had to do was handle things and put forth effort in church. It's that simple to them. They don't get what it is to understand and practice the truth, nor what to pursue in order to be saved. They may think about these things sometimes, but they just can't work them out. The whole time, they're thinking, "As long as I have zeal, reach a heightened level of emotion, and can persevere to the end, I may just be saved," and consequently, carried away by their heightened emotions, they do nothing but foolish things, things that go against the truth principles. In the end, they are revealed and cast out. It seems heightened emotions aren't such a great thing, after all.

There's another fairly egregious state in living by a naked, childlike heart, and that's that some people always rely on enthusiasm to believe in God. The fire in their hearts never goes out; they think all they need to believe in God is a naked, childlike heart. "I don't need to understand the truth, I don't need to reflect on myself, and I don't need to come before God to confess my sins and repent—and I certainly don't need to accept any judgment and chastisement, pruning and being dealt with, or censure and criticism from anyone" they think. "I don't need those things. All I need is a naked, childlike heart." This is the principle of their belief in God. They think, "I don't have to accept judgment and chastisement. It's enough for me just to feel good about myself. I believe that God's certain to be happy with my doing that. If I'm happy, God's happy—that's all there is to it. I'll be saved if I believe in God like that." Isn't this a terribly naive way of thinking? You used to be in a state like that, didn't you? (Yes.) If you live to the end in a state like that, incapable of any reformation, then it's fair to say that you don't understand the least bit of the truth. The truth has no bearing on you. You don't know the goal or significance of God's salvation of man, and you don't understand what belief in God is about. What's the difference between faith in God and belief in religion? Everyone conceives of believing in religion being because that person lacks a livelihood, that they might have difficulties at home. Otherwise, it's that they want to find something to lean on, to find spiritual sustenance. Belief in religion is often nothing more than getting people to be good, benevolent, help others, be kind to others, do more good deeds to accumulate virtue, not commit murder or arson, not break the law or commit crimes, not do bad things, not hit people or curse at them, not steal or rob, and not cheat or swindle. This is the concept of "belief in religion" that exists in everyone's minds. How much of the concept of belief in religion exists within your hearts today? Are those things which are associated with belief in religion in line with the truth? Where, exactly, do they come from? Do you know? If you believe in God with a heart that harbors belief in religion, what will the result be? Is this the right way to believe in God? Is there a difference between the state of believing in religion and the state of having faith in God? What is the difference between belief in religion and faith in God? When you first started believing in God, you may have felt that believing in religion and having faith in God were the same thing. But today, after believing in God for several years, just what do you think having faith really is? Is there any difference from belief in religion? Belief in religion means following some religious rituals in order to bring happiness and comfort to one's spirit. It doesn't relate to questions of what path people walk or how they live their lives. There is no change in your inner world; you are still you, and your nature essence remains the same. You have not accepted the truths that come from God and made them your life, but have merely done some good deeds or followed ceremony and rules. You have merely engaged in some activities related to belief in religion—just this, that's all. So what does faith in God refer to? It means a change in how you live, it means that there has already been a change in the value of your existence and your goals in life. You originally lived for things such as honoring your ancestors, standing out from the crowd, having a good life, and striving for fame and fortune. Today, you have abandoned those things. You no longer follow Satan, but you wish to forsake it, to forsake this evil trend. You are following God, what you accept is the truth, and the path you walk is that of pursuing the truth. Your life's direction has completely changed. After believing in God, you are approaching life differently, having a different way of life, following the Creator, accepting and submitting to the Creator's rule and arrangements, accepting the Creator's salvation, and ultimately becoming a true created being. Isn't this changing your way of life? It is the complete opposite of your previous pursuit, way of life, and the motivations and significance behind all you did—they're entirely at odds, not even in the same ballpark. We'll end there on the difference between faith in God and belief in religion. Can you see in yourselves the state of having a "naked, childlike heart" we'd been talking about? (Yes.) So, are you living by a naked, childlike heart most of the time, or do you just have that state on occasion? If it's occasional, that proves that you've cast off that state already and begun to pursue the truth, that you've begun to emerge from that state of affairs; if you're still living by a naked, childlike heart a majority of the time and don't know how to live by God's words, by the truth, nor how to cast off the restraints of a naked, childlike heart and emerge from that state, that proves that you're not living before God, that you don't yet know what the truth is or how to seek it. Is that a big distinction? (Yes.) If you go on living that way, without understanding the truth in the least, you're in danger—you'll have to be cast out, sooner or later. As to how that naked, childlike heart comes into being, you'll have to seek the truth, analyze the state, and change that state. Why one would have that naked, childlike heart; what consequences will come of relying on fervor to believe in God; whether you can gain the truth by believing in God like that; whether it will bolster your faith in God—you must be clear at heart on these questions. This requires you to hold yourself up for comparison, to reflect, and to seek the resolution.

One sort of person is enthusiastic at heart in their belief in God. Any duty is fine for them, and so is a bit of hardship, but their temperament is unstable—they're emotional and capricious, inconsistent. They act by their mood alone. When they're happy, they do the job they're tasked with well, and they get along well with whomever they're partnered with and whomever they associate with. They're willing to take on more of the duty, too whatever duty they're performing, they have a sense of responsibility for it. That's how they act when they're in a good state. There may be a reason that they're in a good state: Maybe they were praised for doing a good job with their duty, and won the group's esteem and approval. Or, maybe lots of people appreciate the work they produced, so they're puffed up like a balloon that gets fuller with every puff of praise. And so, they go on performing the same duty each day, yet all the while, they never grasp God's will or seek the truth principles. They're always acting on the strength of their experience. Is experience the truth? Is it reliable to act on experience? Does it accord with the truth principles? Acting on experience doesn't accord with the principles; there will necessarily be times when it fails. So, a day comes when they don't perform their duty well. Many things go wrong, and they're dealt with. The group is unsatisfied with them. They get negative then: "I'm not performing this duty anymore. I do it badly. You're all better than I am. It's me who's no good. Whoever's willing to do it, go ahead!" Someone fellowships with them about the truth, but it doesn't get through to them, and they don't understand, saying: "What's there to fellowship about in this? I don't care if it is the truth or not—I'll do my duty when I'm happy and won't when I'm not. Why make it so complicated? I'm not doing it now; I'll wait for a day when I'm happy." This is how they are, consistently. Whether in performing their duty; reading God's words, or listening to sermons and attending gatherings; or in their interactions with others—in everything that bears on any aspect of their life, what they pour forth is cloudy one moment and sunny the next, elevated one moment and depressed the next, cold one moment and hot the next, negative one moment and positive the next. In brief, their state, good or bad, is always quite pronounced. You can see it at a glance. They're inconsistent in everything they do, just giving themselves over to their temperament. When they're happy, they do a better job, and when they're not, they're shoddy—they may even stop doing the thing and call it quits. Whatever they're doing, they must do it according to their mood, according to the environment, according to their demands. They have no will at all to undergo hardship; they're pampered and spoiled, hysterical, impervious to reason, and they do nothing to curb it. No one's allowed to offend them; whoever does is a target for their temper, which comes on like a storm—and right after it passes, they're negative and emotionally downcast. What's more, they do everything based on their preferences. "If I like this job, I'll do it; if I don't, I won't, and never will. Whichever of you is willing can do it. That has nothing to do with me." What kind of person is this? When they're happy and their state is good, they're worked up at heart and say they want to love God. They're so worked up that they cry, hot tears streaming down their face, loudly sobbing. Is theirs a heart that truly loves God? The state of loving God at heart is a normal one, but to look at their disposition, behaviors, and outpourings, you'd think they were a child of ten or so years. This disposition of theirs, their way of living, is capriciousness. They're inconsistent, undevoted, irresponsible, and feckless in everything they do. They never undergo hardship and are unwilling to take on responsibility. When they're happy, they're fine doing anything; a bit of hardship is fine, and if their interests suffer a blow, that's fine, too. But if they're unhappy, they won't do anything. What sort of person are they? Is a state like that normal? (No.) This issue goes beyond that of an abnormal state—it's a manifestation of extreme capriciousness, extreme foolishness and ignorance, extreme childishness. What's the problem with capriciousness? Some may say, "It's an instability of temperament. They're too young and have been through too little hardship, and their personality isn't set yet, so there's often capriciousness in their behavior." The fact is that capriciousness doesn't care about age: Forty-somethings and septuagenarians are capricious at times, too. How's this to be explained? Capriciousness is in fact a problem in one's disposition, and an extremely serious one, at that! If they're performing an important duty, it may delay that duty and the work's progress, incurring losses to the interests of God's house; and with ordinary duties, too, it affects those duties at times, and hinders things. There's nothing about it that benefits others, themselves, or the work of the church. The little tasks they do and prices they pay come at a net loss. Particularly capricious people are unfit to perform duties in God's house, and there are many such people. Capriciousness is the most common manifestation among corrupt dispositions. Practically every person has such a disposition. And what is that disposition? Naturally, every corrupt disposition is one variety of Satan's dispositions, and capriciousness is a corrupt disposition. In mild terms, it's not loving or accepting the truth; in weightier terms, it's being sick of the truth and hating it. Can capricious people submit to God? Certainly not. They can momentarily, when they're happy and profiting, but when they're unhappy and not profiting, they fly into a rage and dare to resist and betray Him. They'll say to themselves, "I don't care whether it is the truth or not—what matters is that I'm happy, that I'm content. If I'm unhappy, nothing anyone says will help! What does the truth count for? What does God count for? I'm the boss!" What kind of corrupt disposition is this? (Hating the truth.) It's a disposition that hates the truth, one that's sick of it. Is there an element of arrogance and conceit to it? An element of intransigence? (Yes.) There's another egregious state here. When they're in a good mood, they're nice to everyone and responsible in performing their duty; people think they're a good, obedient person, one who's willing to pay a price, who really loves the truth. But as soon as they get negative, they'll clock out, complain, and even be impervious to reason. Here, their vicious side emerges. No one's allowed to reproach them. They'll even say, "I understand every truth, I just don't practice it. It'll do for me just to be at ease with myself!" What disposition is this? (Viciousness.) These evil people aren't just ready to fight back against anyone who might deal with them, they'd even hurt them and harm them, like an evil demon. No one would dare mess with them. Is this not highly capricious and vicious of them? Is this a youth-related problem? Would they not be capricious if they were older? Would they be more thoughtful and sensible if they were older? No. This isn't a matter of their personality or their age. There's a deep-rooted corrupt disposition hiding in there. They're governed by a corrupt disposition, and it's by a corrupt disposition that they live. Is there obedience in someone who lives in a corrupt disposition? Can they seek the truth? Is there a part of them that loves the truth? (No.) No, there's none of those. Have all of you had a capricious state? (Yes.) Would you feel it was a problem if we didn't fellowship about it? (We wouldn't.) Now, having fellowshiped about it, do you feel it's quite a serious problem? (Yes.) Some occasional capriciousness arises from objective causes. That's not a dispositional problem. All dispositional problems, and all outpourings of a corrupt disposition in one's actions, will yield negative consequences. Here's an example of an objective cause: Say someone has a terrible stomachache today. They're in such pain that they barely have the strength to speak. They just want to lie down for a while. Just then, someone comes along and has a few words with them, and their tone in responding is a bit harsh. Is this a problem with their disposition? No, it's not. They're only being like that because they're sick and in pain. If that were the sort of person they were at normal times, one who spoke in that way, that would be a dispositional problem. In this case, there's a bad tone to their speech because their pain has passed a certain threshold. That's a normal thing to happen. If there's an objective cause, and everyone acknowledges that speaking or acting in such a way is pardonable and reasonable, given the circumstances, and that it's just human nature, then it's a behavior and outpouring of normal humanity. Take the example of someone who lost a relative and begins crying in grief. That's guite normal. Yet there are people who would pass judgment on them and say, "This person is sentimental. They've believed in God for all these years but still can't let go of their affection for their family. They even cry when a relative of theirs dies. How foolish!" Then, it happens that when the speaker's mother dies, they cry harder than anyone. How should one view this? You can't blindly apply rules or make generalizations about it—some things have objective causes, and they're behaviors and outpourings of normal humanity. What the behaviors and outpourings of normal humanity are, and what they aren't—that varies with the circumstances. Whatever mention is made of what one lives by, what's being said touches, in one regard, on problems in people's dispositions, and in the other regard, it's about problems in people's viewpoints, their modes of pursuit, and their paths of pursuit. It's not at all a question of their temper or personality, or of their outward ways of doing things.

There's another sort of state, and that's living by philosophies for dealing with the world. Most people like to pursue fame, fortune, and status in their belief in God, without focusing on pursuing the truth. So long as someone has a bit of caliber and a few ideas, they possess a set of Satan's philosophies and rules for living. They each have their own "tricks up their sleeve" regarding how to live happily, how to live in a way that distinguishes them and brings honor to their family name, and wins everyone's acclaim. What tricks are those? They're philosophies of "supremacy" for dealing with the world. Some people may find that funny to hear: "Supremacy" and "philosophies for dealing with the world" are phrases that don't belong together. They're a strange pairing. So, why is the word "supremacy" used here? In general, someone with a philosophy for dealing with the world believes that in order to live, they need to be equipped with some rules for existence, that is, some secrets for survival. They think that's the only way to achieve their goals in life. They hold these rules for existence, which are philosophies for dealing with the world, as their highest tenets, just like those mottos that people often say. They uphold and stick to their philosophy for dealing with the world as if it were the truth, without excluding even God's chosen people from this treatment. They think, "All humans put their pants on one leg at a time. You believe in God, don't you? You follow the principles, don't you? You understand the truth, don't you? Well then, I have a philosophy for dealing with the world to handle you. You're meticulous, right? You go by the truth principles, right? Well, I don't understand the truth principles, and I can still make you well disposed toward me and keep you running in circles. I'll keep you all in my orbit; you'll say I'm a good person and won't say anything bad about me behind my back. I'll even pass judgment on you when you're not around, and do nasty things to you, and betray you—and you'll be none the wiser." That's a person who lives by philosophies for dealing with the world. What's inside those philosophies for dealing with the world? Subterfuge, deception, and tactics, as well as approaches and methods. For instance, when they see someone with status, someone who could be of use, they're very polite, bowing and scraping and singing their praises. With those who they think have little to offer, and aren't as good as them, they always speak condescendingly and look down on them, which makes those people feel that they're superior and must always be looked up to. In their inner world, they have a system for toying with and manipulating people and a way for how they ought to treat each sort of person. When they encounter someone, they know at a glance what sort of person they are, and how they should deal with them and associate with them. Their mind comes up with the formula right away. They're sophisticated and practiced at it. They don't need to think about implementing these philosophies—they don't need preliminary sketches or anyone's instruction. They have their own methods. Some of those, they thought up themselves; some, they learned from others, or watched in others, or gained from others' influence. It may be that no one told them about those methods, but they can infer the ins and outs, and so they learn their philosophies for dealing with the world, techniques, approaches and methods, schemes, and calculations. Do people who live by these things have the truth? Can they live by the truth? (No.) They cannot. So, what impact do they have on other people? Others are often deceived and hoodwinked by them, used and toyed with by them, and so on. These philosophies for dealing with the world aren't necessarily the sole purview of intellectuals, or of some group of people—the fact is that they're present in everyone.

In what other ways do satanic philosophies manifest? Some people are great talkers. They coax happiness and satisfaction out of people, who come away soothed for having heard them speak, but they do no practical work at all. What sort of person is this? One who manipulates people with pretty words. Some leaders and workers work for a while, then think to themselves, "Does the Above understand me? Does God know of me? I need to report a few problems so that the Above will know I'm working. If the Above sees that the problems I report are quite real and substantive, that they're key issues, He perhaps holds me in esteem, seeing that I can do practical work." And so, they find a chance to mention problems. They're justified in mentioning problems, that's common sense, and the work requires it. But this shouldn't be tainted with their personal intent. Can you see the intent this person has in reporting these issues? What's really the problem with this intent they have? This question calls for thought and discernment. If they were mentioning the issues in order to perform their duty well and please God, that would be justified; it would mean that they were a responsible person, one who did practical work. Yet there are currently some leaders and workers who don't do practical work, but are opportunistic and cut corners, who lie to their superiors and hide things from those beneath them. Still, they'd like to be smooth and slick, and satisfy everyone. By practicing in this way, are they not living by satanic philosophies? If so, how should the problem be resolved? What truths are to be sought, how is it to be known and discerned—these things must be made clear before the problem of their corrupt intent can be resolved. Here's another example. Two people are paired up to perform a duty. They're going to go to a church in another area to handle a problem there. The living conditions there are relatively poor, public security isn't great, and it's a bit of a risky place. One of them says, "The people in that church don't like me. Even if I went, there's no guarantee that I could resolve the problem there. They all like you, though. It'd be productive for you to go resolve the problem." The other finds this to be true and heads off. All else aside, is there not a problem with the one who found reasons and excuses not to go? Whether their excuses and reasons are valid or not, are they practicing the truth in this? Are they thinking of their brothers and sisters? No; they're lying. They're using pretty words to accomplish their own ends. Is this not a technique? If you think like this and act like this, you haven't forsaken the flesh. You're still living by satanic philosophies. But what if you could forsake yourself and didn't live by satanic philosophies? You initially wouldn't want to go to that church to handle its problems, but you'd mull it over: "That's not right. The fact that I'd think like that means I'm a bad person, that I'm immoral. I've got to take what I said back, as fast as I can. I have to apologize to him and be open about the corruption I revealed. I must go to that place today, even if it means I'll die there." It's not actually a sure thing that you'll die there. Since when does death come so easily? Life and death are preordained by God. All in all, in such a case, you need to have resolve and the ability to forsake yourself. Only then will you be able to live by the truth. I'll give you another example. Two people are paired up to perform a duty. They're both afraid of taking responsibility for it, so it becomes a battle of wits. One says, "You go take care of this." The other says, "It'd be better for you to handle it. I'm of worse caliber than you." What they're really thinking is: "There'll be no reward for doing this thing well, and if it's done poorly, I'll be dealt with. I'm not going—I'm not that dumb! I know what you're up to. Quit trying to get me to go." What comes in the end of their back-and-forth? Neither of them goes, and the work is delayed as a result. Is that not immoral? (It is.) Isn't delaying the work a serious consequence? It's a bad result. So, what is it that these two are living by? They're both living by satanic philosophies; they're ruled over and bound up by satanic philosophies and their own trickery. They've failed to practice the truth, and as such, their performance of their duty isn't up to standard. It's careless and perfunctory, and there's no testimony at all in it. Say two people are paired up to perform a duty. One of them tries to take a dominant position in everything and always wants to have the last word, and the other may think, "They're the tough one; they like taking the lead. Well, they can take the lead in everything, and when something goes wrong, it'll be them who get pruned and dealt with. 'The bird that sticks its neck out is the one that gets shot'! I won't stick out, then. It just so happens that I'm of poor caliber, and I don't like to be bothered with stuff. They love taking the lead, right? Well, if there's something to do, I'll leave it to them!" A person who'd say such things enjoys being a people-pleaser, a follower. What do you make of their way of performing a duty? What is it they're living by? (Philosophies for dealing with the world.) They're thinking something else, too. "Won't they get mad at me if I steal their thunder? Won't there be discord between the two of us going forward? If this were to affect our relationship, we'd have a tough time getting along. I'll be better off if I let them have their way." Is this not a philosophy for dealing with the world? The way they're living saves them trouble. It enables them to avoid taking responsibility. They'll follow along in whatever they're made to do, without having to take the lead or stick out, and without having to think about any problems. Everything's being covered by someone else, so they won't tire themselves out. Their willingness to be a follower proves that they have no sense of responsibility. They're living by philosophies for dealing with the world. They don't accept the truth or uphold the principles. That's not harmonious cooperation—it's being a follower, a people-pleaser. Why is that not cooperation? Because they don't live up to their responsibility in anything. They don't act with all their heart or all their mind, and it may be that they don't act with all their strength, either. That's why I say they're living by philosophies for dealing with the world, rather than by the truth. Here's another example: Someone does a bad thing while performing their duty, something that incurs a loss to the interests of God's house. You see it, but you think to yourself, "That's none of my business. It didn't hurt my interests. And besides, I'm not the one responsible. What am I doing, sticking my nose into other people's business? Someone else can go take care of it, whoever's willing to. All I have to do is stay on top of my own work. It's got nothing to do with me if others do bad things. I don't care if I see it; I don't care if they've gone astray; and if there's a loss to the church's work, that has nothing to do with me." Is this not a philosophy for dealing with the world? (It is.) Are this person's intentions good? (No.) They're living by satanic philosophies. Some people do this occasionally in some matter; others do it frequently, without ever seeking the truth or reflecting on themselves, and without resolving their corrupt dispositions. These two sorts of people are in different situations. But regardless of whether it's done in isolated incidents or in all matters, it touches on the problem of a corrupt disposition. It's not a simple issue with one's methods—it's living one's life by satanic philosophies. What other philosophies for dealing with the world do people commonly see and come into contact with? (Bribing others with petty favors, catering to others' preferences, praising people, and pandering to them.) Catering to others' preferences is one technique, one sort of philosophy for dealing with the world. What else? (Not speaking up directly after seeing someone do something that violates the principles, for fear of hurting their feelings.) Being indirect in speech, always circling the issue, always picking pleasant words that don't involve the principles or the essential problem—this is another sort of philosophy for dealing with the world. Any others? (Flattering and ingratiating oneself to anyone with status.) That's currying favor, and it's also a sort of philosophy for dealing with the world. There are people who, by their nature, are always looking to manipulate and take advantage of others. They're particularly treacherous. There are people who are smooth and slick everywhere they go. What they say depends on whom they're saying it to. Their minds are very quick to react: They know how to handle a person from the first time they lock eyes. Such people are extremely cunning; they can't live by the truth. In what other ways do philosophies for dealing with the world manifest? (Not daring to speak up after seeing a problem for fear of taking the blame if it turns out to be a mistake, watching what others are saying and doing, and not expressing a view until the majority has already spoken.) People tend to go along with the flow, thinking that the law cannot be enforced when everyone is an offender. What sort of problem is that? What sort of disposition? Isn't it a deceitful disposition? Not daring to uphold the truth principles because you always want to be a people-pleaser and are afraid of causing offense, yet also fearing that you'll be exposed and cast out for not practicing the truth—that's quite a dilemma! That's the pitiful plight of people-pleasers. When people don't practice the truth, such are the ugly conditions they live out; all of them bear the demonic likeness of Satan. Some of these people are insidious, some are treacherous, some are despicable, some are vile, some are lowly, and others are pitiful. Are you living by satanic philosophies? Flattering anyone who's a leader while ignoring leaders who have been replaced and cast out; ingratiating yourself to anyone chosen as a leader, no matter who they are; saying all kinds of nauseating things, "My goodness, you're pretty, and so regular of build—the very image of beauty. You've got the speaking voice of a newscaster and the singing voice of a lark," looking for ways to curry their favor; flattering them every chance you get; bribing them with petty favors; generally watching to see what they do and say, and thinking up ways to satisfy them when you see they like something. Are these tactics that you have? (Yes. Sometimes I see that a leader or worker has some problems or shortcomings, yet I don't dare say anything, for fear that they'll blame me and be badly disposed toward me.) That's a lack of principles. Do you know, then, whether you've identified those problems correctly and whether it would benefit the work of the church for you to speak up about them? (A bit.) You know a bit—so what must you do in order to be aligned with the truth principles? If you are sure that you have found a problem, and you understand in your heart that this problem ought to be solved, otherwise it will delay the work, yet you are not able to adhere to the principles, and you're afraid of offending other people, what problem is at play? Why would you be afraid to adhere to the principles? This is an issue of a serious nature, and it touches on whether you love the truth and whether you have a sense of righteousness. You should give voice to your opinion, even if you do not know if it is correct. If you have an opinion or idea, you should say it, and let the others assess it. There will be benefits for you in doing so, and it will go some way toward solving the problem. If you think to yourself, "I'm not getting involved. If what I say is right, I won't get the credit, and if it's wrong, I'll be dealt with. It's not worth it," is that not selfish and contemptible of you? People are always considering their own interests, and unable to practice the truth. That is the most difficult thing about people. Do all of you not have a great many such philosophies for dealing with the world and schemes inside you? There are quite a few items of Satan's philosophies in every person, and they have long since been overrun by them. It is no wonder, then, that people listen to sermons for years without understanding the truth, and that their entry into the truth reality is slow, and their stature remains always so small. The reason is that such corrupted things are hindering and disturbing them. By what do people live when they need to practice the truth? They live by these corrupt dispositions, by notions, imaginings, and philosophies for dealing with the world, as well as by gifts. Living by these things, it is very hard for people to come before God. Why is that? Their load is too great and their yoke too heavy. Man's living by these things is so far divided from the truth. These things keep you from understanding the truth and from practicing the truth. If you do not understand the truth, will your faith in God increase? (No.) Your faith in God will certainly not increase, let alone your knowledge of Him. This is a very lamentable and scary thing.

What people live by has to do with their views on things, as well as with their dispositions. Some people are always striving toward their dreams and desires. Those are people with dreams. Some live always by their desires. What do their desires include? There's the desire to do work and to make themselves known, and there's the desire to show themselves off. As an example, there are those who like status. Without status, they won't believe in God; without status, they're not of a mind to do anything, and believing in God is boring to them, too. They live by their desire to pursue status, and they get through their days, one after the next, dominated by this desire. Whatever status they may have is quite precious to them. Nothing they do is for anything other than status: maintaining their status, shoring up their status, expanding their jurisdiction all they do, in every way, is about this desire of theirs. They're living by desire. There are others who lead pitiful lives in the world. They're guileless people who always get bullied, who come from bad homes, from a poor social environment, with no one to depend on. They're alone and uncared for, until they come to believe in God, at which point they feel they've finally found a pillar of support. They have an aspiration, and they're driven by it in their belief in God. Their aspiration has never changed, even up to the present. They think, "Believing in God, I live with dignity and strength of character; believing in God, I can rise head and shoulders above others, and live a life that's superior to others'. When I've gone to heaven, you'll all have to hold me in esteem. No one will look down on me anymore." This wish, this hope of theirs is very hollow and indistinct. They feel they were living such a wretched life in the world, because of their family's circumstances or some other reason. Living in God's house, they have something to rely on. The brothers and sisters don't bully them. They're a wretch no longer; they have a pillar of support. What's more, their greatest hope is that they may gain a wonderful destination for themselves after they die, or in this life, where they'll be able to hold their head up high. That's their goal. They live by this aspiration, and everywhere, in all things, they use this thought, this wish, as their motivation. It's guite hard for them to live by the truth. Such people live pitifully. There are others who have the desire to show themselves off or make themselves known. Because of that, they very much like living within a group, doing this and that to make others in the group think highly of them, which satisfies their vanity. They believe, "I may not be a leader, but so long as I can put my talents on display for the group and seem to shine with glamor, enhaloed, it's worth it for me to believe in God. That's what I live for; it's no worse than being in the world." So, that's what they live for from then on. They live all their days and years like that, without any change to their original intention. Is this living by the truth? Certainly not. They're living by dreams and desires, the same as unbelievers. This is a problem that has to do with one's views on things, as well as with corrupt dispositions. If this problem goes unresolved, there's no way to understand or practice the truth, and it's quite hard to live by the truth then.

There are also some women who live by their looks, who are always thinking themselves pretty, thinking that wherever they go, everyone likes them, regards them highly, and approves of them. Wherever they go, they hear people's complimentary language toward them and see people's smiling faces directed at them. They're guite pleased with themselves, and quite confident, living like that. So, they believe that living as they do gives them capital, that there's much value in their living—that a lot of people appreciate them, at least. Aren't there also men who are involved in living by their looks? Say you're handsome, and in your talk with your sisters, you're witty, dashing, and romantic. You're guite pleased with yourself, with everyone thinking highly of you and in your orbit. "It's not as if I'm trying to date anyone. I'm just living like this, and it's lovely! Practicing the truth—how dull!" There are others who live off some sort of capital, and to have capital, they must of course have a real thing of some sort. What real things might those be? Some people, for instance, feel they came from the womb believing in God. They've believed in God for fifty years or more, and that's their capital. When they see a brother or sister, they ask, "How many years have you believed in God for?" "Five years," the other says. They've believed in God for ten times longer than this person, and seeing that, they think to themselves, "Have you believed in God for anywhere close to as many years as I have? You're so young. You'd better behave yourself—you've got a long way to go!" This is them living off their capital. What other sorts of capital are there? Some people have served as leaders and workers at all levels. They've been out for a long time, doing work and running around and going among the churches, and they've got lots of experience. They're fairly familiar with the work arrangements of the Above, as well as with the various sorts of people and areas of work in the church. So, they believe, "I'm a veteran leader with a veteran's capital. I've been working for a long time, and I have experience. What do you all know? You're children. How many days have you worked? You're so green. You don't know anything. Yeah, you listen to me, that's right!" And so, they go on preaching all day, without anything practical in it—it's all words and doctrines. They'll make excuses, though: "I'm in a bad mood today. There's an antichrist causing disruption and disturbance, and it's gotten to me. I'll preach properly next time." That shows their true colors, doesn't it? They're living on their veteran's capital, and immensely self-satisfied, no less. Truly, how disgusting, how sickening! That's one sort of capital. There are others who have been imprisoned for believing in God, or have had some other exceptional experience, or have performed exceptional duties. They've suffered, and that, too, serves them as a sort of capital. Why are people always living off their capital? There's a problem in this: They believe that such capital is their life. As long as they're living off their capital, they're able to admire and revel in themselves often, and use that capital to instruct and influence others, which is handy in winning their praise. They believe that with their capital as a foundation, as long as they pursue a bit of truth, or do their duty well and have some good deeds under their belt, then they, like Paul, may have a crown of righteousness in store for them. Certainly, they'll survive; certainly, they'll come to a good destination. Living off their capital, they're often living in a self-pleased, immensely self-satisfied, contentedly complacent state. They feel that

God is pleased with their capital, that He delights in them, that He'll allow them to remain unto the end. Isn't this living off capital? They pour forth this mindset at every turn. In the things they pour forth, in the things they live by, and in the things they preach to others at every chance they get, what's on their mind is clear to see. There are others who have gotten special grace or care from God, something no one else has—just them. So, they think that they're special, that they're different from all the rest. They say, "Your belief in God is different from mine. God begins by giving you a lot of grace and leading you. Then, once you've slowly come to understand a few truths, God deals with you and prunes you, judges and chastises you. That's what it's like for all of you. It's different for me: God gives me special grace. He treats me with special favor, and that special favor is my capital—it's my voucher and my ticket into the kingdom." What feeling do you get when you hear them say these things? Do they have knowledge of God's work? Do they have knowledge of themselves? None at all. It's fair to say that they don't understand the truth, and that they believe they can be saved without having to pursue the truth, or to seek the truth, or to accept judgment and chastisement. Which people are they, who have states like this? They're those few who have seen some visions, who've received some special protection and escaped calamity. Or, they've died and come back to life, and have some special testimony or experience. They take these things as their life, as the basis for their living, and use them as a substitute for practicing the truth. Moreover, they take these things to be signs and standards of salvation. That's capital. Do you have such things? You may not have this sort of special experience, but if you've performed a particular duty for a long time and achieved results, you'll assume you have capital. Say you've performed the duty of a director for a long while, and produced several good works. That takes shape as capital for you. You may not have any yet because you haven't produced any works. Or, you may have filmed two movies that you think aren't bad, yet you don't yet dare regard them as your capital. You lack confidence in them; you feel you don't have enough experience or capital yet, so you're cautious, reserved, and subdued. You don't dare step on any toes, much less be cocky and parade around. Even so, you're immensely pleased with yourself and self-admiring at all times, and those are the things you live by. Is that not the pitiful plight of corrupt mankind?

Some people have very malevolent appearances. They're big, burly, and strong, and they're always looking to bully others. In speech, they're quite domineering and imperious; they're unyielding with everyone, whoever they are. So, people get a bit fearful when they see them, and treat them with deference, trying to ingratiate themselves. This makes them immensely proud. They feel that life's a breeze, and believe all this to be a talent of theirs—they think that no one would dare bully them, living as they do. If you want to stand firm in a crowd, you have to be self-reliant, self-empowered, and strong and tough—this is their tenet in life. In order to stand firm among others, without anyone daring to bully them or toy with them, nor anyone daring to cheat and exploit them, they boil things down to a tenet like this: "I need to be strong and tough

if I want to live well—the fiercer I am, the better. That way, no one anywhere will even think about bullying me." So, they live like this for a few years, and indeed, as it turns out, no one dares bully them. They've finally accomplished their goal. Whatever group they're in, they wear a serious expression, a poker face, playing up their gravitas and scowling in cool contempt. No one dares speak around them; children cry just to see them. Demons, reborn—that's what they are! Living by the fist—what disposition is that? It's a disposition of viciousness. Wherever they go, the first thing they do is learn how to maneuver and exploit people. They want to control people, too, and subdue them. They think of ways to give the what-for to anyone who disrespects them, and they look for chances to punish anyone who speaks impolitely to them with barbed words. Isn't it vicious to live by these things? Handling things with their fists, as they do, has some effect: Many people fear them, which clears a path for them. But can such people accept the truth, given that they live by impetuousness and a malicious disposition? Can they truly repent? That would be impossible, because they endorse satanic philosophies and the use of force. They live only by satanic philosophies and the use of force; they make everyone submit to them and fear them, so they can run wantonly amok, doing whatever they like. What worries them isn't having a bad reputation, but not having an evil one. That's their principle. Once they've accomplished their goal like this, they think, "I've managed to stand firm in God's house and among these groups. Everyone fears me; no one would dare mess with me. They're all deferential toward me." They believe that they've won. Is it really the case that no one would dare mess with them? Not daring to mess with them is external. How does everyone, deep in their hearts, view such people? No doubt about it: They're fed up with them, disgusted, hateful, recoiling, and avoidant. Would you be willing to have dealings with such a person? (No.) Why not? They'd always be thinking of ways to torment you. Would you be able to stand it? Sometimes, instead of threatening you with force, they'll employ some techniques to confuse you and then threaten you. Some people can't withstand the threat, so they beg for mercy and surrender to Satan. Evil people speak and act by any means necessary. The timid and fearful surrender to them, then follow them in speech and action. They're the evil person's accomplices, no? What will you do when you see such an evil person? First, don't be afraid. You must find a way to deal with them and expose them. You can also team up with brothers and sisters who truly believe in God to report them. Fear is useless—the more you fear them, the more they'll bully and harass you. Teaming up to report the evil person is the only way to make them fearful and ashamed. If you're too timid and lacking in wisdom, you're bound to be savaged by that evil person. How small people's faith is—how pitiful! What can an evil person really do to people, if they go all in? Would they dare swing their fists casually and beat someone to death? We're in a society of laws now. They wouldn't dare. Furthermore, the diabolically wicked are a small, isolated minority of people. If one should have the audacity to bully people and run roughshod over the church, all it would take is two or three people teaming up to report and expose them. That would take care of them. Is that not so? If just a few of God's chosen people are of one mind and heart, they can easily take care of an evil person. You must believe that God is a righteous, almighty God, that He abhors evil people, and that He will bolster His chosen people. So long as someone has faith, they shouldn't fear an evil person—and with a bit of wisdom and strategy, if they can team up with others, the evil person will naturally relent. If you don't truly have faith in God, but fear evil people and believe they can take you in their clutches and command your fate, then you're done for. You'll have no testimony, nothing to offer, and you'll live a craven, squalid life. What's to be done in such a situation? Some people always live by their petty cunning, and think, "I don't know where God is, and I'm not sure whether the Above knows about this matter. If I make a report and the evil person finds out, won't they torment me all the more for it?" The more they think about it, the more scared they get, and they want to duck and cover under the table. Can someone who does that still practice the truth and uphold the principles? (No.) They're craven little people, are they not? This is how most of you are. Some time ago, there was an antichrist who tormented some people. Those people were craven enough to get themselves tormented. Is being tormented a good thing or a bad thing? It's a bad thing, from man's perspective: It means being wronged, being caused pain. But one can take a lesson from it and benefit from it, and that's not a bad thing—it's a good one. There are some people, though, who lack wisdom and are weak-kneed. When someone torments and bullies them, they don't resist, even though they're in the right. They know that person is a false leader, an antichrist, but they don't report him, nor do they dare refute and expose him. Craven trash! If someone can be constrained when it comes to such things, it shows that they're too small of stature and pitiful of faith: They don't know to rely on God, nor do they think to preserve the work of the church. They don't understand God's will. God's chosen people have the right to make a stand against evil people and antichrists. Doing so is approved of and blessed by God. Isn't it pitiful that you don't wage war against Satan and overcome it? That person is clearly an evildoer, a negative force; he's Satan the devil, a filthy, wicked spirit—yet you're being tormented by him. And it's not just you there are so many others being tormented, as well. Is that not cravenness? Why can't you join hands to do battle against him? How lacking in intelligence and wisdom you are. Find a few discerning people who understand the truth to analyze that person's behavior. Do this, and most of God's chosen people will be able to see things as they are and rise up. Won't the problem then be easy to resolve? When you next encounter such a thing, will you be able to rise up and do battle with the antichrists? (Yes.) I'd like to see how many antichrists you're able to handle and take care of. That's the testimony of overcomers. You say you're able to now, but will you be able to uphold the principles when it truly happens? You may again get so scared that you'll take cover under the table. The pitiful, lamentable figure they cut, those people who don't understand the truth when things befall them—it's a painful thing to see! It's so pitiful! They dare not say anything when they're tormented, and the fear lingers in them afterward. They're scared out of their wits. How small of stature a person is, who can't even tell an evil person when they see one. They understand no truths at all. Aren't they pitiful? Evil people live by the fist; they live by oppressing people, bullying the good, and benefiting at others' expense; they live by their malicious natures and vicious dispositions, making others fear them, curry their favor, and pay tribute to them. They think it's a great thing to live like that. Are they not outlaws-in-chief? Are they not brigands and bandits? You're not evil people, but do you have such states? Don't you also live by such things? When some of you get paired with someone and see they're young, you think, "You don't understand anything. I can bully you, and you can't do a thing about it. I'm stronger than you and on higher ground; I'm bigger than you, and my fists hit harder—so, I can bully you." What's that living by? It's living by the fist; it's living and acting by a vicious disposition. When they see a guileless person, they bully them, and when they see a formidable person, they hide. They prey on the weak and fear the strong. Some evil people fear isolation when they see people are shunning them, so they pick a few guileless, craven people to engage with and make friends with. They thus grow their power, then put those guileless, craven people to use in tormenting good people, attacking people who pursue the truth, and tormenting everyone who's discontented or insubordinate with them. It's evident in this that an evil person has an intent and purpose in befriending a few guileless people. In summary, if you can't accept the truth or reflect on whether you're committing evil or doing good in your behaviors and actions, then no matter if you're a good person or a bad one, and no matter how many years you've believed in God, you won't be capable of true repentance. Maybe you're not someone with a vicious disposition—you're just living by satanic philosophies. You may not have done evil, or perhaps you have a few good deeds under your belt, but still, you're not living by the truth. You're living by things that have nothing to do with the truth. In summary, as long as you have a corrupt satanic disposition, then no matter how many years you've believed in God, you may be living by things that have nothing at all to do with the truth. These things may be tangible, or they may be intangible; you may be aware of them, or you may not be aware of them at all; they may come from the outside, or they may be things that have deep, solid roots in your disposition—in any case, none of these things is the truth. They all arise from corrupt mankind itself—or, to put it precisely, they have their origins in Satan. So, when people live by these satanic things, what kind of road are they on, exactly? Are they following God's way? Certainly not. If someone isn't practicing the truth in their actions and behaviors, then strictly speaking, they're not performing the duty of a created being. They may be performing a duty on the outside, but there's some distance between that and the standard for performing a duty, mainly in that it's adulterated with their intents and with transactionality. They may be performing a duty, but they're not faithful or principled, and their doing so certainly isn't yielding practical results. This goes to prove that in their performance of their duty, they've been doing a lot of things that have nothing to do with the truth. None of those things touch on the truth principles; they're all things done according to that person's own imaginings and preferences. How could performing a duty in that way meet with God's approval?

We've been fellowshiping on these states in all their aspects. Can you now gauge what it is you live by? Whether in performing your duty or in your daily life, do you live by the truth a lot of the time? (No.) I'm always exposing you to your core in our fellowship, and you're feeling you've been living inglorious lives. You've lost your confidence; you're not so glamorous anymore. And there are a lot of things you're embarrassed to give voice to—you don't feel so justified anymore in being blessed or coming to a good destination in the future. What's to be done about that? Is it a good thing to expose you as you've been? (Yes.) What, then, is the purpose of exposing you to your core? People must have clear knowledge of the sorts of states they're living in, of which states they're living in; they must have clear knowledge of what road it is they're walking, of what their mode of living is, of what abnormal behaviors they have, of what improper things they do, of whether they can gain the truth and come before God, living as they do. These are the most important things. You may say, "I have a clear conscience about how I'm living. I've never felt unsettled or unhappy about it, and I've never felt hollow." But what comes of that? God's displeasure. You're not following His way. The road you're on isn't the true road of human life, the one that God points out for you—instead, you're off along a road that you, in your wishful thinking, have found with your imaginings. Though you've been bustling happily about and have running around a lot, what will be your outcome, in the end? It will be your intents and desires and the road you walk that harm you and send you to ruin—your belief in God is doomed to fail. What does it mean for one's belief in God to fail? (That they'll have no outcome.) To see it now, it'll be a consequence of your not having gained the truth. You'll have believed in God for years, but without a focus on gaining the truth, and so the day will come when, for one reason or another, you'll be exposed and cast out. And then, it will be too late for regrets. You say, "This is a reasonable way for me to live! I feel confident living this way, and I'm quite full and rich at heart." Will that help, then? Whether how you walk the road of belief in God, how you live, and what things they are you live by are right depends on the results. That is, it depends on whether you ultimately gain the truth, and whether you have true testimony, and whether your life disposition is changed, and whether you've lived a life of value. If you've achieved all these results, then you'll meet with God's approval and the commendation of God's chosen people, which proves that you're on the right road. If you haven't achieved these positive results, and have neither any true experiential testimony nor any true change in your life disposition, that proves that you're not on the right road. Is this easy to understand, put like that? In brief, however you may live, however comfortably off you may be in life and whatever approval you may win from others, that isn't the crux of the matter. You say, "There's so much to enjoy in how I live and practice. I have a great sense of wellbeing, of being honored, and there's corroboration."

Aren't you fooling yourself? Say someone asks you, "Have you practiced being an honest person? What's been challenging for you in that practice? What circumstances make it difficult for you to be an honest person? Talk a bit about that, if you have experience of it. Do you have testimony of loving God? Do you have experience of loving God and submitting to Him? Do you have experience of your disposition having changed after you've accepted judgment, chastisement, dealing, and pruning? What special things have you experienced along your path of growth in life that have kept your life constantly turning, and constantly growing nearer to the goal God has set for you, which He requires you to meet?" If you have no clear answers to these things, if you don't know, it proves that you're not on the right road. That is clear as day.

The words of fellowship above are just simple statements. There are some minor points, which don't call for detailed elaboration. People doing things with their perseverance, for instance, or by the goodness of their heart, or by their willingness to suffer, or with their notions and imaginings, and so on—none of these is living by the truth. They're all instances of people living by their wishful thinking, their corrupt dispositions, their human goodness, and the philosophies of Satan. All these things come from man's brain, and to take it further, from Satan. Living by these things can't possibly satisfy God. He doesn't want them, no matter how good they are, because that's not the practice of the truth. To live by these things is to live by Satan's philosophies and corrupt dispositions. That's an insult to God. It's not true testimony. If you were to say, "I know these actions are just kind-heartedness, which doesn't accord with the truth principles; that's not how I should practice," with a true understanding of that at heart, a feeling that it's wrong to act like that, then you'd have knowledge. Your perspective would be altered. That's the result God wants. You must know where you've deviated. Alter your perspective and let go of your notions, and come to understand the truth and God's will. Once you have, practice by increments in that direction, and get on the correct path. That's your only hope of achieving the goal God has given you. If you don't practice and enter along the path required by God, but say, "This is what I'm doing. It's not as if I'm idle: I've been performing my duty. I'm certain that I am a created being, and I've acknowledged my Creator," will that be helpful? No, it won't. You are resisting God, intransigent! Now is the time to choose a road in life. What's crucial is what you have to do to follow the road that God requires you to walk. First, don't operate off human notions and imaginings; second, don't operate off human aspiration; third, don't operate off human preferences; and fourth, don't operate off human emotionality. More importantly, don't operate off of a corrupt disposition. You must lose no time in ridding yourself of these things. Whatever capital you have, to God, it's worthless stuff, cheap junk, all of it, that comes nowhere close to reality. You must toss those things away, one by one, and let go of them all, and you'll understand more and more that only that which is gained by relying on practicing the truth has value and accords with the standards of God's requirements for man. All that comes from man is worthless—useless in the end, no matter how much of it you learn. It's all cheap junk, trash; only the truth that God bestows on man is treasure and the life. It has eternal value. You're always upholding your own things, thinking, "It took me years of strenuous study to acquire my skills. My parents made such efforts on my behalf, and spent so much money, and paid such a price, in blood, sweat, and tears—how can I dissect and condemn that, just like that? This is a huge deal, a matter of life and death! What will I live by without those things?" How foolish you are. Live by those things, and you're bound for hell. You must live by God's words. Change up your way of living; let God's words in, and clean out those old things of yours. You must dissect and know them, open up and show them for all to see, so that the group can gain discernment. Without realizing it, you'll come to detest those things, to detest the things you once loved, to detest the things you once depended on to survive, to detest the things you once believed to be your life and to be the things you treasured most. That's the way to isolate and cut those things off from yourself completely, the way to true understanding of the truth, and onto the road of practicing the truth. Of course, this is a complicated and difficult process, and a painful one, as well. But it's a process that man must undergo. It won't do not to. Experiencing God's work is like being treated for an illness: If you have a tumor, the only way to handle it is on the operating table. If you don't get on that table and submit to the knife that dissects the tumor and takes it away, your disease will go uncured, and you won't get better.

Lots of people take honest people to be fools, thinking, "They follow whatever God says. He says to be an honest person, and they really do it; they speak the truth, without a single false word. They're fools, aren't they? You can be an honest person, but only insofar as it doesn't incur you any losses or damages. You can't just say everything! To tip your whole hand—that's foolishness, isn't it?" They think that being an honest person is foolishness. Is it? Such a person is the smartest of all, because they believe, "All God's words are the truth, and to be an honest person is the truth, so to gain God's approval, people should be honest. So, whatever God says, I do; as far as He'd have me go, that's how far I'll go. God requires me to submit, so I submit, and I'll keep on submitting forever. I don't care if someone says I'm foolish—God's approval is enough for me." Is such a person not the smartest of all? They've accurately seen what's important and what's not. There are some people with hidden agendas, who think, "To submit in all things would be foolish, wouldn't it? To do that is to lack autonomy, isn't it? Does someone have dignity if they don't even have themselves? Surely, we get a pass to maintain a bit of dignity for ourselves, no? We can't submit completely, can we?" And so, they practice submission in a drastically diminished way. Can that rise to the standards of practicing the truth? No—it falls way short of that! If you don't practice the truth according to the principles, always opting instead for ways of compromise that veer neither toward the truth nor toward Satan, but keep to the middle road, are you then practicing the truth? This is Satan's philosophy, the thing God loathes most. God detests this attitude of man's toward the truth; He detests that people are always doubtful about the truth and His words, that they're always mistrustful with His words, or are always adopting a discriminatory, contemptuous, impertinent attitude. As soon as man takes this attitude toward God, doubting Him, being mistrustful, questioning, analytic, and misunderstanding Him, always studying Him and trying to weigh Him with your mind, God will then be hidden from you. And can you still gain the truth, once God is hidden from you? "I can!" you say. "I read God's words every day, I'm at gatherings all the time, and I listen to sermons every week, and mull them over and take notes every day afterward. I sing hymns and pray, too. I think the Holy Spirit is at work in me." Will that work? Those ways of believing in God are fine, but they're not what's critical; what's critical is that you are the right kind of person, and that your heart is right—only then will God not hide His face from you. With God not hiding His face from you, but enlightening and guiding you at all times, and having you understand His will and the truth in all things, such that you ultimately gain the truth, you will be greatly blessed. But if your heart's not right, and you're always doubting God, being defensive against Him, putting Him to the test, and misunderstanding Him with your petty cleverness and opinions, or with your learning and satanic philosophies, then you're in trouble. Some people go beyond defensiveness, testing, doubting, and misunderstanding of God, to resistance against Him and rivalry with Him. They've become Satan; they're in worse trouble. You won't understand the truth just by understanding the literal meaning of its words and simple doctrine. Understanding the truth is no simple matter. Most people labor under this misapprehension, and they don't come around even after it's been emphasized to them again and again. They think, "Every day, I read God's words and listen to sermons and fellowship, and I perform my duty year after year. I'm like a seed in a field—even if you don't water or fertilize it, it'll slowly grow on its own with the rain, and bear fruit in the autumn." That's not how it works. It's the cooperative component of a person, their manner of cooperating, their heart, and their attitude toward the truth and God that are critical. These are what's vitally important. Do these things not also pertain to what a person lives by? (They do.) If you're always living by human preferences and satanic philosophies, always guarding yourself against God, and not taking His words as the truth, then God won't bother with you anymore. And what will you be able to gain then, when God doesn't bother with you? If the Lord of Creation ignores you, then you're no longer a being of His creation. If He regards you as the devil Satan, will you still be able to come before God then? Will you still be an object of His salvation? Will you still have a hope of being saved? That would be impossible. Therefore, it doesn't matter what your home life is like, or what sort of caliber you have, or how great your gifts are, nor does it matter what work you do in the church, what duty you perform, or what your role is. It doesn't matter what sort of transgressions you've made in the past, or what sort of state you're in currently, or the degree to which you've grown in life, or how great you are of stature. None of this is most important. What's most important is how your relationship with God is, whether you're constantly doubting and misunderstanding Him or always making studies of Him, whether your heart is set right. These things are critical. How can people know of these critical things? To do that, they must always examine themselves, not going around in confusion as unbelievers do, watching videos, playing, and fooling around when there's nothing to do. How will someone perform a duty if their heart can't come before God? If you don't make the effort to come before God, He won't make you, because God doesn't force people to do things. God expresses the truth so that people may understand and accept it. If people don't come back before God, how will they accept the truth? If people are always passive, if they don't look for God or need Him in their hearts, then how will the Holy Spirit work in them? So, given that you believe in God, isn't it critical that you should proactively seek Him and cooperate with Him? That's your job! If believing in God is just a sideline to you, an extracurricular hobby, you're in trouble! There are people who remain believers now and have listened to plenty of sermons, yet still think that to believe in God is to believe in religion, that it's a hobby for their spare time. How frivolously they regard faith in God! Even now, at this stage, they still hold this viewpoint. In their belief in God, they haven't just failed to establish a normal relationship with Him—they have no relationship with Him at all. If God doesn't acknowledge you as His follower, do you still have a hope of being saved? No, you don't. That's why it's important to establish a normal relationship with God! On what foundation, then, is that normal relationship established? That of people's cooperation. So, what sort of stance or point of view must people adopt? What should their state be? What sort of will must they have? How do you treat the truth at heart? With doubt? With study? With distrust? With rejection? Are you right at heart if you have these things? (No.) If you mean to be right at heart, what sort of attitude must you have? You must have a heart of submission. Whatever God says, whatever He requires, you must be intent on submitting to it, without doubts and without justifications. That's the right attitude. You must believe, accept, and submit, without any concessions. Is not making concessions immediately achievable? No—but you must try to enter it. Imagine if God were to say to you, "You're sick," and you said, "No, I'm not." That wouldn't be a problem; maybe you don't believe it. But then, God says, "You're quite ill. Take some medicine," and you say, "I'm not sick, but I might as well take some medicine, as You say. It won't hurt, either way, and if I am sick, it might be for the best. I'll take some." You take it, and you feel physically different from how you did; you keep taking it, in its assigned dosage, and after a while, you feel yourself getting better and better, physically. Then, you believe that the sickness God spoke of was indeed real. What result does this sort of practice yield? You're cured of your sickness, because you believed and submitted to God's words. Though the first time, you didn't take as much medicine as God told you to, but instead made a bit of a concession for yourself, and had a bit of distrust, and were a bit grudging and reluctant, you wound up taking medicine as God told you to in the end, and felt its benefits afterward. So, you went on taking it, and the more you took, the greater your faith grew, and you came increasingly to feel that God's words were right and you were wrong, and that you shouldn't doubt His words. And in the end, when you'd taken all the medicine that God required you to take, your health was restored. At that point, would your faith in God not grow ever more genuine? You'd know that God's words are right, that you should submit to Him without concession and practice His words without concession. What's the point of this example? Your sickness in it is meant to be man's corrupt disposition, and taking medicine represents accepting God's judgment and chastisement. Its main message is that if people can accept God's judgment and chastisement, their corruption may be cleansed, and they can attain salvation. This is what's achieved by experiencing God's work. Are you afraid of failing? You may say, "I have to aim for perfection. God said that I have to submit absolutely, without concession. So, I have to achieve absolute submission to His words the first time I practice them. If I can't achieve it this time, I'll wait for the next opportunity, and I simply won't practice submission this time." Is that a good way to be? (No.) From God's vantage, there's a process to people's practice of the truth. He gives people chances. When someone has a corrupt state, God will expose it and say, "You've made concessions, you're unsubmissive, you're rebellious." So, what is God's goal in exposing it? It's meant to have you make ever-fewer concessions, and practice submission more and more, and to make your apprehension ever purer and closer to the truth, so that you can truly submit to God. Did God punish you while He was exposing you? When He deals with and prunes you and puts you through trials, He's just disciplining and chastening you. You're a bit exposed, a bit reproached, and made to feel a bit of pain—but did God take your life from you? (No.) He didn't take your life, and He didn't hand you over to Satan. In that, His will may be seen. And what is His will? He would save you. Sometimes, after a bit of hardship, people grow reluctant and think, "God doesn't like me. There's no hope for me." You're in trouble if you're always misunderstanding God like that. It's such a delay of your growth in life. So, whatever the time may be, whether you're weak or strong, whether your state is good or poor, whatever the extent of your growth in life may be there's no need to concern yourself with those things now. Concern yourself only with practicing the words that God has said, even if you're only attempting to practice them. That's fine, too. Try hard to cooperate, and do what you're capable of; enter the state spoken of in God's words; see what it feels like for you to practice the truths God has expressed, and whether you have benefited from it, and whether you have life entry. You must learn to strive toward the truth. People don't understand the process of growing in life. They're always hoping to build Rome in a day, thinking, "If I can't achieve complete submission, I just won't submit. I'll only submit when I can do it completely. I won't be shameless about it. That shows how much grit I have, how much character and dignity!" What sort of "grit" is that? It's rebelliousness and intransigence!

Think well on what we've just fellowshiped. We've finished our fellowship on four sub-headers of the question, "What have people lived by in all their years of belief in God?" They rely on their gifts to live; on their knowledge; on their naked, childlike hearts;

and on Satan's philosophies. Do you understand what you've heard about these four states? Can you see what's there of them in you? Are you capable of comprehending this? Have we fellowshiped about these things before? It may be that you have a handle on some states and know a bit about them, but not in a way that pertains to practicing the truth or to the topic of our fellowship today. Today, we have fellowshiped about these states from the topic and angle of "What have people lived by in all their years of belief in God?" This comes a bit nearer to practicing the truth and living by it. I have another question. Make note of it. It is: What are the things you love most? What is God's attitude toward those things you love most? We'll take our time fellowshiping about this question in the future. Today, we've mainly been exposing several negative states that come of what things people live by; we didn't fellowship about how to practice the truth in specific reference to those negative states. Despite not having fellowshiped about that, do you know where the errors are in these states? Where do the problems stem from? What dispositions they're part of? How the truth should be practiced? When such things crop up, when you have such states and such methods, do you know how you should use the truth to supplant them? Which truths you should practice? The important, preliminary thing you should do now is to begin by getting a grasp on these states and analyzing yourself. When you live in these states, you should at least know in your heart that they're wrong. Reversing them is the step after knowing they're wrong. If you don't know whether they're right or wrong, nor where their errors are, how can you turn them around? So, the very first step is for you to be able to discern whether these states are right or wrong. Only after that can you know how the next step should be practiced. We've only been fellowshiping about the issue of a few of the various corrupt states in man today, and there's been so much to say. So, as for the specifics of how, exactly, you may come to live by the truth, give the issue some more consideration on your own. You should be able to produce results.

Only by Practicing the Truth and Obeying God Can One Achieve a Change in Disposition

The great majority of you have believed in God for at least ten years, more or less, so what stage in your life experience have you now arrived at? At what stage is your stature presently situated? (When I see myself constantly revealing a corrupt disposition, I make up my mind that I must not be one of God's people but only a service-doer; I then lose heart and become worried that I am unfit to receive salvation.) To grow fearful upon determining that one is a service-doer: this is a sign that your stature is childish and immature. To be childish of stature means to lack judgment, to lack the normal ability to weigh and consider problems, to lack an adult's thought processes, and always to be at the mercy of one's future prospects and fate. Would anyone else like to say a few words? (When, in fulfilling my duty, I deviate from my course, I always get worried, wondering whether God will lay me bare and cast me out.) Why are you afraid of being cast out? This thing that you take to be "casting out": what, in the final analysis, does it mean? (To come to no good end.) When you take "casting out" to mean not being allowed to fulfill your duty, or losing any chance you may have of salvation, is this—the thing that you have determined it to be—the same thing as the way in which God sees you and how He treats you? Those who are childish of stature will as a matter of course approach everything on the basis of human notions and imaginings, rather than according to the word of God or the truth. But those who have grown up and matured in life will approach everything in accordance with the word of God and the truth; examining an issue in this way is much more accurate. It is common, when fulfilling one's duty, to fall into deviations and difficulties; if one were to be cast out at the first error, no one would be able to fulfill their duty properly. You should understand that the whole thrust of fulfilling one's duty is so that one's corrupt disposition may be purified through the experience of God's judgment, so that one may in the act of fulfilling one's duty come to understand the truth and enter into the reality, and so that one may in the act of fulfilling one's duty escape the toils of Satan's influence and receive salvation. This is why God demands of people that, in the act of fulfilling their duty, they learn how to seek the truth in all things, and solve problems in accordance with God's word: This is a necessary progression in the experience of life. Under ordinary circumstances, no one individual is proficient at everything, nor does any one individual have all-encompassing skills, so it is well-nigh impossible to avoid error in fulfilling one's duty. But as long as this is not an intentional act of disturbance, it falls within the bounds of normal expectations. If, however, this comes about through human contrivance, if it is an evil consequence brought about by a deliberate misdeed, then there is something wrong with the humanity of the person concerned, and it would be a case of intentional disturbance and destruction. The wicked person would then be completely laid bare. God takes, in His own eyes, an accurate measure and assessment of people; that is, in using a person, in making them do something, God is certain to have standards that He requires this person to meet. God does not want you to be superhuman, to be omnipotent; rather, He makes demands of you, and renders you treatment, based on what lies within the capacity of ordinary people. According to the knowledge with which you are equipped, your caliber, the conditions in which you live, and all the insights you have gained, including what lies within your capacity given your present age and experience, God will set the most accurate and the most appropriate standard for your evaluation. What is God's standard of evaluation? It is to examine the intent, principles, and goals in your way of doing things, to see if they conform to the truth. Maybe what you do conforms to the standards set for you by other people, and you should get a perfect score for this; but how does

God evaluate you? The standard by which God measures you is whether you are capable of giving your whole heart, mind, and strength, whether you can arrive at the point where you can offer up your all, offer up your devotion. This is God's standard of evaluation. If you have already offered up your all, then God will see you as already having met the standard. The demands that God makes of people are all within their capacity to meet, and do not lie beyond their reach.

At times, God uses a certain matter to lay you bare or discipline you. Does this then mean that you have been cast out? Does it mean your end has come? No. It is like when a child has been disobedient and made a mistake; his parents might chide and punish him, but if he cannot fathom his parents' intention or understand why they are doing this, he will misunderstand their intent. For example, the parents may tell the child, "Don't leave the house alone, and don't go outside by yourself," but this goes in one ear and out the other, and the child sneaks out alone anyway. Once the parents find out, they give the child a scolding and, as punishment, make him stand in the corner to reflect on his behavior. Not understanding his parents' intentions, the child starts to have doubts: "Do my parents not want me anymore? Am I really theirs? If I'm not really theirs, would that mean I was adopted?" These are the things he ponders. What are the parents' actual intentions? The parents said it was too dangerous to do that and told their child not to. But the child did not listen, and it went in one ear and out the other. Therefore, the parents needed to use some form of punishment to properly educate their child and make him learn from his mistakes. What is it that the parents want to achieve by doing this? Is it only to make the child learn from his mistakes? This kind of learning is not what they ultimately want to achieve. The parents' aim in doing this is to make the child do as he is told, behave in accordance with their advice, and not do anything disobedient to make them worry—this would be the desired effect. If the child listens to his parents, it shows that he has matured in understanding, and then his parents will have less on their minds. Will they not then be satisfied with him? Will they still need to punish him like that? They will not need to anymore. Believing in God is just like this. People must learn to heed God's words and understand His heart. They must not misunderstand God. In fact, in many cases, people's concern stems from their own self-interest. Speaking generally, it is the fear that they will have no outcome. They're always thinking, "What if God lays me bare, casts me out, and rejects me?" This is your misinterpretation of God; these are only your one-sided conjectures. You have to figure out what God's intention is. When He lays people bare, it is not for the sake of casting them out. People are laid bare in order to expose their shortcomings, mistakes, and their nature essences, to make them know themselves and become capable of true repentance; for this reason, laying people bare is in order to help their lives to grow. Without a pure understanding, people are apt to misinterpret God and become negative and weak. They may even give in to despair. In fact, being laid bare by God doesn't necessarily mean that you will be cast out. It is to help you get to know your own corruption, and to make you repent. Oftentimes, because people are rebellious, and do not seek to find resolution in the truth when their corruption is exposed, God must exercise discipline. And so, sometimes, He lays people bare, exposing their ugliness and pitifulness, getting them to know themselves, which helps their life to grow. Laying people bare has two different implications: For the wicked, being laid bare means they are cast out. For those who are able to accept the truth, it is a reminder and a warning; they are made to reflect on themselves, to see their true state, and to stop being wayward and reckless, because to carry on like this would be dangerous. Laying people bare in this way is to remind them lest, in performing their duty, they grow muddleheaded and careless, fail to take things seriously, become satisfied with only a few results, and think they have performed their duty to an acceptable standard when, in fact, measured by God's demands, they have fallen far short, and yet they are still complacent and believe themselves to be doing fine. In such circumstances, God will discipline, caution, and remind people. Sometimes, God lays bare their ugliness—which is patently to serve as a reminder. At such times you should reflect on yourself: Performing your duty like this is inadequate, there is rebelliousness within you, there are too many negative elements, everything you do is perfunctory, and if you still do not repent, by rights you should be punished. Now and then, when God disciplines you, or lays you bare, this does not necessarily mean you will be cast out. This matter should be approached correctly. Even if you are cast out, you should accept it and submit to it, and make haste to reflect and repent. To sum up, whatever meaning lies behind laying you bare, you must learn to submit. If you show passive resistance, and instead of mending your flaws keep on going from bad to worse, you will surely be punished. Therefore, in dealing with matters of being laid bare, one must show obedience, one's heart must become imbued with fear, and one must become capable of repentance: Only then does one conform to God's will, and only by practicing in this way can one save oneself and be spared God's punishment. Rational people should then be able to recognize their own faults and correct them, at the very least attaining to the point where they rely on their conscience to fulfill their duty. In addition, they must also reach up toward the truth, attaining not only to the point where their behavior is principled, but also to the point of giving their whole heart, their whole soul, their whole mind, their whole strength: Only doing it thus is an acceptable way of fulfilling their duty, only doing it thus makes them people who truly submit to God. What should one take as the standard for satisfying God's will? One must base one's actions on the truth principles, the major aspect of which is to place emphasis on the interests of God's house and on the work of God's house, to keep the whole picture in mind, and not focus on any one aspect at the risk of losing sight of another, and the minor aspect of which is to get one's own work done properly, and to achieve the desired effect according to what is demanded of one, without going through the motions in a perfunctory manner, without bringing shame on God. If people master these principles, will they not let go of their worries and misconceptions? Once you put aside your worries and misconceptions, and no longer have any unreasonable ideas about God, negative elements will slowly cease to hold a dominant position within you, and you will approach these sorts of matters in the correct manner. Thus, it is important to seek the truth and strive to understand God's will.

When performing their duty, some are often in a state of negativity and passivity, or resistance and misunderstanding. They are perpetually afraid of being exposed and cast out, and perpetually constrained by their future and destiny. Is this not the expression of a small stature? (Yes.) Some people always say they are afraid they will not perform their duty well, and without analyzing the details one might even take them to be quite loyal. What are they really worried about in their hearts? They worry that if they do not do their duty well, they will be cast out and have no good destination. Some people say they are afraid to become service-doers. When others hear this, they take it to mean that, in not wanting to become service-doers, these people just want to perform their duty well as one of God's people, and mistake them for people with resolve. Actually, in their hearts, those people who are afraid to become service-doers are thinking, "If I become a service-doer, in the end I will still perish and have no good destination, and will not have a share in the kingdom of heaven." This is the implication of their words; they are worried about their outcome and final destination. If God says they are servicedoers, they put somewhat less effort into performing their duty. If God says they are one of His people and they have been praised by God, they devote somewhat more effort to doing their duty. What is the problem here? The problem is that when performing their duty in the house of God, they do not act according to the truth principle. They always consider their own prospects and fate, and are always constrained by the designation "service-doer." As a result, they cannot do their duty well, and even though they want to practice the truth, they lack the strength to do so. They always live in a state of negativity, and look for the meaning behind God's words, trying to ascertain whether they are people of God or service-doers. If they are people of God, then they will bend themselves to perform their duty well. If they are service-doers, then in performing their duty they will be careless and perfunctory, giving rise to many negative elements, and be constrained by the title of "service-doer," unable to free themselves. Sometimes, after being harshly dealt with, they say to themselves, "There's no hope for me, this is just how I am. I'll just do what I can." And with passive, negative, and degenerate thoughts, they resist it and go about performing their duty with reluctance. Can they possibly perform their duty well? At gatherings, such a person is constantly fellowshiping about the truth and talking about loving God, submitting to God, relying on God's word to live life, and devoting himself to God, and yet he is nevertheless unable to put any of these things into practice, but instead is mindful only of his own future prospects and fate, perpetually under the sway of his greed for blessings, incapable of accepting any aspect of the truth. In this way, he is resistant and oppositional, negative and full of grievance, in his heart always harboring notions about God, putting up barriers against God, and keeping God at a distance. He is always on his guard against God, fearful lest God see through him, take control of him, and act against his interests. And, in following, he is always reluctant and begrudging, with people dragging him along from the front, and people pushing him forward from behind, as though he has fallen into a mire and every single step is so much hardship, and being alive is so much suffering! How did things get this way? It became like this because the human heart is too guileful, it always misunderstands the work that God does to save humanity. Whatever treatment God renders unto them, people will always be doubtful, thinking, "Does this mean that God doesn't want me anymore? Is God going to save me in the end or not? For someone like me, is there any point in carrying on with my pursuit? Can I get into the kingdom?" When people are constantly harboring negative and contrary thoughts like these, will this not affect their ability to fulfill their duty? Will this not also affect their pursuit of the truth? Unless all these negative elements are disposed of, when will they ever be able to enter upon the right track of believing in God? That is hard to say. And so, people who refuse to accept the truth are the most difficult to handle, and in the end the only thing that can be done with them is to cast them out.

Amongst corrupt humanity, certain contrary elements have become deeply entrenched in their hearts, for example, such things as face, vanity, status, fame and fortune, and so forth. When you believe in God, if you wish to accept the truth, it means doing ceaseless battle with these contrary elements, and grappling with all manner of arduous experience and struggle. Not until the truth, triumphant within people, becomes life, will this battle come to an end. During this period, when people have come to understand the truth through eating and drinking God's word and gained a grasp on God's will, they will begin to practice truth and forsake the flesh. By the time that truth becomes their life, it will become possible for them to use truth to dispose of these negative and contrary elements. Vanity and personal prestige, fame, fortune, and status, human appetites, impure human intents, people's misunderstanding of God, their choices and preferences, their self-righteousness, arrogance, deceitfulness, and what have you—all these problems will gradually find a solution after people come to understand the truth. The process of coming to believe in God is, in fact, none other than the process of accepting the truth, the process of using the truth to overcome the flesh, and the process of ceaselessly eating and drinking God's word, seeking the truth, and using the truth that you have come to understand, the word of God that you have come to know, and the truth principles that you have come to grasp in order to solve these problems. To have life entry is to have undergone these experiences, and in doing so people will gradually become transformed. These corrupt elements are present in everyone, and there is not a single individual who does not live for the sake of profit and fame. Human beings all live for these things; only the way in which each person handles them and expresses a desire for them may be different. But what they reveal is, in essence, the same. Some people talk out loud, others will not; some reveal themselves in an obvious way, while others attempt to hide, using all sorts of methods to cover things up and keep them from getting out into the open, so that others will not see through them. Not letting other people see through you, and covering things up—do you think that, by doing this, you will keep God from finding out? Do you think that if you do this your corrupt disposition will be no more? Every single individual's corrupt essence is the same—what is different between one individual and another? The attitude with which one approaches the truth may differ from one individual to the next. Some people, as soon as they have finished hearing the truth, are able to accept it. They take it as they would swallow medicine that is bitter in the mouth but good for healing, using it to treat the illnesses and solve the problems that afflict them from within. In managing affairs, conducting themselves, fulfilling their duty, interacting with others, and setting their aim and orientation in life, they seek answers in the word of God and use the word of God to solve the problems they encounter in life, practicing what they come to understand, bit by bit. For example, when God says, "You must all strive to become honest people," such an individual will ponder, "How do I become an honest person?" God demands that people become honest; they must speak honest words, open up their hearts to fellowship with their brothers and sisters, and accept God's scrutiny. These are the principles involved, and such a person will put them into practice as soon as he has heard them. Naturally, there will be times during the period of his practice when he might veer to the left or to the right, failing to find the right principles no matter how hard he looks, and there will be times when, in practicing, he will make silly mistakes. But in ceaselessly striving to meet this standard of becoming an honest person, he will in a few years come closer and closer to the desired effect. The more he lives, the more human he becomes and the more he feels himself to be in the presence of God, and the better his progress in life. Such are the people who are blessed by God. Such are the people of the first type.

Now that we have finished discussing people of the first type, let us go on to talk about the second. Although both types listen to sermons and read the word of God, a person of the first type is able to grasp the truth, and when their corrupt disposition is laid bare, they are able to reflect on themselves and open themselves up, saying, "I am arrogant and self-righteous. I like to show off in doing things, always harboring my own intents and appetites, taking pleasure in status and deriving enjoyment from jockeying for fame and profit." So saying, they become capable of self-knowledge and of reaching up toward the truth. It is different, however, for the second type. Such a person may admit that he is corrupt within himself and, when faced with being pruned and dealt with, may even be able to admit that he has done wrong, but he simply will not reform. However much he listens to sermons, and however many words and doctrines he grasps, he just refuses to put the truth into practice, and keeps on doing as he feels he ought. Such a person is likewise able to open up to fellowship, and to accept being dealt with and pruned, as well as God's discipline. But having accepted it, he takes it as doctrine, he's all done as soon as he's grasped it, and afterward returns to his old ways, remaining unchanged. To take the truth and treat it as if it were doctrine—what will the consequences be for such a person? Most certainly he will mistake observing the rules for practicing the truth. Such a person does not fulfill his duty according to God's word or God's demands, but rather attempts to solve problems according to Satan's philosophy of dealing with the world and such ways and means as he has summarized for himself. For all that he may pay lip service to acknowledging God's word to be truth and Satan's philosophy to be fallacy, he still practices satanic fallacy in real life, and even feels peace of mind in doing so. One who acknowledges God's word to be truth and yet fails to put it into practice—is this not someone who deceives God? For all that he may acknowledge God's word to be truth and Satan's philosophy to be fallacy, he senses that Satan's philosophy could also come in handy, and so he adopts a method of compromise, choosing to walk the middle line between the two, and regards this to be practicing the truth. To stand neither on God's side nor on Satan's, thereby offending neither, he even finds himself mighty clever, thinking, "I am one who fulfills his duty, and also one who pursues the truth, so I will most definitely be able to receive God's approval." You tell Me, is this kind of person someone who practices the truth? (No.) He earnestly listens to the word of God, earnestly noting it down and memorizing it, and even spends time mulling it over, but what does he actually do with the word of God? What is his purpose in listening to God's word? (He takes it to explicate for others, for the sake of showing himself off.) That's one aspect. Anything more? (He takes it as rules to be observed.) Sometimes he takes it as rules to be observed, but what else? There are many situations here. Some people make the word of God into rules to be observed, following the literal meaning of God's words and that's all. For instance, when everyone fellowships about how to be an honest person, he fellowships along with them. And when someone else says, "Where is your actual experience of being an honest person?" he will say, "Ah, let me take a look at my notebook." If he had any experience at all, wouldn't he simply come out with it? If it is indeed his own experience, why would he need to read from a script? This completely exposes him as having no reality whatsoever. And then there are some people who, when they finish listening to the sermons, believe that they have understood them, and who, if they can quote a few lines of doctrine, believe that they have understood the truth: Isn't this a mistaken way of thinking? Such a person says, "I am able to receive the truth, I have spiritual understanding, I can understand every aspect of God's word and every aspect of what I have heard about the sermons, and this means that I possess the truth reality." He is blind to the fact that God's word is the truth, that it is what makes the life of a person, that not only does the truth need to be put into practice, but it should also be applied to solving every problem and difficulty that arises within a person. Because such a person is incapable of accepting the truth, whenever he rebels against God he always tries to make a plausible case for his behavior. Unaware that this is rebelling against God, it becomes impossible for him to seek the truth in order to solve this problem of his own rebelliousness. In that case, how do people of this type find a solution to their difficulties, do you know? For a person who does not take the word of God as the truth principle, once he has finished listening to God's word, he will ponder as follows: "Am I indeed being rebellious? This is quite excusable under the circumstances. Anyone would think the same way, this is just a way of thinking, and doesn't count as rebellion. It will be fine if I don't think this way next time, I'll be nice and obedient!" Then, he continues mulling it over, "If I can be obedient, this means I am still someone who loves God, someone God delights in." And so, in this way, he lets himself off. He does not analyze why he is capable of rebelling against God or the source of his rebellion, he seeks no more to know himself in regard to this matter, and however much rebellion he harbors, he does not reflect on himself—this is someone who does not pursue the truth. Because such a person does not regard truth as life, no matter what he does, and no matter what rebellion or corruption he reveals, he makes no attempt to match up to or find a correlation with the truth and learn a lesson. This is enough to confirm that he does not love the truth and that he is not one who pursues the truth. Confronted with an issue, he never examines himself, never reaches up toward the truth, never tries to find a correlation with the truth—is he not the same as an unbeliever? However many years he has been a believer, he has not had the slightest life entry, and all he does is keep observing the rules and try to do fewer evil deeds: How can this be called practicing the truth? How can this manner of believing in God win His approval? A good many people profess belief in God for upward of ten or twenty years and can cite a whole bunch of words and doctrines. Hearing them, someone who has just started believing would be mighty impressed, and yet they do not have a single jot of the truth reality, nor are they able to share any genuine experiential testimony. How has this come about? Not having a jot of genuine experiential testimony becomes a problem. It means not having a jot of life entry! When others fellowship with him about the truth, such a person will say, "Save it; I understand everything, and I have grasped all doctrines." What is his basis for saying this? And what is wrong with his saying this? Why is it that, when he listens to sermons and reads the word of God, he can only grasp doctrine and not the truth? He knows how to talk about doctrine but not how to experience God's word, with the result that, however many years he has been a believer, he is unable to solve a single problem. How has this come about? (He does not accept the truth.) That's it. It's because he does not accept the truth. As in the case of a doctor who regularly treats his patients' illnesses, writing them prescriptions and performing surgeries on them; he may understand every single aspect of the doctrine behind medical practice, and yet when he himself is diagnosed with cancer, he will say, "No one will be able to cure my illness." When someone says to him, "You must get chemotherapy, you must have an operation!" he will reply, "You don't need to tell me this, I know all about it." But if, knowing all about it, he takes no steps to cure his own illness, would he be able to recover from it? Being a doctor won't do him any good. One who understands every aspect of doctrine, and yet simply will not put it into practice—this is the second type of person. To all outward appearances, a person of this type seems to accept being pruned and dealt with, to listen to sermons and participate in gatherings on a regular basis, and to be enthusiastic about doing work, fulfilling duty, enduring hardships, and expending himself. But there is one point on which such a person falls short, and it is a failing of the deadliest nature: He never takes what he hears of the sermons or the word of God as the truth to be put into practice. This means he does not accept the truth. What is the essential problem with a person who does not accept the truth? (He does not love the truth.) For someone who does not love the truth, what is his perspective, what is his attitude, toward God? Why does such a person not love the truth? The main reason is that he does not regard the truth as truth. Seen from his perspective, the truth is just good doctrine. Does this type of person know how to discern Satan's heresies and fallacies in all their multifarious shapes? Decidedly not, because Satan's heresies and fallacies all appear to humans to be good doctrine. Even an evil person, in committing evil deeds, looks for fine-sounding reasons to pull the wool over other people's eyes, so that they will back him up, approve of him, and see him as being in the right. If one who believes in God sees the truth as good doctrine, that would be simply too absurd. Not only does this type of person lack the comprehension ability, it is also easy for him to be misled by others and to serve as a tool of Satan. This is why I say: Whosoever lacks the ability to comprehend the truth, he is a person without spiritual understanding. He thinks that to understand the truth means to understand doctrine, and as long as one knows how to spout doctrines, it means that one has understood the truth. This type of person will most decidedly not know how to put the truth into practice, nor will he be able to grasp what is meant by principle. All he can do is take a shot at observing the rules according to his own understanding of doctrine. Having believed in God for a good many years, and having come to understand a good bit of doctrine, he will observe a few more rules and do a few more good deeds, or he may make a bit of sacrifice, enduring many hardships without complaint. These things he considers to be practicing God's word, to be practicing the truth. In fact, no matter how much one appears to obey the rules on the outside, and no matter how much one suffers and how much of a price one pays without complaining, none of this means that one is practicing the truth, let alone submitting to God.

When all is said and done, what is the standard for practicing the truth? How does one measure whether you are practicing the truth or not? When all is said and done, are you one who listens to and accepts the word of God—how does God look at this? God looks at the following: While professing belief in God and listening to sermons, have you taken your incorrect inner state, your rebellion against God, and all the different forms of your corrupt disposition, and replaced them with the truth? Have you changed? Have you only changed in your outward behavior and actions, or has your life disposition undergone a change? God measures you on the basis of these considerations. Having listened to sermons for so many years, and eaten and drunk of God's word for so many years, are the changes within you superficial or are they of a fundamental nature? Have you changed in your disposition? Has your rebelliousness against God lessened? When confronted with an issue and your rebelliousness is exposed, are you capable of selfreflection? Are you capable of showing submission to God? Has your attitude toward your duty and the commission God has entrusted to you undergone any change? Has your loyalty grown? Do you still have impurities within you? The intents, ambitions, appetites, and plans that you harbor as an individual—have these things been cleansed away during the period you have been listening to sermons? All these are standards of evaluation. In addition to the above, how many of your notions and misconceptions about God have been eliminated? Are you still holding onto those vague notions, imaginings, and conclusions from before? Do you still harbor grievance, resistance, or negative emotions toward trials and refinements? If these negative elements have still not been truly addressed, and if you have still not undergone any real change, this goes to corroborate one fact—that you are not a person who practices the truth. In the same way, when a seed, after being sown in the ground, is watered and fertilized and yet fails to germinate after many days, this proves that the seed has no life. For instance, there are some people who believe in God because, previously, they were always being bullied, ostracized, and disdained, and they now believe in God so that in future they can hold their heads high. Having professed belief for a time, such a person continues to harbor this intent while fulfilling his duty and expending himself, and he keeps putting more and more energy into expending himself, until eventually he becomes a leader in the church, and then he feels that he can hold his head high. Inwardly, his intent still unresolved, he ponders: "If I were to become an even bigger leader, wouldn't that allow me to hold my head even higher? Believing in God is the way to go!" His coming to the house of God was all for the sake of gaining status so he could hold his head high, and this intent remains unresolved throughout. He has done work for so many years, listened to sermons for so many years, and eaten and drunk of God's word for so many years, and yet failed to address this one problem. Isn't his believing in God this way neglecting his proper tasks? One listens to sermons and reads the word of God for the sake of gaining the truth, of gaining life, but he has professed belief for so many years without gaining any aspect of the truth or life. This is a problem worthy of contemplation. Some people, though they may not know how to fellowship about the truth or bear witness to God, nevertheless do have some real experience. When faced with being pruned and dealt with, they are capable of self-reflection, and they can moreover accept the truth, afterward genuinely making changes to reform themselves. This proves that these people have real faith. No matter how much suffering and misfortune are visited on them, they do not shrink back, but their God-loving heart grows ever more real. In managing affairs, they are now guided by principle, the corruption they reveal has lessened a good deal, and they have a stronger sense of responsibility when fulfilling their duty. Can you say, of this kind of person, that he does not understand the truth? Seen from the perspective of the changes in him, this person is assuredly living out the reality of the truth. Only in doing so has he imbibed God's word down into his heart's core. Though he may not have the gift of gab, he does know how to practice the truth, and is moreover guided by principles in his handling of affairs, doing his best to accomplish concrete goals and enduring all manner of hardship without a word of complaint. This is proof that God's word is working within him, achieving its effect, and starting to become his life.

Just now we were talking about two types of people. The first type of person's behavior is simple: Upon hearing God's word, he is able to put it into practice. The second type, after listening to God's word a great deal, does not entirely fail to put it into practice. In his own mind, he imagines himself to be practicing it, because he has forsaken his family and occupation and offered up his all. There are even some who give their whole lives to God, choosing the path of celibacy, rejecting the pursuit of wealth, and offering up everything, but their inner state never changes. Their grievances, misunderstandings, notions, and assumptions toward God, as well as their arrogant disposition, despotic and arbitrary conduct—all of these remain forever unchanged, and they go on living by Satan's philosophy, with little difference from an unbeliever. This type of person only pays lip service to believing in God, and is only slightly better than unbelievers in that they don't commit acts of great evil. On the outside, such a person appears to be good. Yet he does not pursue the truth, and however much he listens to sermons, he makes no change in his life disposition. What does this type of person make of God's word? He takes it as good doctrine. He regards God's word as the truth, but what he regards to be the truth is in fact doctrine—something of a doctrinal nature, something that's not too bad. He can observe a few rules, but his life disposition doesn't change a bit. These are the people of the second type.

Next I will go on to talk about the third type of people—nonbelievers. Nonbelievers are always skeptical about God. This kind of person, having listened to God's words, acknowledges inwardly: "This sermon is right, these are the words spoken by the incarnate God. This church is predominantly filled with good people. It's a good place, where people are neither oppressed nor abused, where they shed no tears and suffer no pain; it's a veritable comfortable nest, a refuge. These people come from all over, from different countries and places, are kind and caring, able to open up their hearts in fellowship, and get along one with another in great harmony—they're all good people. The sermons being given by the Above are good and filled with positive energy, and the words of God are all truth and positive things. Listening to these sermons nourishes and benefits the spirit. People live in the presence of God, experiencing comfort, joy, and happiness; there's a sense of living in an earthly paradise. It would be even better if one could become a talented individual and make contributions in the house of God." They take the words of God and the content of sermons as the positive theories, teachings, and good doctrines of famous figures and great people—but do they put them into practice? (No.) Why don't they? It is because practicing these truths involves a certain level of difficulty; they would have to suffer hardship and pay a price! They think it's fine to simply know how to speak these words, and that there's no need to put them into practice, that one doesn't have to take believing in God so seriously—just as, in religion, belief in God is merely a hobby, where it's okay if you just exert a little effort and attend gatherings. They cannot completely and genuinely accept God's words, and they even entertain notions about them. For example, when God says that to be an honest person means calling a spade a spade and never lying, they just don't get it, thinking: "Doesn't everyone lie? Being open with everyone, being unguarded, submitting wholly to God isn't that foolish?" They think acting that way is foolish, that one cannot conduct oneself like this. They acknowledge that the word of God is the truth, but asking them to practice according to God's words is futile with them. Thus, such people treat the word of God with a halfhearted attitude, only acknowledging that all God's words are correct and the truth, but refusing to accept and practice them. When the house of God needs people to exert some effort, they are willing to do this, but what is their aim in doing so? It is for the sake of gaining blessings and enjoying more of God's grace; and if they did get a chance to enter the kingdom of heaven, that would be an even greater stroke of luck. These are the kinds of expectations they have; such is their conviction. But what about their attitude toward the truth and the word of God? To them, God's word and the truth are optional and dispensable, something to be scrutinized in their spare time as a way of amusing themselves and whiling away their leisure hours; they simply don't regard God's word as the truth or life. What kind of person is this? They are a nonbeliever. Nonbelievers refuse to acknowledge that the truth can purify and save people, and don't understand what the truth and life are all about. As far as matters of believing in God and receiving salvation, as well as how to resolve people's sinful nature, they have only a vague understanding and are not interested. They say: "People don't live in a vacuum, as long as we're alive we have to eat; we're not much different from animals, really. We humans are simply higher animals, existing solely for the sake of our survival." As for the truth, they are disinterested, and so regardless of how many years they have believed in God or how many sermons they have heard, they still cannot clearly say whether God's word is the truth, whether believing in God can grant salvation, or what mankind's future end and destination will be. If they're unclear on these matters, how severe must their confusion be! They show no interest in how God works to save people, nor in how people receive salvation by accepting God's judgment and chastisement, nor in how people can achieve submission to God by entering the truth reality. In more detailed terms, they show no interest in how to be an honest person, how to fulfill their duty, and other such matters. Especially when others mention that people must have absolute submission to God, they feel even more repelled, thinking: "If people always submit to God, then what is the point of having a brain? People become slaves if they're always submitting to God." This is where the views of nonbelievers start to reveal themselves. They believe that submitting to God is a superfluous act, an act of self-abasement, a loss of dignity, that God should not make such demands of people and that people should not accept them. Certain sermons, such as those that discuss enabling people to obtain grace, do good deeds, and have good conduct, they can reluctantly accept, but with respect to Peter's being perfected by accepting hundreds of trials, they just can't wrap their heads around it. They think, "Isn't that toying with and tormenting people? It's true that God is sovereign over all things, but even so He can't treat people like that!" They do not accept God's work as the truth; they view this method by which God saves people as the way a slave master treats his slaves, doing as he pleases with them—this is the correlation they draw. Can this kind of person understand the truth? (No.) Are there such people in the church? (Yes.) Will a person like this leave the church on their own? (No.) Why won't they leave? Because they're hoping for a lucky break, thinking, "It's a dark and wicked world out there; it's not easy getting by. What's the difference where I kill my time? I might as well do it in the church. Here I can even enjoy God's grace, and I won't lose much on this deal. There's plenty to eat and drink, and the people here are pretty decent—no one's going to bully me. What's more, when you fulfill your duty and expend yourself and pay a price, you'll even get blessings from God. This is a deal I can't lose out on!" And so, after thinking it over, they conclude that it would be worth it to stay in the church. If one day it no longer seems worthwhile and they don't feel there's any more to get out of it, they will lose interest in believing in God and want to leave the church. "At any rate," they think, "I didn't suffer much of a loss, nor did I commit all my heart and mind. I possess skills, I know my profession, and I have a diploma, so I can still get by in the world just as I had been doing; I could scrape together a fortune or finagle a government job for myself. That would be great!" This is how they view things. In the eyes of this type of person, the words spoken by God and the truths expressed by God have even less value than a presidential speech; such is the contempt with which they regard God's words. When people of this kind bring such views to believing in God and to rendering service "with ready willingness," taking up residence and even killing time in God's house, unwilling to leave—what is their aim in doing this? It is with this faint hope in mind: "If God shows tolerance and takes mercy on me, allowing me into the kingdom, my ideals will have been realized. But if I can't enter the kingdom, I'll still have enjoyed a goodly amount of God's grace, so I won't have lost out." When they bring this kind of wait-andsee viewpoint to believing in God, can they accept the truth? Can they put the truth into practice? Can they worship God as the Creator? (No, they cannot.) With such a view, which states arise within them? They will often complain about God and misunderstand Him. They will subject each of God's acts to a round of assessment, investigation, and scrutiny, and then arrive at the following conclusion: "This doesn't seem like something God has done. If only this weren't something God has done." They harbor resistance, scrutiny, judgment, and a wait-and-see attitude in their hearts—can this be called rebelliousness? (Yes.) Theirs is no longer the corruption and rebelliousness of a normal person. What kind of people are these? (Nonbelievers.) How do nonbelievers behave? They are hostile toward God. When people who believe in God reveal a corrupt disposition, and sometimes fail to obey, God says that this is rebellious disposition, that they have a rebellious essence. But what does He say about those who don't believe? And what about Satan—would God say Satan is rebellious? (No.) What would God say then? God would say that it is the enemy, His antithesis, and completely inimical to Him. Nonbelievers' attitude toward God is one of scrutiny and observant hesitation, as well as resistance, grievance, opposition, and enmity. The more you fellowship about the truth and submitting to God, the more fed up such a person will become. The more you fellowship about how to attain salvation and become perfected by accepting God's chastisement and judgment and being dealt with and pruned, the more fed up they become, refusing to take any of it in. As soon as they hear fellowship on these matters, they start fidgeting in their seats, becoming as jittery and restless as if they'd sat on a pincushion, or like an ant on a hotplate. But if you let them go to a dance club or a bar, they wouldn't be at all irritated; they'd be delighted. They'd feel that staying in such places is carefree and joyful—if they could live like that, it would be totally worth it. It's constantly hearing the truth that irritates them, so they refuse to listen. Can they accept the truth if they're not even willing to listen to it? Absolutely not. They carry around negative, resistant, and hateful states inside them, and they are always scrutinizing and watching hesitantly. What is it they scrutinize? It is always God's words that they scrutinize. This is no longer a matter of being small of stature; they are a nonbeliever and an evildoer. This type of person will, from start to finish, always stand in opposition to God, engaging in scrutiny, observant hesitation, and resistance, not accepting the truth at all, thinking: "Whoever sincerely expends themselves for God is a fool. Whoever pursues the truth and practices the truth is a fool. You cast aside your family, do not look after your own kin, and focus solely on believing in God; after all that believing, you just end up destitute and looked down upon. Look at how fashionable the unbelievers are, and what are you wearing? I'm not as foolish as the rest of you—I have to keep a card or two up my sleeve. I'll pursue fleshly pleasure first—that's being realistic." This is the nonbeliever's true colors. When God first appeared and started doing His work, His followers were very few—around ten thousand people at most—and there were only around a thousand who performed their duty. Later, as the work of the gospel began expanding, and this work began to show results, the number of people performing duty gradually increased. Some people, seeing the opportunity to stand out and put their talent on display, also joined in and started performing duty. "How odd!" I said, "The work of God's house has already begun to unfold; how is it that there are now so many more people performing their duty? Where have these people been hiding all these years?" In fact, these folks had things figured out long ago: "If the work of God's house becomes widespread, then I'll come. If it doesn't get off the ground, I won't come. I certainly won't contribute any effort for it!" What kind of people are these? They are opportunists. All opportunists are nonbelievers—they're just getting in on the excitement. Outwardly, it appears as if people are the ones doing the work of God's house, but in actuality God is leading and guiding everything; it is the Holy Spirit that is at work. This is certain beyond all doubt. God Himself is doing His own work; His will goes forward unimpeded. No human could accomplish such monumental work, it exceeds human capability. All of this is the result of the authority of God's word and God's own authority. People cannot grasp this point; they think: "When God's house grows in power, I'll have my share. So don't forget to record my name in the book of merit!" What kind of person is this? In the words of unbelievers, they have "malicious intent"—can we say this of them? (Yes.) What sinister motives these people harbor! Of course, if one can accept the truth, at the outset, they may have such motives and views, or their faith may be too small—God will not remember them. In revealing these views and attitudes, God wishes only to make people walk the right path in life, to set them on the right track of believing in God without hesitantly observing and without scrutinizing. God is not something that you can figure out through scrutiny or detect with a telescope. God's existence and His work of salvation are not results that you can derive using any form of research. These are the facts. Regardless of whether anyone acknowledges Him, believes in Him, or follows Him, the fact that God performs such great work is right there for them to see and touch. What God wishes to accomplish, no one can hinder and no one can change, nor can any power whatsoever obstruct. This is a fact that God has made true.

We were just talking about the third type of people—nonbelievers. This type of person believes in God with observant hesitation, by being opportunistic and scrutinizing. If there isn't any hope of receiving blessings, they'll think it best to scram and prepare an exit strategy for themselves. If such a person were to start self-reflecting right now and feel some remorse, it wouldn't be too late for them. There would always be a glimmer of hope for them up until their death; but if they obstinately refuse to repent and continue being hesitantly watchful, always opposing God, then God will surely treat them like an unbeliever and leave them to their own devices in the midst of calamity. In terms of people's essence, a human being is originally no more than a handful of dust into which God breathes, thus turning you into a living flesh-and-blood person, giving you life. Your life comes from God. When God wasn't using you, He provided you with food and clothing and everything else. But when He does intend to use you, you make a run for it and constantly go against God, always in opposition to Him—can God still make use of you? By rights, God should put you aside. Whether it was during the creation of the world at the beginning, or in the Age of Law or the Age of Grace, or all the way down to the last days in the present age, God has spoken many words to people. Be it through inspiration or direct face-to-face communication, one could say God has spoken too many words to count. And what is God's purpose in speaking so many words? It is to get people to understand and comprehend God's meaning, to know God's will, and to know that after gaining these words people will be able to achieve a change in their disposition, receive salvation, and gain life. Then, people can accept these words. God's purpose in speaking so many words is none other than this. And, having accepted these words and accepted the various methods of God's work, what is the result that people will ultimately achieve? They will become able to follow God all the way to the end and avoid being cast out and rejected halfway, and thus there is hope of remaining until the end. Regardless of whether God disciplines you, prunes you, or exposes you, or whether there are times when He forsakes you or tests you—no matter what God does, people cannot deny the fact of God's intentions and earnest efforts in saying these words, right? (Right.) Thus, people shouldn't quibble with God over trifling matters, always judging God's noble intentions with their petty yardsticks and misunderstanding God. Regardless of what wrong views you used to espouse, regardless of what the state within you may be, as long as you are able to accept God's words as your life, and take them as the principles that you practice and as the direction and goal of the path you walk, you will gradually be able to satisfy God's demands step by step. What's worrisome? What's worrisome is when people listen to and treat God's words as if they were doctrines, rules, mere phrases, and slogans, or even treat the word of God as an object of scrutiny, and treat God as a target of their scrutiny and resistance—this is problematic. Such people are not the recipients of God's salvation, God has no means to save them. It is not that God doesn't save them, but that they do not accept His salvation—that is all that can be said, and it is a fact.

What is the most important thing that will enable a person to follow God to the very end and achieve a change of disposition? Accepting and practicing the truth—this is what is most important, and it is the most crucial aspect of practice in the pursuit of truth. To practice and to experience God's words is the most important aspect of practice; it is directly related to a person's life entry. A person that sincerely believes in God, no matter what issues they are faced with, must learn to seek and practice the truth in any situation. Only this is to experience God's work, and a few years of this kind of experience will enable a person to understand the truth and enter into reality. Therefore, no matter when, one cannot forget this matter of practicing and experiencing God's words. Faced with an issue, you must always ponder internally: "What must I do to practice and experience God's words in this matter? Which aspects of the truth are involved in this matter? What should I do to practice the truth?" This would be putting effort into pursuing the truth, and after several years of practicing and experiencing in this way, you will slowly enter upon the right track of believing in God, you will be walking the right path of life, and you will have direction. Always using your intellect to analyze and scrutinize whatever issue you are faced with and always relying on your own methods to resolve things is not a feasible approach. If you practice according to this method, it will be impossible to achieve compatibility with God and a change in disposition—you will never achieve them, this is the wrong path. It is futile for you to seek salvation through the pursuit of fame, fortune and status. Countless people have already failed and stumbled in this way. Some were identified as false leaders and some as antichrists—all were cast out. It is useless to pursue standing out in the church. It is better to follow Peter's path—pursuing the truth is the safest and most secure way. Do you now see what is most important? The most important thing is to accept and practice the truth. Reading the word of God is for the sake of pondering it and gaining the truth. Do not scrutinize it, absolutely do not scrutinize it, and do not have resistant or antagonistic moods. As soon as you have this sort of state, immediately examine yourself and resolve it. These issues with corruption which exist within you are continuously resolved, your state gets better and better, and you have fewer and fewer outpourings of corruption, which ultimately yields a result: Your relationship with God will become more and more normal, your heart will fear God more and more and become closer and closer to God, you will perform your duty to increasingly greater effect, and your love for and faith in God will grow larger and larger. This confirms that you have absorbed the words of God into your heart, where they have taken root. Ultimately, you will see a result, and you will say: "Constantly reflecting on myself and addressing my corrupt manifestations, I prevented any irreparable consequences. I feel regret in my heart and hate myself for having served as Satan's servant. Thankfully, God saved me, allowing me to find my way back, accept the truth, and submit to Him. I am no longer worried about whether I will be saved or not, nor am I worried about the possibility of being cleared out and cast out later. I am now certain that I will be a recipient of God's salvation, that I am on the right path, and that I believe in the true God, the Lord of all creation. I do not have any doubts about this." Only at this point will you take faith in God into your heart, and you can rely on Him in every situation. Then, you will have really entered into a sanctuary, and you will no longer have to worry about whether you are just a service-doer or whether you will die in a disaster. Only at this point will your heart be filled with peace and joy. What causes people to have these worries? It is because they know too little of God's work, have too little understanding of the truth, and even have notions and misunderstandings about God. Because you have not understood God's intentions in His words, and haven't grasped God's will, you always misunderstand God. Since you always misunderstand Him, you are constantly worried and never feel secure. Sometimes you are in a resistant mood; gradually, while you may not make big mistakes, you keep making plenty of small ones, until one day you suddenly do make a big mistake and really do get cast out. Making a big mistake is no insignificant matter. Some people are cast out, or cleared out or expelled, or do not receive any of the work of the Holy Spirit—isn't there a root cause behind all of this? There is definitely a root cause; the issue here is about which path they walk. Some choose to follow the path of Peter, which is the path of pursuing the truth. Others choose to follow the path of Paul, which is the path of pursuing a crown and rewards. The essence of these two paths is different, as are the consequences and the outcomes they lead to. Those who are cast out never walk the path of pursuing and practicing the truth. They always stray from this path and just do what they will, acting according to their own desires and ambitions, safeguarding their own status, reputation, and pride, and satisfying their own desires everything they do revolves around these things. Even though they have also paid a price, spent time and energy, and worked from dawn to dusk, what is their ultimate result? Because the things they did are condemned as wicked in the eyes of God, the result is that they are cast out. Do they still have a chance of being saved? (No.) This is an incredibly serious consequence! It's just like when people get sick: A minor illness that is not promptly treated can develop into a major illness, or even become terminal. For example, if a person has a cold and a cough, they will quickly get better if they receive normal medical treatment. However, some people think they have a robust constitution and so do not take their cold seriously or seek treatment. As a result, it drags out for a long time and they contract pneumonia. After getting pneumonia, they still feel that they are young with a strong immune system, so they don't treat it for several months. They pay no mind to their coughing every day until it reaches a point where the coughing becomes uncontrollable and unbearable, and they cough up blood. So they go to the hospital to get examined, where they find out they have developed tuberculosis. Others advise them to get immediate treatment, but they still think they are young and strong, with no need to worry, so they don't seek proper treatment. Until one day, in the end, their body is too weak to walk, and when they go to the hospital for a checkup, they already have late-stage cancer. When people have corrupt dispositions which they do not treat, it can also bring about incurable repercussions. Having a corrupt disposition is not something to be frightened of, but someone with a corrupt disposition must seek the truth to promptly resolve it; only in this way can the corrupt disposition be gradually cleansed. If they do not focus on resolving it, it will become more and more severe, and they may offend and resist God, and be detested and rejected by Him and cast out.

Some people have the nature essence of an antichrist, such as people like Paul. They constantly focus on gaining blessings, obtaining a crown, and receiving rewards, and they try to make deals with God. They always want to be leaders and apostles who can control God's chosen people, but they only end up making God detest and reject them. They walk the path of resisting God, which is the wrong path. Some people do not love the truth; they know that it is wrong to pursue fame, fortune, status, and benefits, but they still choose the wrong path anyway. God has patiently and earnestly urged His chosen people, offering them all kinds of comfort, exhortations, reminders, warnings, revelations, dealings, and reprimands. God has spoken so many words, and yet people do not take it seriously, treating it as if it's just wind passing by their ears. They do not practice it, but still, according to their own motives and desires, safeguard their own status, pride, and vanity. They conspire everywhere for their own benefit, and plan and act everywhere for their own face and prospects, racking their brains and sparing no expense. In their hearts, they even think, "I have expended myself for God, there is a glorious crown reserved for me," and even speak the words that Paul said. In fact, they don't know what the path they are on is, nor do they know that they have been condemned by God. When one day this leads to a great disaster, will they know to repent? When that time comes they will resist, saying, "I work hard and have made significant contributions; if not contributions, then at least I've suffered; if not suffering, then at least I've exhausted myself!" The things they've done are not worth a penny can they be good deeds? Was it performing their duty? Was it practicing the truth? They were engaging in personal management. During this period, they equipped themselves with plenty of profound-sounding words and doctrines; they could speak and lecture, and could run around expending themselves, but they did not do any practical work whatsoever. They did a good job of drawing in the people around them, pulling everyone into their orbit. They became king of the mountain, with no place for God in their heart. Isn't this doing evil? Since they didn't practice the truth at all, the final result for them should be self-evident. But even in this situation they still want a crown; how brazen can they be? This is called shameless audacity! Why can such people argue even in the end when they are cast out? They disrupt and disturb the work of the church, committing all kinds of evils; how can they still argue with God and defend themselves with conviction? What problem is it that they can resist God like this? Do you think there is any rationality behind their doing this? Do they have a conscience and reason? Normal people, having heard so many of God's words—regardless of how God treats them, or whether this treatment conforms to their notions—at least have to acknowledge that God's words are the truth and are all right. Even if there is some sentence that does not conform to their notions, they should not judge God; they should have a submissive heart. If one can acknowledge that the word of God is the truth and submit before God, isn't this treating God as God? (Yes.) In such a case, if sometimes some notions and misunderstandings about God arise, is it not easy to seek the truth to resolve them? The key is that people must acknowledge the words and work of God—this is a prerequisite. Why is it that nonbelievers and antichrists, those similar to Paul, are still able to oppose God? (They do not treat God as God.) This is where the root lies. No matter how eloquent they are, no matter how diligently they work and run about, no matter how much they suffer and how great a price they pay, they never take the word of God as the truth—can they understand the truth then? (No.) So, no matter how God handles them, they either have objections or refuse to capitulate. They completely lack the least reason that a created being should have, which confirms the fact that they never accepted the truth. If, over the years, they had been able to accept God's words as the truth, and practice and heed God's words, they would not be so presumptuous and oppositional. They would not oppose God's arrangements and God's treatment of them. They would not have these moods; at the most, they would just feel a little upset or not very cheerful. Corrupt humans all have normal weaknesses, but there are several boundaries they must at least observe. Firstly, they cannot give up performing their duty. "No matter when, whatever task God entrusts to me, whether I do it well or not, I must give it my all, exerting as much effort as possible. Even if God no longer likes me or looks down on me, at the very least I must take on the task entrusted to me and do it well." This is reasonable; one's duty cannot be abandoned. Moreover, one cannot deny God. "No matter how God treats me or handles me, or how my brothers and sisters exclude or expose me, or even if everyone abandons me, God's position in my heart remains the same, and the position I should hold as person remains unchanged. God is always my God, His essence and identity do not change, and I will forever acknowledge Him as my God." There must also be this reason. What else is there? (No matter how God treats and punishes us, we must submit to Him.) This is the bare minimum, this is the most basic baseline one must have. You say, "I don't understand God's intentions, and I don't understand why God acts this way. I feel a little wronged, and I have some justification for this, but I don't say anything because I am a created being and should submit to God. This is the duty of a created being. Even though I currently don't understand or know exactly how to practice or seek the truth, I should still submit." Is this reasonable? (Yes.) When those who do not accept the truth and who lack reason are subjected to being pruned and dealt with, what manifestations do they display? They say, "Am I going to be exposed and cast out? If I don't have any prospects or fate, and I'm not able to attain blessings, I won't believe!" Does this kind of person have true faith in God? Their relationship with God is not normal, it is resistant and antagonistic. This kind of disposition is Satan's disposition that resists God. Can they acknowledge God as their God? In their heart, they may say, "If He's really God, why doesn't He love me? If He's really God, why doesn't He use me for something important? All I see is a person—how could there be a God anywhere in this world? You are all fools. Where is God? In my heart, He only exists if I believe in Him; if I don't believe in Him, He doesn't exist, and He is not God." Their viewpoint is thus revealed. They listened to so many of God's words over the years; if they had accepted these words, would they develop viewpoints like this? (No.) More seriously, what will they do now? They'll incite others and make a move: "You still believe? How could vou be so foolish? Didn't they say long ago that a disaster was coming? When is it coming? Didn't God say the world would be destroyed? Where is the destruction? You fool, you've suffered a huge loss! Stop believing! What are you believing for? Look at how smart I am, I earn several thousand yuan a month, how much do you earn a month? Look at what's popular in the world now. What do you see me wearing? It's all name brand!" They will entice and mislead people, leaving some in a state of utter confusion. Is this not an evil person infiltrating the house of God to disturb the church? What attitude do such people have in performing their duty? "I do my duty if I'm in the mood. If I want to do it, I'll do it. If not, I won't. I don't have to commit my heart and strength. Performing duty is not doing things for myself, it's doing things for the church. And I can't even see God anywhere. I don't even know if God remembers me, and they still want me to devote my heart, my strength, my mind—what's the point? It's good enough if I just get through it by mumbling a few words." This is the view they hold. They think it's foolish and not worthwhile to devote one's strength, heart, and mind to performing duty. If you were to encounter such a person now, would you be misled and influenced by them? If you lack a foundation and do not understand the truth, you will definitely be misled and influenced, and as time goes on, you will end up at a loss.

In believing in God, the purpose of eating and drinking the words of God, as well as which key problems doing so should resolve, must be clear. If one believes in God for several years without ever focusing on eating and drinking the words of God, not only will the problem of one's corruption remain unresolved, but they will also not even understand the minimum amount of the truth that should be understood. So, what are the consequences of this? It is very easy to be misled and take a wrong turn. If one doesn't understand the truth, they will be most likely to stumble. When faced with an issue, when faced with even the slightest sign of trouble, it will be difficult for them to keep their footing. Therefore, it is most beneficial for people to do more reading of God's words and to fellowship the truth more often. There is something God said in the Bible which is very important: "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but My words shall not pass away" (Matthew 24:35). What do these words suggest to people? What does it mean that God's words will not pass away? No matter when, the truth and the word of God will always be the truth—this will not change. No matter whether it's the value or significance of these words to people, or the inner meaning and actuality of these words, they will never change. They will remain the original words and will not become anything else the essence of God's words cannot change. For example, God tells people to be honest; these words are the truth and shall never pass away. Why shall they never pass away? From God's requirement for people to be honest, one can see the aspect of God's essence that is faithful, which has existed from time immemorial and will continue to exist forever. It will not change due to changes in the times, geography, or space; God's essence will exist forever. What is the reason for this eternal existence of God's essence? Because it is a positive thing and the essence possessed by the Lord of creation; it shall never pass away and shall forever be the truth. If you experience all these truths expressed by the Creator and actualize them into your being, put all of them into practice, and live them out, won't you then be able to live like a person? Won't living have value? Would you be abandoned? Experiencing and living out all the truths that God has granted you—isn't this your way out? Only this path can allow humankind to survive. If people cannot accept the truth and do not follow the path of pursuing the truth, they will ultimately pass away and be destroyed. You might say, "Aren't I living just fine now?" But if you haven't gained the truth, you will be cast out sooner or later. "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but My words shall not pass away"; this sentence has such profound significance; it is also the greatest warning for people. Only God's words are the truth, and only if you accept the truth can you stand firm. That is, if you eat and drink the word of God, put it into practice, and live out some semblance of humanity, you will not be cast out. This is where the value of God's words lies! So, can God's words be a person's life? What does life refer to here? It means that you can live, you are saved. If you accept these words, and understand and practice them, you become a living person in the eyes of God. If you are not an honest person, but a deceitful one, you are but a walking corpse in God's eyes, a dead person, and like all things you shall pass away.

Anything that has nothing to do with God's words or the truth, be it material or immaterial, must pass away when God changes the age and renews the world. Only God's words will not pass away, and only all things related to God's words will not pass away. Practicing God's words is that important!

People know that practicing and experiencing God's words is important, but they must also have a path of practice. This is the path of life entry, and they must attach importance to it in their hearts and experience it every day. If you are always worried that you lack experiential testimony and fear that one day you will be cast out, then that is a problem. Those who don't love the truth never practice or experience God's words. This is not only because they don't have faith; mainly it is because they are instigated by Satan's nature. You only want to receive blessings but do not love the truth; if you are dominated by this motive, there can be no good outcome for you. So, what should you do? You definitely cannot let it spread unchecked within you; you must seek the truth and reflect on yourself: "Why am I not practicing the truth? Why am I always worried about being cast out? This state is not right, I must resolve it." Isn't it progress to know to seek the truth and resolve your problems? This is a good thing. People who don't know to solve their problems are numb, imbecilic, rebellious, and intransigent. Some people know that this is a problem and yet they don't try to fix it. They think, "Isn't it quite normal for me to think this way? Why do I need to resolve my intention to receive blessings? If I resolve it, I'll lose out." Isn't this intransigent? Some people are numb; they do not realize that wanting to receive blessings is a problem of intentions and disposition. They think, "Isn't it normal for people who believe in God to want to be blessed? Having this intention doesn't count as a problem." Are such thoughts and views correct? If one's intention to receive blessings is not resolved and their corrupt disposition is not cleansed, can they truly submit to God? What are the consequences of living by a corrupt disposition? It is like when someone doesn't feel well; they know they are going to catch a cold, so they guickly find some medicine to take. Others, however, are numb; they don't even know that they have inflammation. They just go around telling people that they haven't been feeling well lately, unaware that they are experiencing the early signs of a cold, and not taking it seriously. Some people even think, "It's just a cold; what's the worst it can do?" They should drink water but they don't, they should take medicine but they don't do that either; they just tough it out. As a result, they get a cold and are sick for several days, which sets them back on quite a few matters. People treat their different states with the same attitude they treat their illnesses. Some people can resolve minor problems quickly but they don't resolve major problems at all. By procrastinating in this manner, their corrupt disposition remains unresolved, leading to a lack of life entry and a loss to their life. Is this not foolish and ignorant? People who are too foolish cannot gain the truth and end up forfeiting their life. Believing in God in this manner, they will never be able to receive God's salvation.

The pursuit of the truth must start with self-reflection and self-knowledge. No matter what situation one is faced with, they must always reflect on their inner state, identifying and resolving whichever wrong thoughts and views or rebellious states they have. After a period of time, when they are faced with a different circumstance or event, they will develop some incorrect views and states, and they must seek the truth to resolve those. By continually reflecting on and coming to know oneself, and continually resolving one's own incorrect views and rebellious states, a person's corrupt disposition will manifest less and less, and it will be easy for them to practice the truth. This is the process of life growth. No matter what situation one encounters, they must seek the truth, and no matter what one intends or plans, that which is in accordance with the truth must be adhered to, and that which is not in accordance with the truth must be suppressed. In addition, they must aspire to righteousness, and must strive for the truth, for knowledge of God, and to meet God's requirements. In this way, they can more often discover their own shortcomings and corrupt manifestations, and develop a heart that yearns for the truth. After experiencing in this way for a period of time, they will be able to understand some of the truths, and their faith in God will become greater and greater. Without having such a path of practice, it cannot be said that one is practicing the truth. If one who lives within a corrupt disposition does not examine whether their words and actions align with the truth or go against principles, instead only checking if they've broken the law or committed crimes and that's all, paying no mind to their corrupt disposition and not caring about their rebellious state whatsoever—and even though outwardly they may not have broken the law or committed crimes, the fact is they are still living by a corrupt disposition under the power of Satan—then such a person has not lived out the truth reality, and they are not someone who will receive salvation. When people live for several decades in the world and can understand worldly things, they think they are clever, infallible, and amazing, but in the presence of the truth, corrupted human beings are all foolish and mentally deficient, just as insignificant humans will forever be infants before God. The pursuit of receiving salvation is no simple matter; it requires understanding many truths, growing to a certain stature, having willpower, having a suitable environment, practicing the truth gradually. In this way, one's faith will be cultivated bit by bit, and their doubts and misunderstandings about God will become fewer and fewer. As their doubts and misunderstandings about God diminish, their faith increases, and when faced with situations they will be able to seek the truth. When they understand the truth, they will be able to practice the truth, they will have fewer and fewer negative and passive things, have more positive and good things, and the times when they are able to practice the truth and obey God will increase. This is having the truth reality. Doesn't this indicate they've grown up? That their heart has become increasingly resilient? What does resilience refer to? It is when a person has true faith, understands the truth, has the ability to discern, can rely on God to overcome the flesh, has the capacity to overcome sin, can stand firm in their witness, has true obedience to God, can suffer and pay a price for the sake of practicing the truth, can loyally fulfill their duty, and has the resolve to pursue the truth and seek being made perfect. Doesn't this indicate continuous improvement? In this way, one can embark on the path of pursuing the truth and being made perfect. No circumstance or difficulty will be able to overwhelm such a person or stop them from following God. This is a person who is most blessed by God, a person whom God hopes to gain.

What state are you in currently? (Sometimes when we encounter difficulties we become somewhat negative, but we are able to strive upward and try to overcome them.) Having stature is being able to take the initiative to overcome your difficulties when you become aware of them. Knowing you have difficulties and yet not acting to overcome them or respond to them, carrying around a negative state, performing your duty in a passive and perfunctory manner—this is the common and typically-seen state. There is something even worse, which is not knowing what kind of person you are and not knowing what kind of state you are in—not knowing whether your state is good or bad, right or wrong, or negative or positive. This is the most troublesome. A person like this doesn't know the detailed problems of their life entry, let alone from where to start practicing the truth. They only have enthusiasm but do not understand any truths or have any discernment, and they cannot talk about any experiential testimony. When will such a person be able to bear a resounding testimony for God? Some people can speak a lot of words and doctrines, but if you ask them, "Are you bearing witness to God?" they themselves don't even know. They think they are doing their duty loyally, without any carelessness or perfunctoriness. They think everything about them is good, and that they are better than other people in everything. When others are weak, they even admonish them: "Why are you weak? Love God, come on! It's already this point in time and you're still weak?" Such a person clearly has no reality; they don't understand the normal states and process of changing one's life disposition. They just repeat commonly heard sayings like "This is no time to be weak!" and "You're still concerned about your family now?" using such doctrines to urge others and lecture them, not resolving any practical problems at all. Not being able to perceive one's own state and not being able to truly know oneself is the most obvious manifestation of an immature stature. Not being able to practice the truth and instead only following some rules is indicative of an immature stature. Desiring to fulfill one's duty and do things well, but not knowing what principles to follow and only doing things according to one's own preferences is indicative of an immature stature. Listening to others' experiential testimony and not being able to discern it, nor being able to say clearly what benefits one should gain from this or what lessons one should draw, is indicative of an immature stature. Not being able to experience and practice the word of God, and not knowing what it means to exalt and testify to God—these are all signs of an immature stature. What stage are you in now? (We tend to be negative more often.) This situation is even more indicative of an immature stature. People who are too foolish and ignorant have no stature whatsoever.

Only when they can understand many truths, discern matters, resolve their own problems, have fewer negative states and more normal states, take on heavy burdens, and lead and provide for others will they really have stature. You must strive for the truth; the more you strive, the more you will grow. If you don't strive, you will not grow, and you might even regress. To believe in God, you must live by the truth; by understanding the truth more, you gain stature. If you don't understand the truth, you will have no stature. When you begin to seek the truth and are able to resolve your own problems, your stature will have grown.

Only by Understanding the Truth Can One Know God's Deeds

God has sovereignty over the fate of all mankind and over the universe and all things. What fact do people see about God's sovereignty? That no matter how big the world or how vast the universe, from the macroscopic to the microscopic, God reigns sovereign over all and orchestrates all things. No matter man's wishes, ambitions, demands, or the direction in which he is inclined to develop, from where God stands, His sovereignty and orchestrations are not affected by these things in the slightest. What is the principle by which God reigns sovereign over, and orchestrates, all things? On what is it based? What is God's goal in doing all of this? What does it revolve around? (It revolves around God's management plan.) This response is correct; everything God does revolves around His management plan. These words sound somewhat inconceivable, but they have a deeper connotation. By which, I mean that all the work God does is not swayed by man's wishes. God's sovereignty and orchestrations; the way He orchestrates countries, peoples, or ethnic groups; or the things He arranges to happen in any given era are not swayed by man's wishes. God is not limited by time, space, geography, or people. Everything He does is carried out exactly according to His plan, and no man can thwart or disturb it. No matter whether you are willing or not, and no matter what the subjective wishes are of mankind or a particular ethnic group, no man or thing is capable of disturbing, destroying, or swaying what God has decided to do. What have you learned from this? (We have learned about God's authority.) This is God's authority. From when God first created human beings to when they progressed step by step, humankind has encompassed God's chosen people, Gentiles, and those who are antagonistic toward God. God views all these types of people as human, but, is there a difference in how God treats these different types of people? Does God lead His chosen people in a particular way? (Yes, He does.) God treats His chosen people differently than He treats other people. But within God's chosen people, some are able to follow and obey Him, and some are disobedient and resist Him. So, how does God treat them? How does God view their attitude toward Him? (God is merciful and loving toward those who obey Him, but when people are disobedient or resist Him, He brings His righteous disposition down upon them.) That is right. Regardless of whether you think you are one of God's chosen people, or one of His followers, or have contributed in some way to the work of God's house, from where God stands, He does not look at these outward things. God has a righteous disposition and is principled in His treatment of people: Those who should be judged, are judged; those who should be punished, are punished; and those who should be destroyed, are destroyed. For example, what strikes you about the fact that the Jews were driven out of Judea, and the Lord Jesus' gospel of the kingdom of heaven was spread to the Gentiles? According to people's notions and imaginings, and according to Judaism, only the Jews are God's chosen people. They are God's precious children, and the humans to which God is most attached; they are the apple of His eye. According to what people say, the Jews are His most beloved children, and one should baby and protect their favorite child, and not let them be hurt or wronged in any way. People think that no matter what the Jews pray for, God will grant it to them, and will bestow upon them more than they asked for or imagined. But is this what God did? (No, it is not.) Then, what did God do? Because the Jews nailed the Lord Jesus to a cross, God became very angry and made the Romans send armies to conquer Judea and drive the Jews out of their homeland. It was a scene of much slaughter and carnage; countless people died and blood flowed like rivers. The only way many Jews survived was by escaping to various countries around the world. From these facts, what essence do you see in God's disposition? (That God's righteous disposition does not tolerate offense.) Let us not start off by talking about God's disposition, let us first use people as an example. In real life, if someone has a child they love dearly, and wants the child to inherit their property and everything they have, what will they do? On one hand, they will be strict with him, so that he will grow up to be accomplished and can take up his parents' mantle. But most importantly, they will protect him and not let him come in the path of any harm or danger. The purpose of this is so that the child can live and inherit everything his parents have. What motivates people to do all of this? Do people treat children they do not love, or strangers, in the same way? Do they act the same way? (No, they do not.) It is obvious that everything people do for the child they love best is motivated by selfishness, emotion, and personal desire; these things are part of man's nature essence. Is there truth in people's emotions and selfishness? Is there fairness? (No, there is not.) That is how mankind manifests itself. But look at the things God did—God wanted His chosen people, the Jews, to spread the gospel from Judea to all the Gentile peoples around the world—in Asia, Europe, Africa, and the Americas. How were they to spread it? God used a method by which foreign invaders raided and occupied Jewish lands, drove out the Jews who were living there, the people who spread news about Jesus the Savior, and caused them to lose their homeland, never to return. Then, the

Jews settled in various corners of the earth, where they survived and began spreading the gospel of Jesus the Savior, until it gradually reached every country in the world, and all the ends of the earth. This proves a fact: that God's work is very practical. Where is this primarily manifested? In the fact that God employed a very special and unusual method to push the Israelites out into all these different countries and spread the gospel of the Lord Jesus. If He had let the Israelites make the decision to move to every country and spread the gospel and testify to God, they would not have been able to bring themselves to abandon their families and their ancestral homeland. It is as though God struck them so they could go out and spread the gospel of the Lord Jesus. This is the price God paid for the gospel of the kingdom of heaven; He made His chosen people meet with war, slaughter, and exile. The Jews were forced to wander the earth without a home, spreading the gospel in every country. In the eyes of people, these methods are too inconsiderate toward man, but can God's essence be described as "inconsiderate toward man"? Obviously not, as it is not inconsiderate toward man. This is because there is no selfishness or emotion in God's disposition and essence; He did all of this for the progress of all mankind, so that mankind's next step of progress would succeed, and be materialized in complete accordance with the steps of God's management plan. So, God must do this; there was no other way. The steps of God's work had already progressed to this point, and His actions had brought swift and good results, so they were entirely appropriate. Looking at God's essence, only God could do this, no other country or race would. God's disposition is righteous. Looking at God's attitude toward the Jews should offer some enlightenment for God's chosen people today. Man was created by God, and God has love, attachment, mercy, and lovingkindness for man, but when God gives people a mission, what are people in God's eyes? Can you grasp this level of meaning? Some people say, "From this perspective, people don't have any value in God's eyes. They're just pawns. You just go where He says, and do what He says." Are these words correct? They are not. It seems like this is the case on the surface, but in fact it is not. To use the words of man, when God acts He does not concern Himself with that much. He does not have man's traditional thinking or notions, and He is not limited by anything. Everything God does is liberating, freeing, public, transparent, and upright. One aspect is that He follows the steps of His management plan so that everything progresses normally; another aspect is that He does this so that people in the future can progress and move forward normally in God's hands, in accordance with His management plan. Man's progress is intimately tied to God's management plan. If God did not act this way, bearing the pain of giving up something He loved to take this step, it would be difficult for man to progress even a little bit. That is why I say that God has considered every choice He makes, every step He takes, and every thing in His management work; it contains His might, authority, and wisdom. There are always some things God does which people do not understand. Why can they not understand? Because people have notions. Some of these notions are imaginings, some are influenced by man's traditional culture and thinking, and some are man's selfish desires and judgments. These things influence man's understanding of God, as well as his view of God.

What conclusion can you come to about the Jews being driven out of Judea? (That God does not have a selfish heart like humans. Everything God does is upright, and for the progress of all mankind.) If this situation happened to you, and there was slaughter, streams of blood, ruin and death was visited upon your household, and your family was torn apart, what would be your understanding? (Depending on our humanity and the extent of our corruption by Satan, we may have a lot of misunderstandings, resentment, and misinterpretations, but now, through God's fellowship, we realize that everything God does possesses meaning and His will. No matter how much suffering we experience, we should willingly submit to all of God's orchestrations, and do our utmost to cooperate with Him, sharing and testifying to God's work of the last days.) In the face of these facts, does man have a choice? Man has no right to choose what God decides to do. After hearing these words, do people still feel that God is love? They become disheartened, and say, "If people have no choice about these facts, then exactly what role do people play in the work of God's management plan?" Do you know? (We are created beings.) You are not just created beings; you act as foils. You are the object of God's judgment and chastisement, but even more so, you are objects of His salvation. That is the role you play. What is your function as created beings? This relates to a person's practice and duty. You are a created being, and if God gave you the gift of song, and the house of God arranges for you to sing, then you are to sing well. If you have the gift of evangelism, and the house of God arranges for you to spread the gospel, then you should spread the gospel well. When God's chosen people elect you as a leader, you should take up the commission of leadership, and lead God's chosen people to eat and drink the words of God, fellowship on the truth, and enter into reality. In doing so, you will have performed your duty well. The commission God gives to man is extremely important and meaningful! So, how should you take up this commission and fulfill your function? This is one of the biggest issues you face, and you must make a choice. It can be said that this is a crucial moment which decides whether you can gain the truth and be perfected by God. If you act by relying on your own will and commit all kinds of outrages, not only will you not fulfill God's commission, but you also will disturb the work of God's house. Consequently, it will be necessary for you to be punished, just as Paul was. When God tells you to go do something, what is your function then? It is to do the task well and not mess it up. In doing so, you are performing a service well. No matter what service God tells you to perform, you must do it well and obediently. In so doing, you are a person who listens and obeys. If you do not perform a service honestly, always have personal intentions, and always want to rule like a king, then you are a Satan and an antichrist, and you must be punished. Some people do not understand the truth or pursue it; they only put effort into their work. What then is their function as a

created being? Just to work and serve. Sum up, then, what are the precise duties created beings in God's eyes should perform and what human likeness they should live out. This pertains to your practice. According to the notions and imaginings of man, God is attached to, cares for, protects, looks after, and bestows grace upon the created beings in His eyes. He then disciplines, prunes and deals with them, loves them in His heart, and holds them in His hands. Ultimately, God has the single-minded intent to perfect them, ensure their safety and make sure nothing happens to them until they are perfected. To them, this is what created beings are in God's eyes. When people experience this, they think, "God is singularly lovely! How great is our God! He is so worthy of our love! God is merciful and loving! God is wonderful!" But if you compare this with the facts, are these the only ways in which God treats created beings? (No, it is not.) Then how does God treat people? What other notions and imaginings do people have about the attitude God takes toward His treatment of man? Are there any which people cannot accept? Without question, it is God's judgment, chastisement, trials, refinement, pruning, discipline, deprivation, and His dealing with people. What kind of people are those who cannot accept God's judgment and chastisement? You could say that they are people who do not accept the truth, and you could definitely say that people who do not accept the truth are nonbelievers. If a person cannot accept God's judgment and chastisement, then that is tantamount to them being unable to accept God's work. What is the nature of this problem? It is that they do not accept the truth, and they reject God's work. People like this will only meet with disaster and punishment. No matter what kind of person you are, if you believe in God but do not accept the truth, you cannot be saved. After a person starts believing in God, no matter what environment God surrounds them with to expose them, during the process of being exposed, can they see God's blessings, grace, care, or protection? (No, they cannot.) On the surface they cannot see it, but after going through trials and refinement will they be able to see it? They most certainly will. So there are many people who can see God's protection and blessings after experiencing His judgment and chastisement. But people who do not love the truth cannot see these things at all. They still cling to their notions and imaginings, and they are full of antagonism and rebelliousness toward God. These are the sort of people who are nonbelievers, evil ones, and antichrists. Everything they do is an example of what not to do. Paul is an example. What do people see when they look at Paul? (That Paul was on the path of an antichrist, and that his story serves as a warning to us.) Paul did not pursue the truth. He only believed in God because he sought a future and destination for his flesh. He only sought to gain rewards and a crown. God spoke so many words, disciplined, enlightened and illuminated him so much, and yet he did not obey God or accept the truth. He always disobeyed and resisted God, and in the end, he became an antichrist and was condemned and punished. Paul serves as an example of what not to do. By examining the example of Paul as an archetypal antichrist, people can see that Paul was on a path of resistance to God, and a path of destruction. Many have learned from this and benefited from it. They have stepped onto the path of pursuing the truth, and onto the correct path of a believer. What is God's will for people who can accept the truth, and who have benefited from Paul's lesson? (Salvation and love.) Then what aspect of God's disposition can people see from God's exposure, judgment, and condemnation of Paul? (His righteous disposition.) Then in God's eyes, what had Paul, as a created being, become? He had become a serving object. People are all created beings, both those who benefit and those who are exposed. However, God treats these two types of people completely differently. In reality, in God's eyes, these two types of people are both as worthless as ants and maggots, but God treats one differently from the other. This is God's righteous disposition. On what is God's different attitude toward these two types of people based? (It is based on the path they follow.) It is based on how a person manifests themselves, their essence, their attitude toward the truth, and on the path a person is walking. On the outside, it seems as though God is inconsiderate toward man, that He is emotionless, and that His actions are heartless. According to man's notions and imaginings, people think, "God shouldn't have treated Paul that way. Paul had done so much and suffered so much. Plus, he was extremely loyal to God. Why would God treat him like that?" Is it right for people to say this? Is it in line with the truth? In what way was Paul so loyal or devoted to God? Are they not twisting the truth? Paul was loyal and devoted to obtaining blessings for himself. Is that loyalty to God? When people do not understand the truth, cannot see the essence of a problem clearly, and speak blindly based on their emotions, are they not rebelling against God and resisting Him? No wonder everyone adores Paul! Those who are of Satan always adore Satan, and even speak for Satan based on their emotions. This means that although people may seem to have separated from Satan, they remain connected. In fact, when people speak for Satan, they are also speaking for themselves. People sympathize with Paul because they are like him, and on the same path as him. According to man's common sense, God should not have treated Paul that way, but what He did was the exact opposite of human reason. This is God's righteous disposition, and it is the truth. If a person speaks in accordance with man's common sense, they may say, "Even if Paul did not achieve much, he put in a lot of work and effort. He should have been spared just on account of the number of years he suffered. Even if he was just a service-doer it would be okay. He shouldn't have been punished or sent to hell." These are the reasonings and emotions of man—it is not the truth. What is the most lovely aspect of God? That He does not have man's common sense. Everything He does is in accordance with the truth and His essence. He reveals a righteous disposition. God has no regard for your subjective wishes, nor for the objective facts of what you have done. God determines and defines what kind of person you are based on what you do, what you reveal, and the path you walk, and then assumes the most appropriate attitude toward you. This is how Paul's end came about. Looking at the matter of Paul, it seems as if God was devoid of love. Peter and Paul were both created beings, but while God commended and blessed Peter, He exposed, dissected, judged, and condemned Paul. You cannot see God's love in the way He decided Paul's end. So, based on what happened to Paul, could you say that God does not love? No, you cannot, because God disciplined him many times, illuminated him, giving him many chances to repent, but Paul stubbornly refused and walked the path of resistance to God. So in the end, God condemned and punished him. Looking at this matter on the surface, it seems as though people have no choice in God's work and salvation. Although God does not interfere in people's choices, if a person chooses the path of seeking blessings, God will condemn and punish them. It seems like God does not let people choose their own path, that He only allows them to choose the path of pursuing the truth, and that whether a person is judged, purified, or perfected is all up to God. Is seeing God's work this way and labeling God this way not an absurd mistake and absolutely ridiculous? Man is not at all aware that God's disposition is righteous and holy; he always chooses to follow his own path the path of resistance to God, but does not want to accept God's judgment or condemnation. This is totally unreasonable! There are many people who think, "People cannot choose for themselves how God treats them, what mission God gives them, the job He makes them do, or the duty He makes them perform. Ultimately, anyone who chooses to walk their own path is condemned. God only blesses and commends you if you choose the path He leads you down, and if you choose the path of pursuing the truth." Some people see this as God being unfair and interfering with people's free choice. But is this the fact of the matter? (No.) God does all of this according to principle. When you do not understand the facts and the truth, it is easy for you to misunderstand and judge God, but when you understand the facts and the truth, you will think that these misunderstandings are utterly worthless and totally despicable, and that they should never see the light of day. At which point, you will know that everything God does is right. People cannot see this because they are too selfish and foolish. They do not understand the truth and cannot see matters clearly, so they label God according to their own notions and imaginings. Once you understand this, you will not defend Paul anymore or misunderstand God. You will say, "What God does is totally right. Humans are the ones who are corrupt. They are narrow-minded and foolish. They cannot see situations clearly. Regardless of whether a person sees God's righteous disposition or if they see His love from this matter, everything God does is right, and is a manifestation of His righteous disposition and His essence. It is all in line with the truth, and isn't wrong!" Today, when God works in you and saves you, which path should you choose? Is God interfering with you? What choice should you make? Should you learn from Paul's mistakes? Should you be like Peter and follow the path of pursuing the truth? How do you approach this matter? That depends on whether you understand the truth. What problems will understanding the truth solve? The purpose of understanding the truth is to resolve man's corrupt disposition and man's various difficulties. When you come across problems that cannot be solved; or people, events, and things which do not match up with your notions, the truth will start performing its function within you. So how does Paul's case help you with your personal life entry and choosing your path? (It can impel us to come before God and reflect on ourselves.) (It can knock down walls and eliminate misunderstandings between God and man.) That's one part of it, and you have gained something from this discussion. The most crucial thing to understand is the significance of choosing the path of pursuing the truth, and why God commends and blesses those who do. Understanding the answer to this question is the most crucial thing.

Just now I mentioned how the Jews were sent into exile, and drifted into every country around the world. What do people see about this fact? What truth do they understand? This event should make people reflect a bit. Firstly, on how people should practice, and secondly, so that they understand God's disposition through this event. Let us first talk about how people should practice in these circumstances. Nothing God does is swayed by man's desires; God has His own plan, and His own principles for doing things. So, what attitude should people have? No matter what situation they encounter, or whether it matches up with their notions, people should never ever put themselves at odds with God. Some people say, "Even though I'm disobedient and resist God, isn't it enough that I perform my duty?" What sort of attitude is this? It is obviously unacceptable. That is not true obedience. Then, how exactly should people practice "not putting themselves at odds with God," and put it into action? There are two principles of practice: The first, is to proactively seek out God's will, what truths people should understand, and how to cooperate and complete God's commission—this is the active side of what people should do. The second, is to examine and recognize where you have misunderstandings about God, are not obedient to Him, have notions and imaginings, and things which are not compatible with Him. This will ensure that you are able to accurately practice the truth during the course of your duty, do things according to the principles, complete God's commission, and be commemorated by God. Are these principles of practice simple? (Yes, they are.) What do I mean by "simple"? That the logic and words are relatively clear; "one" means one, and "two" means two; as soon as you hear it, you know how to practice it. However, actually putting it into practice is not so simple, because people have corrupt dispositions. They always debate things, and have a lot of imaginings and notions, as well as misunderstandings about God. People must dissect these things and accept God's judgment and chastisement, but this makes people who lack spiritual understanding come up with new notions: "People all say God is love, so why does God always expose and judge people's thoughts and notions? I can't see love in God; I only see that God's disposition does not tolerate offense." Is this not one of man's notions? If, as in the notions and imaginings of corrupted humans, God only ever displayed mercy and lovingkindness during the development of all humankind, and never righteousness or wrath, could man have survived to the present day? (No, he couldn't.) Man would have been devoured by Satan long ago. When handling the issues of demons and Satan, and corrupt humans who resist God, what God displays and how

He manifests Himself is not the love people speak of, but rather a righteous disposition; it is hate, loathing, judgment, chastisement, punishment, and destruction. Only by doing this can God reveal that His disposition is righteous, holy, and does not tolerate offense; thoroughly shame Satan, and effectively protect true humanity. This is how God has always led humanity, and saved them at the same time.

People must frequently examine anything in their heart that is incompatible with God, or is a misunderstanding of Him. How do misunderstandings come about? Why do people misunderstand God? (Because their self-interest is affected.) After people see the facts about the Jewish exile from Judea, they feel hurt, and say, "At first, God loved the Israelites so much. He led them out of Egypt and through the Red Sea, gave them manna from the heavens and spring water to drink, then personally gave them laws to lead them, and taught them how to live. God's love for man was overflowing—people who lived back then were so blessed! How could God's attitude do a one-eighty in the blink of an eye? Where did all His love go?" People's feelings cannot get past this, and they begin to doubt, saying, "Is God love or isn't He? Why isn't His original attitude toward the Israelites visible anymore? His love has disappeared without a trace. Does He have any love at all?" This is where people's misunderstanding starts. What is the context in which people form misunderstandings? Could it be because God's actions are not compatible with people's notions and imaginings? Is this fact what causes people to misunderstand God? Is the reason people misunderstand God not because they limit their definition of His love? They think, "God is love. Therefore, He should look out for and protect people, and shower them with grace and blessings. This is what God's love is! I like it when God loves people this way. I could especially see how much God loved people when He led them through the Red Sea. People back then were so blessed! I wish I could be one of them." When you are enamored with this story, you treat the love God displayed in that instant as the highest truth, and the single marker of His essence. You limit your definition of Him in your heart, and treat everything God did at that moment as the highest truth. You think that this is God's most lovely side, and the one that most compels people to respect and fear Him, and that this is God's love. In actuality, God's actions themselves were positive, but because of your limited definitions, they became notions in your mind, and a basis on which you define God. They make you misunderstand God's love, as though there is nothing else to it than mercy, caring, protection, guidance, grace, and blessings—as though that is all God's love is. Why do you cherish these aspects of love so much? Is it because it is tied to your own selfinterest? (Yes, it is.) Which self-interests is it tied to? (The pleasures of the flesh and a comfortable life.) When people believe in God they want to obtain these things from Him, but not other things. People do not want to think about judgment, chastisement, trials, refinement, suffering for God, giving things up and expending themselves, or even sacrificing their own lives. People just want to enjoy God's love, care, protection, and guidance, so they define God's love as the only characteristic of His essence, and His only essence. Did the things God did when leading the Israelites across the Red Sea not become the source of people's notions? (Yes, they did.) This formed a context in which people formed notions about God. If they formed notions about God, then can they achieve a true understanding of God's work and disposition? It is obvious that not only will they not understand, but they will misinterpret it and form notions about it. This proves that man's understanding is too narrow, and is not true understanding. For it is not the truth, but rather a type of love and understanding which people analyze and interpret from God based on their own notions, imaginings, and selfish desires; it is not compatible with God's true essence. In what other ways does God love people other than through mercy, salvation, care, protection, and by listening to their prayers? (With chastening, discipline, pruning, dealing, judgment, chastisement, trials, and refinement.) That is correct. God shows His love in an abundance of ways: by striking, disciplining, reproaching, and with judgment, chastisement, trials, refinement, and so on. These are all aspects of God's love. Only this perspective is comprehensive and in line with the truth. If you understand this, when you examine yourself and realize you have misunderstandings about God, are you not then able to recognize that you were mistaken, and to do a good job reflecting on where you went wrong? Can this not help you resolve your misunderstandings about God? (Yes, it can.) In order to accomplish this, you must seek the truth. So long as people seek the truth, they can eliminate their misunderstandings about God, and once they have eliminated their misunderstandings about God, they can submit to all of God's arrangements. If you are able to eliminate your misunderstandings about God, then when you look at the Jewish exile from Judea, you will say, "God's attitude toward man, His created beings, is not just that of love, He also leads by striking and exiling. People should not give themselves a choice in their attitude toward God; it should be one of submission, not resistance." From the perspective of man's notions and imaginings, God's attitude toward the Jews seemed inconsiderate, but looking at it now, God did an incredible job; everything He displayed was a righteous disposition. God can bestow grace and blessings on people, and give them their daily bread, but He can also take all that away. That is God's authority, essence, and disposition.

Many people have notions about the Jewish exile from Judea, but people who seek the truth can gain enlightenment from this event. If a person has the comprehension ability, then this event will make them see that God's righteous disposition does not tolerate offense. But some people do not have the comprehension ability. If they feel that what God did does not match their notions, they should first agree that God is righteous, and that His disposition does not tolerate offense; this is for certain. Then, they should pray and seek the truth, and look at what the Jews did to offend God's disposition and incur His wrath. Only in this way can people thoroughly resolve their notions, come to understand God's disposition through this event, and submit to God's orchestrations and arrangements. It is no easy task for people to understand the truth. No matter whether you have previously enjoyed God's grace and blessings, or have done work through accepting His guidance and commission, or whether you have offered things up, or given something up—even if people view you as having made some sort of contribution, under no circumstances should you view these things as capital. That is the first thing. The second thing, is that you should never view these things as chips that you can hold over God and use to dictate how He treats you. The most important thing, is that when God's words and attitude toward you do not match up with your notions, or seem insensitive toward you, you must not resist or oppose Him. This is the third thing. Can you accomplish these three things? These three things pertain to reality. Is it easy for these states to occur in people? (Yes, it is.) Why do these states occur in people? Why do they manifest themselves in this way? God manages the entire human race, and reigns sovereign over all things, but does God view these things as capital? Does God take credit for it? Does God manifest Himself by saying, "I've done all these great things for you. Why don't you thank Me?" (No, He does not.) God does not have these things in His mind. So why does man expect credit from God for every little thing he gives up or expends, or every little contribution he makes? Why does man manifest and display himself this way? The answer is simple. It is because man's disposition is corrupt. Why does God not manifest or display Himself in this way? It is because God's essence is truth, and truth is holy. This is the answer. People manifest and display themselves this way because they have corrupt dispositions. Can this problem be resolved? Can the three things I just mentioned resolve this problem? (Yes, they can.) None of the three things I mentioned are easy to put into practice, but there is a solution. After hearing these three things, people might think, "We're not allowed to do this, and we're not allowed to do that. We're just supposed to be an empty-headed puppet." Is this how it is? (No, it is not.) Then what is it? Let Me tell you, God does not let you do these things because it is for your own protection. This is the first thing. Your method of pursuit is not in line with the truth, and is not the correct path. Do not repeat the mistakes of people who came before you. If you treat the things you give up and expend as capital and chips that you can cash in, and then when God's attitude toward you seems inconsiderate you oppose Him, then your attitude is not in line with the truth, there is no humanity in it, and it is not right. Even if you have a thousand reasons, your attitude is still wrong; it is not compatible with the truth in any way, and amounts to resisting God. It is not the attitude a person should have. This is the second thing. The third thing is that if you cling to this attitude, you will never understand or gain the truth. Not only will you not gain the truth, but you cause yourself to lose out; you will lose the dignity and duty that a created being should have. If you think, "I'm sticking to my attitude, and no one can do anything about it! I believe that I'm right, so I will stand by my thinking. My ideas are reasonable, so I will stand by them to the end!" sticking to something so unswervingly will not benefit you in any way. God will not change His attitude on account of your resolve or because you hold fast to something. In other words, God will never change His attitude just because you stick to yours. On the contrary, God will assume an attitude toward you that is commensurate with your rebelliousness and unswerving resistance. This is the fourth, and most important, thing. Is there anything you do not understand about these four things? Are any of the things I mentioned just empty words which do not fit with man's real state, and which are of no help to the practical side of man's life? (No, all of them are helpful.) Are any of the things just empty theories, rather than paths to practice? (No.) Are these four things helpful with regard to how people should enter into truth realities in their everyday lives? (Yes, they are.) If you are clear in your understanding of these four things, put them into practice, and experience them, your relationship with God will remain normal. These four things will protect you during various temptations, or when faced with all sorts of people, events, and things. When you are in a rebellious state, think of these aspects of the truth, compare yourself to them, and practice accordingly. If, at first, you are unable to put them into practice, you should pray, and at the same time recognize why God acted as He did. You should also reflect on and recognize what corrupt states and displays you have which are making you unable to practice or submit. If you are able to seek the truth in this way, your state will remain normal, and you will naturally enter into these truth realities.

Regardless of the issue, if you do not understand the truth, you will either be acting on notions and imaginings, or else acting disobediently and resisting. This is onehundred percent certain. Sometimes, from the outside, it may not look like you are resisting God, doing bad things, or causing a disruption or disturbance, but that does not necessarily mean that your actions are in line with the truth. Sometimes, you may act based on notions and imaginings, and while it may not constitute a disturbance or cause damage, so long as it is not in line with the truth, your actions are at odds with God's will. There are other times where you may have notions about God in your mind. Even if you never put them into words, you are holding on to these notions and imaginings inside, thinking that God should do this or that, and dictating how He should be. You have done nothing wrong on the outside, but inside, you are in a state of continual rebelliousness and resistance to God. For example, I just talked about having notions and limiting definitions about God's love. Even if your notions and imaginings have not caused you to create any disturbances or disruptions to God's work, your state proves that your heart is constantly limiting and misunderstanding God. What can we conclude from this? That you are continually resisting God. Do I not speak the truth? (Yes, You do.) If there comes a day when something similar to the Jewish exile from Judea happens, your notions will make you unable to say "Amen" to God's actions, or have praise, fear, or obedience as a response to God's actions. Instead, you will misunderstand, complain, and even be slightly antagonistic toward God in your heart. Deep down inside, you will say to Him, "God, You shouldn't have done that. It was so inconsiderate! How can You treat Your creations this way? How can You treat Your chosen people this way? I can't sing Your praises or applaud Your actions after seeing what You've done. I am suffering inside and feel forlorn, like I can't rely on the God I worship without bounds. The God I believe in is not like this. The God I believe in should not treat His created beings this way. The God I believe in is not this cold-blooded or cruel. The God I believe in treats humans gently and attentively, like babies, making them feel abundantly blessed and full of warmth, not icy cold or indifferent like now." When these laments come up deep inside, you do not view the facts taking place in front of you as being the work of God. You do not admit it or say "Amen," let alone praise it. As such, are your emotions and state that of obedience to God, or opposition? (Opposition.) It is obvious that it is not true obedience. There is no obedience here, only resentment, opposition, disobedience, and even anger. Is this the attitude a created being should have toward its Creator? No, it is not. Your heart is a contradiction; you think, "If God did this, why does my heart not approve? Why do the majority of people not accept it? Why are His actions so inconsiderate toward man, and why are they full of blood and slaughter?" At that moment, the God in your heart and the Creator that actually exists in real life are in contradiction, and at odds with each other, are they not? (Yes, they are.) So in which God should you believe? At this moment, should you choose to believe in the God of the notions deep in your heart, or the God who is performing real actions right in front of you? (The God who is performing real actions right in front of us.) In terms of their subjective wishes, people are very willing to believe in the God who is performing real actions right in front of them, but because of man's notions, selfish desires, and emotions, they choose to cover up the God in their hearts, and force themselves to accept the God who is performing real actions right in front of them. However, deep down inside, they still are unable to accept all the facts of what the Creator is doing; they still keep themselves hidden and live in their own little world, talking to and interacting with the God of their imagination tirelessly, while the real God always seems vague. There are even people who think, "I wish the real God didn't exist. My God is the God I imagine in my heart, who is full of love and makes people feel His warmth. He is the real God. The practical God is not the one I imagined, because the things He does let me down and I can't feel any warmth from Him. In particular, I can't look past how so many people are condemned and cast out by His judgment and chastisement." What kind of person says this? It is what nonbelievers say, and those who do not accept the truth. These are all the various states that occur in people when they do not understand God's works, and when there is a contradiction between what they imagine and what God actually does. So, how do these states occur? For one thing, people have corrupt dispositions; and for another, when something happens and the facts do not match people's notions and imaginings, bursting their bubble, shattering their dream, and making them feel that their intent and desire for blessings cannot be satisfied, what do they finally decide to do? Run away, compromise, or dig in their heels. Some people even sit on the fence, saying, "I will accept both sides. The God that was in my heart originally is God and is love. And the One who is doing great deeds and wielding authority in front of my eyes is also God. I will accept both, and give up neither." People often live in this sort of state, keeping a foot in both camps. People often get caught up in the idea of God in their minds. They run around, expend themselves, make offerings, and work for this vague God. They will pay any price to perform their duties, even giving up their own life and sacrificing everything they have. No matter how people act, or what states arise in them, are people's actions good or evil in the eyes of the real Creator when a God like this exists in their minds? Is it obedience or resistance? Clearly, they are not good deeds and not worth commemorating. It also reveals that people have not truly obeyed or offered themselves up; rather, they are full of resistance, rebelliousness, and opposition. It is precisely because people have these states, and often live within these states, that when people awake from their dream and live in the real world, they realize that the actions of the God in real life are unable to satisfy their psychological and spiritual needs. Rather, His actions cause people to be hurt in various ways, make them feel He is indifferent in various ways, and inconsiderate toward man in various ways. There are even some people who doubt, saying, "Is God love? Does He still love people? It says God is concerned for man and loves him as Himself. Where do you see that? Why have I never seen it?" This is a problem! People often live in these states, causing the contradiction between man and God to become ever more extreme, and the distance between them increasingly wide. When people see God do something that fits with their notions, they think, "My God has done something earth-shattering. He is the God I truly want to believe in. Only He is my God. I am willing to be His created being. Only He is my Creator." However, when difficulties, passivity, or weaknesses arise in their everyday lives, and the God they imagine is not able to help them or fulfill their needs all the time, their faith in God weakens or even disappears. What causes all of these states that people have, and all of the ways in which they act and display themselves? It is because people do not understand the Creator at all. You do not understand Him; that is the only reason. This is the root of all of the contradictions, distance, and misunderstandings between man and God. So, how do people solve this problem? First, they must resolve their notions. Second, people must experience, undergo, seek, and ponder every item of work that God does in them, and get to the point where they are able to completely submit to every arrangement God lays out for them, and to all of the people, events, and things that God orchestrates for them. What is the purpose of submitting? To recognize and understand all of these truths.

Do you find the subject matter that we have just fellowshiped on deep? Can you understand it? Are you able to grasp it? (Yes, we can.) You should be able to understand it in theory, but does understanding it in theory amount to understanding and accepting the truth? (No, it does not.) So what does amount to understanding and accepting the truth? You must frequently examine yourself in your daily lives, but what should you examine? (Examine whether we have the states, or display ourselves in the ways, that God speaks of, and what notions and misunderstandings people have about God.)

Exactly. You must examine these things; examine what corruption you display, and what notions and imaginings you have. Some people say that they are unable to examine themselves. That is easily remedied by looking at others first. Other people are a mirror for yourself. When you see people displaying certain dispositions or states, flip it around, examine yourself, and compare yourself; see if you have these same notions and imaginings, and if you are in the same state. If you are, then what should you do about it? Should you lay yourself bare and dissect these things, or cling to them and wait for them to "blossom and bear fruit"? (We should lay ourselves bare and dissect them.) You must lay these things out and dissect them so that everyone can benefit, so that through it, everyone can accurately recognize corrupt states, understand the truth, find a way out, and resolve these sorts of problems together. What is the point of dissecting notions and passive, negative states? (So that people can find a way out of their notions and passive states.) And what is the point of finding a way out? To gain the truth. The point of fixing your notions is to make you recognize that they are wrong, and that they are not something you should possess. You should let them go, not cling to them. Then, actively seek what is right, what positive things actually are, and what the truth actually is. When you accept positive things and the truth, and treat them as the principles of practice, thinking, and perspectives that you should possess, then there is change, and you will have gained the truth. So, how should people view the Jewish exile from Judea in light of these truths? What common notion do people have about this event? (That God should not have kicked the Jews out of Judea, and that He should have protected the Jews. That no matter how they resisted Him, and despite the fact that they nailed Him to a cross, He should have pardoned them of their sins forever, and that only this is God's love.) These are the notions of man. Are they not absurd? If God acted according to man's notions, would He still have a righteous disposition? Although people were upset about being exiled, their resistance and condemnation of God crossed the line for God; their actions were no different than Satan's, so how could God not be angry about it? Some people cannot accept the truth, and think, "How can God treat people this way? People can't accept this sort of love, it is so inconsiderate toward them! It does not look like love. God has no love if this is how He treats the Jews." This denies God's love, and it is man's notion. What is man's notion? (Man limits his definition of God's love.) Yes, when people limit their definition of something, it is a notion, and it is not in accordance with the truth, nor is it a truth. What have people limited their definition of? They have limited their definition of how God works; they think that God must work in certain ways in order for it to be the work of God, and that these are the ways in which He should work. People have a limited definition of how God works, and this limited definition is their notion. So, what sort of definition do people have of the way God does things? What about their definition makes them feel distaste for how God acted in this situation, and makes them misunderstand and oppose Him? (People think that God should have bestowed an abundance of grace and blessings upon the Jews, but instead, He acted outside of these notions and imaginings, and outside of their expectations; He drove the Jews out and made them wander the earth. People do not understand this, and it gave rise to substantial notions.) Many people have notions and misunderstandings about the actions God took toward the Jews. In other words, people are uncomfortable with God's actions and think He should not have acted that way. Is this a notion? (Yes, it is.) Then, when people think God "should not" have done what He did, is that not limiting their definition of God's actions? How do you know that God should not have acted this way? What is your basis for saying God should not have acted this way? If you think He should not have, but He did, then does that mean God is not God? Does that mean what God did was wrong, and not in line with the truth? Is man not foolish in this respect? Man is exceedingly foolish and ignorant, arrogant and self-righteous; it is the easiest thing for him to form notions about God, and limit his definition of God. If people like this cannot accept the truth it is very dangerous, and they will most likely be cast out.

Many people have notions and opinions about the Jewish exile from Judea, and they do not understand God's intentions, but this is a very easy problem to fix. I will tell you a simple way to do it. Listen, and see if it can address these difficulties of yours. The simplest way, first off, is for people to know that they are created beings, and that it is perfectly natural and justified for created beings to obey their Creator. If created beings constantly have notions about their Creator and cannot submit to Him, then that would be a great disobedience. People must understand that there is a fundamental principle of the Creator's treatment of created beings, which is also the highest principle. How the Creator treats created beings is completely based on His management plan and on His work requirements; He does not need to consult any single person, nor does He need to get any single person to agree with Him. Whatever He ought to do and however He ought to treat people, He does, and, no matter what He does or how He treats people, it all accords with the truth principles, and the principles by which the Creator works. As a created being, the only thing to do is to submit to the Creator; one should not make any choice of one's own. This is reason that created beings ought to have, and if a person does not have it, then they are not fit to be called a person. People must understand that the Creator will always be the Lord of creation; He has the power and the qualifications to orchestrate and rule over any created being as He pleases, and does not need a reason to do so. This is His authority. There is not one among the beings of creation who has the right or is qualified to pass judgment on whether what the Creator does is right or wrong, or how He should act. No creature is entitled to choose whether to accept the rule and arrangements of the Creator; and no creature is entitled to make demands of how the Creator rules over and arranges their fate. This is the highest truth. No matter what the Creator has done to His created beings, and no matter how He has done it, the humans He created should do only one thing: seek, submit, know, and accept everything put in place by the Creator. The final result will be that the Creator will have accomplished His management plan and completed His work, having caused His management plan to progress without any obstructions; meanwhile, because the created beings have accepted the Creator's rule and arrangements, and submitted to His rule and arrangements, they will have gained the truth, understood the Creator's will, and come to know His disposition. There is yet another principle I must tell you: No matter what the Creator does, no matter how He manifests, and no matter whether what He does is a great deed or a small one, He is still the Creator; whereas all mankind, which He created, regardless of what they have done, and regardless of how talented or gifted they might be, remain created beings. As for created humanity, no matter how much grace and how many blessings they have received from the Creator, or how much mercy, lovingkindness, or benevolence, they should not believe themselves to stand apart from the masses, or think they can be on equal footing with God and that they have become highly ranked among created beings. Regardless of how many gifts God has bestowed on you, or how much grace He has given you, or how kindly He has treated you, or whether He has given you a few special talents, none of these are your assets. You are a created being, and you will thus forever be a created being. You must never think, "I am a little darling in the hands of God. God will not ever cast me aside, God's attitude toward me will always be one of love, care and gentle caresses, with warm whispers of comfort and encouragement." To the contrary, in the eyes of the Creator, you are the same as all other created beings; God can use you as He wishes, and can also orchestrate you as He wishes, and He can arrange as He wishes for you to play any role among all sorts of people, events, and things. This is the knowledge people should have, and the good sense that they should possess. If one can understand and accept these words, their relationship with God will grow more normal, and they will establish a most legitimate relationship with Him; if one can understand and accept these words, they will orient their station properly, assume their place there, and uphold their duty.

What do you think after listening to these words? Will you still misunderstand God? Some people say, "Given that God treats people this way, when God said that men are like ants, and less than maggots in His eyes, it looks like this was not just theoretical, but reality! Man is not as dear to God, and God is not as close to man as people imagined." People's hearts turn cold, as though water has been thrown on a flame, and their fervor lessens. Would you say it is better for their hearts to turn cold, or for them to constantly have misunderstandings about God? (It is better for their hearts to turn cold.) Only by cooling off for a while can they understand God's disposition. The sense that created beings should possess, is to use the truth as their principle for everything; they should use the truth as their basis for how they view everything, and they should use the truth as their principle and foundation for everything they do. This is the correct way to be. But on the contrary, people always feel in their hearts that their relationship with God is like their relationship with another person, and that their interactions should be on equal footing. Is this a good situation? (No, it is not.) How is it not? People have put themselves in the wrong position; they do not treat God like God. This is because people have too many misunderstandings about God, but God will not change His attitude as a result of people's misunderstandings or hang-ups. On the contrary, not only will He not change His attitude, but He will continue to work in people according to the principles, just as before, and arrange and reign sovereign over the lives of all humankind. However, man is prone to forming notions about God, and resisting and rebelling against Him, so man must suffer greatly. People want to sidle up to God and pad their connection with Him, and they talk about their feelings, capital, talents, capabilities, how much they have given, their past accomplishments, and every other sort of reason. Can people gain the truth when they always live in these states? No, they cannot. If you do not have a heart of obedience to God, always have incorrect views, are unable to assume the position of a created being, have unbridled ambitions, and always crave a higher position, it will ultimately make you unable to approach your duty properly, or correctly understand God's demands and attitudes toward you. Even though you are constantly being refined and constantly suffering, you are unable to let go of your notions and imaginings, and even think that you are the one God loves the most and is most attached to. As a result, when something real happens to you, and you see that God does not act that way, and that it is just wishful thinking on your part, you experience a setback and feel attacked; you feel resentful and like you have been wronged. Your feelings take a hit, too. Is this suffering worth it? (No, it is not.) People have brought suffering upon themselves because of their wishful thinking, notions, and imaginings. This is the most problematic thing for them, and they need to turn themselves around! How should they go about doing this? By recognizing that God is righteous toward everyone, and that all the works God performs are to save the human race—He has no other agenda. What people should do, is assume the position of a created being, submit to the Creator's sovereignty, orchestrations and arrangements, accept and submit to everything the Creator does, seek the truth and God's will in these things, and recognize God's conduct. If people always use their own notions to appraise and define God's actions, always make unreasonable demands of God, and insist that God do things their way, then they are rebelling against God, and not only are they unable to understand the truth, but ultimately, there will be nothing left but for them to be detested and cast out by God. If people want to be blessed by God, the only thing they need do is seek, submit to, recognize, and accept everything the Creator does. This is the only way for people to understand the truth, know God, achieve true obedience to God, and be saved.

How to Identify the Nature Essence of Paul

You have fellowshiped for quite a long time on the section of God's words titled "Success or Failure Depends on the Path That Man Walks." What issues does it discuss, and what truths does it concern? (It concerns the path man walks as a believer.) The topic mainly revolves around the paths Peter and Paul took, am I right? After fellowshiping for such a long time, I am sure you have gained something from it—probably many things. You must summarize the gist of the sermons you have listened to during this period of time, then sort out the main threads of this, and go experience in line with this way of thinking, and the important things and threads you have summarized. This will help you with how to experience God's work, how to perform your duty properly, and how to testify well in real life. I hope that after you finish summarizing, your life entry and spiritual stature will take a big step forward. So, when you summarize the truth realities that you were supposed to understand from that chapter, will you begin with Paul's experience, or Peter's? (Paul's.) Why? (By reflecting on ourselves based on the reasons that Paul failed, we will know whether we are on Paul's path. Then, we will look at what sort of path Peter was on, so that we have a goal and a direction in which to pursue.) Actually, that is how it should be. Draw lessons and summarize the experiences from everything Paul went through and the road he followed. Understand what road he was on, why God demands believers to follow the right path, and what the right path is. If you can follow the path of pursuing the truth, you will be able to avoid walking astray in reallife situations, as well as while you are experiencing God's work during the performance of your duty. You will also be able to avoid disrupting God's work, mistakenly falling onto the wrong path, or ultimately ending up bringing punishment upon yourself, like Paul did.

Now, in light of Paul's experiences, let's sum up the characteristics of the road he took, the way he believed in God, and the goals and direction he pursued. We will first look at the quality of Paul's humanity and his disposition from these angles. Judging from Paul's life and the stories about what happened to him, there are a few aspects to his disposition: arrogance, self-righteousness, deceitfulness, hatred of the truth, evilness, and ferocity. No matter how many main aspects of Paul's disposition people are able to see or summarize, if you only talk about these aspects of his disposition, you will probably feel it is quite hollow, am I right? When you mention these aspects of his disposition, are they tied to his pursuits, the direction of his life, and the path he followed as a believer? When you talk about his arrogance, do you have any facts to back it up? What makes you see him as arrogant? What makes you see him as deceitful? What makes you see him as having hatred of the truth? If you only summarize the essence of these aspects of his disposition and do not talk about his pursuits, the direction of his life, and the path he followed as a believer, then they are hollow words, and will not have any positive or beneficial use for people now. It is better to speak from the perspective of Paul's pursuits and his path. It is no simple matter to understand a person's essence.

A person's nature essence cannot be deduced when they do nothing, or just do a few unimportant things. You must look at how they regularly display themselves and the intention and motivation behind their actions, that is, look at their pursuits, desires, and the path they follow. An even more important aspect, is to look at how a person handles it when they are faced with a situation that God has designed for them, or when God does something to them personally, like trying them, refining them, pruning and dealing with them, or when God personally illuminates and guides them. God mainly looks at these aspects. What do these aspects pertain to? They pertain to the principles by which a person acts, lives, conducts themselves and interacts with the world, as well as the goals and direction they pursue, the path they follow, how they live, what they live by, and the foundation of their existence. This is what they pertain to. That is why I say that if we avoid all these things and just talk about Paul's nature essence, no matter how much we say or how comprehensive we are, they are just hollow words. If we want to look at Paul's essence from every aspect of who he is, and help people today, or give them a mirror in which to view themselves, then we must first summarize the path that Paul followed, the goals he pursued, the foundation of their existence, and his attitude toward God. If we dissect every aspect of his disposition by approaching it from these angles, then do we not have a basis? Fellowshiping and summarizing in this way, is partially so that you will be able to see Paul more clearly, but mainly so that when people today face God's salvation and sovereignty, they will know how to approach it, and how they should pursue the truth, so that they can avoid following in Paul's footsteps and avoid ending up being punished like him. This is the most effective method.

When you look at all the ways Paul presented himself, you should be able to see his nature essence, and be fully capable of concluding that the direction, goals, source, and motivation for his pursuits were wrong, and that these things were disobedient and resistant toward God, displeased Him, and were despised by God. What is the first main way Paul presented himself? (He labored and worked in exchange for a crown.) Where did you see him present himself in this way, or see that he was in this state? (Through his words.) Through his famous sayings. Usually, famous sayings are positive, and are helpful and beneficial to those with ambition, hope, and aspiration; they can encourage and motivate such people, but what was the function of Paul's famous sayings? He had many. Can you recite one of his more famous ones? ("I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: From now on there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness" (2 Timothy 4:7-8).) What aspect of his nature essence do these words represent? How should we define it according to the truth? (Arrogant, self-righteous, and making a deal with God.) It was his arrogant nature that prompted him to say these words—he would not run the race, work, or even believe in God if there was not a crown at the end of it. After listening to so many sermons, people now should be able to recognize this manifestation and this state that Paul displayed, but can you define it? When we say "summarize," we mean to define something; the words you use to define something are true understanding. When you can accurately define something, it proves that you see the matter clearly; when you cannot define something and only copy other people's definitions, it proves you do not truly understand it. What mindset or state prompted Paul to speak those words at that moment? What intention made him do it? What is the essence of his pursuits that these words show you? (To gain blessings.) He ran hard, expended himself and gave so much of himself because his intention was to gain blessings. That was his nature essence, and what resided in the innermost place of his heart. Just now, while you were dissecting the issue, you said that Paul was making a deal with God. What attitude in Paul does this represent? Right now we are trying to summarize Paul's truest attitude toward a crown, getting blessings, and believing in God; we are not trying to summarize whether Paul was making a deal with God and whether he was a true believer. Tell Me again. (He did not love the truth and was disdainful.) This is not an attitude; it is part of his disposition. Right now we are talking about his attitude. (He was greedy.) This is an aspect of his nature essence, just like his intention to gain blessings, and his desire. What is an attitude? For example, I say that eating spicy things all the time is bad for the stomach, and someone replies, "I know that eating spicy food is bad, but I like to eat spicy food! What can I eat if I don't eat spicy food?" I respond, "For the sake of your health, so long as you don't eat anything spicy, I will give you five dollars every meal to buy something else to eat." Then, they are really happy, and say, "Okay then, I won't eat spicy food!" A deal has been struck and they keep to it. But why are they able to keep themselves from eating spicy food? It is actually because of the money. If I did not give them money, they would not be able to control themselves; they would keep eating spicy food just like before. They have stopped eating spicy food only because there is something to gain from it—money. This is their attitude. This is what is concealed deep within their heart. Have they stopped eating spicy food because they are practicing the truth, doing as they were told, or doing it in order to please God? (No.) No, it is for none of those reasons. They have not restrained themselves from eating spicy food because they are practicing the truth, or with an eye to their health; their attitude is deceptive and superficial; they view it as a transaction, and are doing it to curry favor. If they do not achieve their objective and do not receive the money, they will go back to eating what they want, and may even eat more than before. This may not be the most fitting example, but what similarities are there when we compare it to Paul? (It is similar to how Paul was motivated by obtaining blessings and struck a deal with God.) Paul saw fighting the good fight, running the race, working, expending himself, and even watering the church as chips he could use in exchange for the crown of righteousness, and as paths toward it. So, no matter whether he suffered, expended himself, or ran the race, no matter how much he suffered, the only goal in his mind was to obtain the crown of righteousness. He treated pursuing the crown of righteousness and pursuing blessings as the appropriate objective of believing in God, and suffering, expending himself, working, and running the race as paths toward it. All of his outwardly good behavior was done for show; he did it in exchange for getting blessings in the very end. This is the first of Paul's major sins.

Everything Paul said and did, what he displayed, the intention and goal of both his work and the race he ran, as well as his attitude toward both—is there anything about these things that is in keeping with the truth? (No, there is not.) There is nothing in him that is in keeping with the truth, and nothing he did was in line with what the Lord Jesus instructed people to do, but did he reflect on this? (No, he did not.) He never reflected on it at all, nor did he seek, so what basis did he have for assuming his thinking was correct? (His notions and imaginings.) There is an issue with this; how could he make something he imagined the goal that he would pursue for his entire life? Did he ever give it any consideration or ask himself, "Is what I think correct? Other people do not think this way, just me. Is this a problem?" Not only did he not have these doubts, but he wrote his thoughts in letters and sent them to all the churches, so that everyone could read them. What is the nature of this behavior? There is a problem with this; why did he never question whether his thinking was in line with the truth, seek the truth, or compare it to what the Lord Jesus said? Instead, he treated what he imagined, and what he thought was right in his notions as the goals he should pursue. What is the problem here? He treated what he imagined and what he thought was right as the truth, and as a goal to be pursued. Is this not exceedingly arrogant and self-righteous? Did God still have a place in his heart? Was he still able to treat God's words as the truth? If he was unable to treat God's words as the truth, then what would be his attitude toward God? Did he want to be God as well? If not, he would not treat what he imagined in his own thoughts and notions as goals which he should pursue, nor would he pursue his notions or what he imagined as if they were the truth. He believed that what he thought was the truth, and that it was in line with the truth and God's will. He also shared what he thought was correct with the brothers and sisters in the churches, and instilled it in them, making everyone abide by the ridiculous things he said; he replaced the Lord Jesus' words with his own, and used these ridiculous words of his to testify that for him to live is Christ. Is this not the second major sin that Paul had? This problem is extremely severe!

There have been many people throughout the ages that resemble Paul, so why do we use Paul as a classic example? Because he is recorded in the Bible, and the ridiculous, evil things he said, as well as he himself, have a huge impact on all Christians. You could say that the harm he has caused is too great. There are so many people who have been deceived and poisoned by him. Not only has he poisoned many generations of people, but the poison goes deep. How deep? (All Christians see him as a role model and imitate him; they practice his words as if they were God's.) If you fellowship on Christ's words and God's words, no one makes much of a deal about it. But when you fellowship on Paul's words, they immediately sit up and listen. What does this mean? (That they treat Paul like Christ.) When people treat Paul like Christ, he has taken the Lord Jesus Christ's place in their hearts. Is this not a sin of extreme proportions? (It is.)

Paul is the biggest antichrist in history! The intention of his words is exceedingly obvious; his goals and insidiousness are clearly on display; his essence is exceedingly insidious and poisonous. The nature of this is severely problematic! That is why I had to bring it up and dissect it. If I did not, people would continue to be deceived by him. However, if I was going to dissect Paul's issues, I had to make him serve a better purpose for people today, as an example of what not to do. Just now we summarized two of Paul's sins. What was the first? (Paul treated work and running the race as chips that he could trade in for a crown. He viewed obtaining blessings and a crown as an appropriate goal that he should be pursuing.) That is correct. Paul's biggest problem was that he treated these things as goals he should pursue. From the start, it was a transaction that carried with it disobedience and an evil nature, but Paul treated it as an appropriate goal to pursue. This is the most severe problem. What was the second? (Paul treated the things he imagined, and that he thought were right in his notions, as the truth. He never reflected on this or sought concerning it; instead, he deceived people, and made the brothers and sisters adhere to his words and absurd theories, making people treat him like Christ.) This is a particularly serious issue. Make accurate note of these issues; after we are finished summarizing them, you should compare yourselves to them. When we discuss a topic, we must first talk about that particular aspect of the truth, then make comparisons. Dissecting how Paul displayed himself serves as a warning to everyone, as well as tells people that they should choose the correct path, then find an accurate path of practice and avoid following in Paul's footsteps. Then, you will be completely effective.

Paul has another serious sin, and that is that he did his work completely on the basis of his mental caliber, academic knowledge, theological knowledge and theory. This is something which pertains to his nature essence. You should summarize this, and then examine what his attitude is toward these things. This is a very crucial and important sin, and one that people must understand. Ponder for a moment on which of Paul's manifestations this sin involves; look at what his nature essence is through these manifestations, and get a clear picture of what he placed importance on deep down inside, what his goals are. His intention and goals are at the root of why he started down the wrong path. These are the most important things for you to understand clearly. What gifts did Paul have? (Paul had a good grasp of a lot of biblical knowledge from the Age of Law.) Only the Old Testament existed at that time. Paul was familiar with these scriptures, and was very knowledgeable about them, like the theological teachers, pastors, preachers, and fathers of today. His theological knowledge may even have been broader than theirs, but he learned it after he was born into the world. What did Paul possess from birth? (His innate abilities.) Paul was naturally smart, good at speaking, expressed himself well, and did not get stage fright. Let us focus now on talking about his innate abilities, gifts, intelligence, capabilities, as well as the knowledge he learned throughout his life. What does the fact that he was good at speaking mean? In what way did he display and present himself? He liked to ramble on about lofty theories; he constantly talked about profound spiritual doctrine, theories and knowledge, and his famous texts and sayings that people often mention. What is one word that sums up Paul's words? (Empty.) Are empty words constructive for people? When they hear those words, they feel emboldened, but after a while their gusto fades away. The things Paul talked about were vague and illusory, things you cannot really lay out in concrete terms. In the theories he talked about, you cannot find any path to practice, or direction in which to practice; you cannot find anything you can accurately apply to real life—whether theories or foundations, none are applicable to real life. That is why I say that the religious theories and spiritual doctrine he talked about were empty, impractical words. What was Paul's goal in talking about these things? Some people say, "He always talked about these things because he wanted to suck more people in, and make them revere and look up to him. He wanted to take the place of the Lord Jesus and win over more people, so that he would be blessed." Is this the topic that we want to talk about today? (No, it is not.) It is exceedingly normal for a person who has not been pruned or dealt with, has not been judged or chastised, has not gone through trials or refinement, who has gifts like his, and has the nature essence of an antichrist to show off like this and exhibit the behavior he did, so we will not delve into this matter. What are we going to delve into? The essence of this problem of his, the root cause and motivation behind him doing these things, and what prompted him to act this way. No matter whether people today would view all the things he talked about as doctrine, theories, theological knowledge, innate gifts, or his own interpretation of things, generally speaking, Paul's biggest problem was that he treated things that came from human will as the truth. That is why he had the guts to use these theological theories decisively, boldly, and openly to suck people in and teach them. This is the essence of the problem. Is this a serious problem? (Yes, it is.) What things did he treat as the truth? The gifts he was born with, as well as the knowledge and theological theories he learned throughout life. His theological theories were learned from teachers, from reading the scriptures, and also generated from what he understood and imagined. He treated the notions and imaginings of his human understanding as the truth, but this was not the most serious problem, there was one even greater. He treated those things as the truth, but did he think at the time that those things were the truth? Did he have a concept of what the truth was? (No, he did not.) Then what did he treat those things as? (As life.) He treated all of those things as life. He thought that the more sermons he could preach, or the more lofty, the greater his life would be. He treated those things as life. Is this a serious matter? (Yes, it is serious.) What impact did this have? (It had an impact on the path he followed.) This is one side of it. What else? (He thought that obtaining these things would bring him salvation and allow him to enter the kingdom of heaven.) It still has to do with obtaining blessings; he thought that the greater his life was, the greater his chances of entering the kingdom of heaven and ascending to heaven. What is another way of saying "ascending to heaven"? (To reign and wield power alongside God.) His purpose in entering the kingdom of heaven was to reign and wield power alongside God, but this was not his ultimate goal, he had one more. He talked about it. How did he put it? ("For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain" (Philippians 1:21).) He said for him to live is Christ, and to die is gain. What does this mean? That he will turn into God after he dies? His ambition knows no limits! His problem is so severe! So, is it wrong for us to dissect Paul's case? Not at all. He should never have treated his gifts and the knowledge he learned as life. This is his third major sin. You can see Paul's nature essence in any one of these three sins. The characteristics of his nature essence are exposed in each of the sins; nothing is hidden or left out. His nature essence is represented in all of them.

Next, we will look at Paul's most crucial and severe problems, which are most representative of him. In the letters Paul wrote, what words did he often use? Go and look at what the original text of the Bible says, and we will analyze and dissect it, see what was actually in his mind, and why God despised and hated him. Why did someone as famous and instrumental to the work of the early churches as Paul end up being punished? How did God evaluate Paul in His mind? How did God see him? Why did God evaluate him in this way, and pass the verdict that He did? On what basis did God ultimately define Paul and determine his end? List all of these things out so that people can see the facts of how he resisted God, so they will not think he was wrongfully condemned. When people do not understand the truth, they are the most prone to defining people based on outward appearances. What is people's basis for defining others according to their outward appearance? Part of it is traditional culture and societal teachings. Another part is education in the home, black-and-white ideas and concepts, and ideas and concepts of right and wrong. Yet another part is the education in schools. Together, these things constitute an entirely satanic system of education. The consequence of Satan instilling these things in people is that people define this as good, that as bad, this as right, and that as wrong according to their own notions and preferences. What is the basis for all these definitions people have? In actuality, they are based on satanic theories and philosophies; these bases that people have absolutely do not come from God or from the truth. That is why corrupted humans are wrong no matter how they define a person or event—it has no connection with the truth, and is not in line with God's will; it has nothing to do with God or His words. God passes verdicts on people and events according to His disposition and essence. What is God's disposition and essence? It is the truth. The truth is the expression of all positive things, and the reality of all positive things. God passes verdicts on everything in existence, and all the people, matters, and things that people come into contact with, in accordance with the truth. God bases His verdicts about people on their nature essence, what motivates their actions, the path they are walking, and their attitude toward positive things and the truth. This is the basis for God's conclusions. God's verdicts on all things accord with the truth. What is Satan's basis for defining all things? (Its own logic.) Satanic philosophy and logic, which is exactly opposite to the truth. All of humanity is corrupted by Satan.

Humans do not have the truth; they represent Satan and embody it. They define all things in accordance with satanic philosophies and logic. Therefore, what conclusions do they reach when they define things? Conclusions that are exactly opposite, and in opposition, to the truth. Have you found the words that Paul often used in his letters? Read them out. ("Paul called to be an apostle of Jesus Christ through the will of God" (1 Corinthians 1:1).) See? This is how Paul ranks God and Christ: "Paul called to be an apostle of Jesus Christ through the will of God." Where is Paul in this ranking? (Third.) In Paul's mind, who is number one? (God.) And number two? (The Lord Jesus.) Jesus Christ. Who is third? (Paul himself.) It is himself. "Paul called to be an apostle of Jesus Christ through the will of God." Paul used this phrase often, and it is a loaded phrase. For starters, we know that Paul is an apostle of the Lord Jesus Christ. So, from Paul's perspective, who is the Lord Jesus Christ? He is the Son of man, and second to the God in heaven. No matter whether he called the Lord Jesus Christ Master or called Him the Lord, from Paul's perspective, the Christ on earth was not God, but rather a man who could teach people and get them to follow Him. What was Paul's function as an apostle of a man such as this? To share the gospel, visit churches, preach sermons, and write letters. He believed he was doing these things on behalf of the Lord Jesus Christ. In his heart, he thought, "I will help You by going where You are not able to go, and I will take a look on Your behalf at the places You do not want to go." This was Paul's concept of an apostle. The ranking in his mind, was that both he and the Lord Jesus were regular people. He saw himself and the Lord Jesus Christ as equals, as human beings. In his mind, there was essentially no difference between their positions, nor was there a difference in their identities, let alone their ministries. Only their names, ages, family circumstances and backgrounds were different, and they had different external gifts and knowledge. In Paul's mind, he was the same as the Lord Jesus Christ in every other way, and could be called the Son of man, too. The only reason he was second to the Lord Jesus Christ was because he was the apostle of the Lord Jesus; he exercised the Lord Jesus Christ's power, and was sent to visit churches and do church work by the Lord Jesus Christ. This is what Paul believed his position and identity was as an apostle—this is how he interpreted it. Also, the second word at the beginning of the phrase, "Paul called to be an apostle of Jesus Christ" is "called." From this word we can see Paul's mindset. Why did he use the six words "called ... through the will of God"? He did not think that he was called by the Lord Jesus Christ to be His apostle; he thought, "The Lord Jesus Christ does not have the power to order me to do anything. I am not doing as He commanded; I am not doing anything for Him. Rather, I am doing these things through the will of God in heaven. I am the same as the Lord Jesus Christ." This indicates another thing—Paul thought he was a Son of man, just like the Lord Jesus Christ. The six words "called ... through the will of God" reveal how Paul denied and doubted the identity of the Lord Jesus Christ in the depths of his heart. Paul said he was an apostle of the Lord Jesus Christ through the will of God, that God told him to, he was ordained and established by

God, and that he became an apostle of the Lord Jesus Christ because God called him and willed it. In Paul's mind, that was the relationship between himself and the Lord Jesus Christ. However, this is not even the worst part of it. What is the worst part? That Paul thought he was the Lord Jesus Christ's apostle through God's will, not the Lord Jesus Christ's, that it was not the Lord Jesus who called him, but God in heaven who made him do it. He thought no one had the power or qualifications to make him an apostle of the Lord Jesus Christ, that only God in heaven had that power, and that he was being guided directly by God in heaven. So, what does this indicate? That deep in Paul's heart, he believed that God in heaven was number one, and he himself was number two. So where did he put the Lord Jesus? (In the same position as himself.) This is the problem. With his lips, he proclaimed that the Lord Jesus was the Christ, but he did not recognize that Christ's essence was that of God; he did not understand the relationship between Christ and God. It was this lack of understanding that caused such a severe problem. In what way was it severe? (He did not admit that the Lord Jesus was God incarnate. He denied the Lord Jesus.) Yes, that is really severe. He denied that the Lord Jesus Christ was God become flesh, that the Lord Jesus Christ was the flesh of God when He had come down from heaven to earth, and that the Lord Jesus was God's incarnated flesh. Does this not imply that Paul denied the existence of the God on earth? (Yes, it does.) If he denied the existence of the God on earth, then could he acknowledge the Lord Jesus' words? (No, he could not.) If he did not acknowledge His words, then could he accept it? (No, he could not.) He did not accept the Lord Jesus Christ's words, teachings, or identity, so could he accept the Lord Jesus Christ's work? (No, he could not.) He did not accept the work the Lord Jesus Christ did, or the fact that the Lord Jesus Christ was God, yet this was not the worst part. What was the worst part? Two thousand years ago, the Lord Jesus came to earth to do the biggest work of all—the work of redemption in the Age of Grace, where He was incarnated and became the likeness of sinful flesh, and was nailed to the cross as a sin offering for all mankind. Was this a big work? (Yes, it was.) It was the work of redeeming all mankind, and it was done by God Himself, yet Paul stubbornly denied it. He denied that the work of redemption the Lord Jesus did was done by God Himself, which was denying the fact that God had already accomplished the work of redemption. Is this a serious problem? It is extremely serious! Not only did Paul not seek to understand the fact of the Lord Jesus Christ's crucifixion, but he did not admit it, and to not admit it is to deny it. He did not admit that it was God who was crucified and redeemed all mankind, nor did he admit that God served as a sin offering for all mankind. This implies that he did not admit that all of mankind was redeemed after God did His work, or that their sins were pardoned. At the same time, he thought that his sins had not been pardoned. He did not admit the fact that the Lord Jesus redeemed mankind. From his standpoint, that had all been erased. This is the most serious issue. Just now, I mentioned that Paul was the biggest antichrist in the past two thousand years; this fact has already been revealed. If these facts had not been recorded in the Bible, and God said that Paul defied God and was an antichrist, would people believe it? They absolutely would not. Thankfully, the Bible kept a record of Paul's letters, and there is factual proof here in those letters; otherwise, there would be nothing to back up what I am saying, and you may not accept it. Now, when we bring Paul's words out and read them, how did Paul view all the things the Lord Jesus said? He thought the things the Lord Jesus said were not equal to even one of Paul's own religious doctrines. So, after the Lord Jesus had left this world, although Paul spread the gospel, worked, preached, and shepherded churches, he never preached the Lord Jesus' words, let alone practiced or experienced them. Instead, he preached his own understanding of the Old Testament, which was out-of-date and empty words. For the last two thousand years, those who believe in the Lord do so in accordance with the Bible, and everything they accept is Paul's empty theories. As a result, people have been in the dark for two thousand years. If you say to a group of religious people today that Paul was wrong, they will protest and will not accept it, because they all look up to Paul. Paul is their idol and their founding father, and they are Paul's filial sons and descendants. To what extent have they been deceived? They are already standing on the same side as Paul in opposition to God; they have the same views as Paul, the same nature essence, and the same method of pursuit. They have been thoroughly assimilated by Paul. This is Paul's fourth major sin. Paul denied the Lord Jesus Christ's identity, and he denied the work God did in the Age of Grace after the Age of Law. This is the most serious thing. Another serious thing is that he put himself in the same league as the Lord Jesus Christ. In the age Paul lived in, he met the Lord Jesus Christ but did not see Him as God; instead, he treated the Lord Jesus Christ as a regular person, as though He was just another member of the human race; a man who had the same nature essence as corrupted humans. In no way did Paul treat the Lord Jesus as the Christ, let alone treat Him as God. This is a very serious matter. So why would Paul do this? (He did not recognize that God incarnate possessed the essence of God, so he did not treat the Lord Jesus Christ as God.) (He did not see the Lord Jesus' words as the truth, nor see that the Lord Jesus Christ was the embodiment of the truth.) (On the surface, Paul professed to believe in the Lord Jesus, but what he actually believed in was a vague God in heaven.) (He did not seek the truth, so he was incapable of realizing that Christ was the truth and the life.) Keep going. (Paul said that for him to live was Christ. He wanted to become God and replace the Lord Jesus.) Everything you have said lines up with the facts. Each of the ways in which Paul manifested himself, and each of his sins, were more severe than that which came before.

Let us analyze this phrase Paul said: "There is laid up for me a crown of righteousness." These are impressive words. Look at the words he chose: "a crown of righteousness." Usually, it is quite bold to use the word "crown" itself, but who would dare use "righteousness" as an attributive expression to define a crown? Only Paul would dare to use this word. Why did he use it? This word has an origin, and it was carefully chosen; there are deep connotations behind his words! What connotations? (He was trying to force God's hand with this word.) Wanting to force God's hand is one aspect of it. His intention was definitely to make a transaction, and there's an element of trying to set conditions with God to it too. Besides this, was there a purpose behind why he always preached about this crown of righteousness? (He wanted to deceive people, and make them think that if he did not get a crown, God was not righteous.) There's an element of incitation and deception to him preaching about this, and this is connected to Paul's desires and ambitions. In order to ultimately materialize and fulfill his desire of obtaining a crown of righteousness, he used the tactic of preaching about it everywhere. In part, his goal in preaching these words was to incite and deceive people; it was to instill a particular thought in those listening, namely, "Someone like me who expends so much of himself, who travels around so much, and pursues the way I do will be able to get a crown of righteousness." After listening to this, people naturally felt that God was only righteous if a person like Paul received a crown. They felt that they must pursue, travel around, and expend themselves like Paul did, that they could not listen to the Lord Jesus, and that Paul was the benchmark, he was the Lord, and he was the direction and the goal toward which people should walk. They also thought that if people did things the way Paul did, they would get the same crown, end, and destination as him. In one respect, Paul was inciting and deceiving people. In another respect, he had a most sinister goal. Deep in his heart, he thought, "In the unlikely circumstances that I do not get a crown, where it turns out to just have been my own imagining and my own wishful thinking, this will mean that everyone who believes in Christ, including myself, was misguided in their faith. It will mean that no God exists on earth, and I will also deny Your existence in heaven too, God, and You won't be able to do anything about it!" What he was implying was: "If I do not get this crown, not only will the brothers and sisters deny You, but I will prevent You from gaining all the people I have incited and who know these words. I will also prevent them from gaining You, and at the same time, I will deny Your existence as God in heaven. You are not righteous. If I, Paul, cannot get a crown, no one should!" This was the sinister part of Paul. Is this not the behavior of an antichrist? This is the behavior of an antichrist demon: inciting, deceiving, and enticing people, as well as openly clamoring against God and opposing Him. Deep in his heart, Paul thought, "If I do not get a crown, God is not righteous. If I get a crown, only then is it a crown of righteousness, and only then is God's righteousness truly righteous." This is the origin of his "crown of righteousness." What was he doing by this? He was openly inciting and deceiving those who followed God. At the same time, he was using these methods to openly clamor against and oppose God. In other words, his behavior was rebellious. What was its nature? On the surface, the words Paul used seem genteel and proper, and there doesn't seem to be anything wrong with them—who would not believe in God in order to get a crown of righteousness and be blessed? Even people with no caliber, at the very least, believe in God in order to get into heaven. They would be happy even if they were asked to sweep the streets or to guard a gate there. Having this intention and objective in one's belief in God can be considered proper and understandable. However, that was not Paul's only objective. He put in a lot of effort, spent a lot of energy, and made a lot of fuss when it came to him preaching about his crown of righteousness. The things Paul said exposed his malicious nature, as well as hidden, dark things deep within himself. At the time, Paul made a big name for himself and there were many people who idolized him. He went around everywhere preaching these theories and high-sounding ideas, his notions and imaginings, as well as the things he had learned in his studies, and the things he had deduced using his mind. When Paul preached these things everywhere, how big of an impact must it have had on people back then, and how severely must it have harmed and poisoned them deep in their hearts? Also, how big of an impact has it had on the people in later generations who learned these things from his letters? People who have read his words cannot rid themselves of these things no matter how long they try—they have been poisoned too deeply! How deep? A phenomenon has appeared, called the "Paul Effect." What is the Paul Effect? There is a phenomenon in religion where people are influenced by Paul's thoughts, views, arguments, and the corrupt dispositions he revealed. It particularly affects people whose families have believed in God for several generations—families who have followed Christ for many decades. They say, "Our family has believed in the Lord for generations, and does not follow worldly trends. We have distanced ourselves from the secular world, and given up our families and careers to expend ourselves for God. Everything we do is the same as Paul did. If we do not receive crowns or get into heaven, we will have a bone to pick with God when He comes." Don't people make this argument? (Yes, they do.) And this trend is quite significant. Where does this trend come from? (From what Paul preached.) It is the malignant result of the tumor Paul planted. If Paul did not incite people like this, and did not always say, "There is laid up for me a crown of righteousness" and "To me to live is Christ," then without the backdrop of that era of history, people now would not have any knowledge of those things. Even if they had that way of thinking, they would not have Paul's gall. It was all due to Paul's encouragement and incitement. If there comes a day when they are not blessed, these people will have the boldness to openly challenge the Lord Jesus, and will even want to march up to the third heaven and dispute this matter with the Lord. Is this not the religious world rebelling against the Lord Jesus? It is clear that the religious world has been severely impacted by Paul! Now that I have talked up to this point, you can conclude what Paul's fifth sin was, can't you? When it comes to summarizing the origin of the "crown of righteousness" Paul spoke of, the focus is on the word "righteousness." Why did he mention "righteousness"? On earth, it was because he wanted to incite and deceive God's chosen people, so they would think the way he did. In heaven, he wanted to force God's hand with this word, and clamor against Him. This was Paul's goal. Although he never vocalized this, the word "righteousness" already completely betrayed his goal and inclination to clamor against

God. It was already out in the open; these are all facts. Based on these facts, can Paul's nature essence be summed up just as being arrogant, self-righteous, deceitful, and not loving the truth? (No.) These terms cannot sum it up. By Me bringing up these facts and dissecting, analyzing, and defining them, you should be able to see Paul's nature essence more clearly and thoroughly. This is the effect that is achieved by analyzing an essence based on the facts. When Paul clamored against God, he was not having a minor emotional moment, a bit of a rebellious disposition, or an inability to obey, in private. This was not an average problem of revealing a corrupt disposition; rather, it had escalated to openly using all sorts of methods to incite and deceive people through letters and in public settings, so that everyone rose up together in anger to oppose and clamor against God. Not only did Paul clamor against God, but he incited everyone else to come clamor against God too—he was not just arrogant, he was a devil! This sin is more serious than the last. Is it a good thing or a bad thing that we are talking about increasingly serious sins? (It is good.) How is it good? (Because we are gaining more discernment of Paul.) When you have more discernment, you will be able to thoroughly unearth and clearly see Paul's various manifestations, revelations of corruption, and his true face. By doing this will you have achieved our goal? (No, we won't have.) You should take all the manifestations of Paul that we have summarized, as well as their main content, themes, and essence, and connect them to yourself and those around you. When you have seen clearly exactly how big a difference there is between the path you walk and your own essence compared with Paul's, you will have completely achieved results, and you will have achieved our goal of dissecting Paul. There are some who say, "There aren't any manifestations of Paul's pursuit of a crown of righteousness in me." Your manifestations and your essence may not be as severe as those of Paul, but there is some overlap between your essence and his. He possessed manifestations like this, and you possess states like this. It can be said that Paul's manifestations were a 10 or a 12 on the scale, so what about you? (I'm at a seven or an eight.) Paul revealed these things at all times, and was filled with these things at all times. While you may not reveal these things all the time, you still reveal them often. You probably spend half your life doing these things, and living in these states. Especially when God puts you in trials, when God's work does not match your notions, when He deals with you, and when the environments He orchestrates for you do not meet your expectations, it may give rise to these sorts of states within you; you might clamor against God and oppose Him. At times like that, our analysis of how Paul incited and deceived people could be of use to you. Why? Because now, your mind is aware of how severe Paul's manifestations were in nature; they were not simple revelations of corrupt dispositions, but rather a devilish nature essence that opposes God. When states like this arise in you, you will know just how serious this problem is. You should then turn back, repent, and abandon this incorrect state. You should walk away from it, seek the truth, and seek a path of obedience to God. That is the true path that humans should follow, and the law that created beings should hold to. This fellowship is of help to people.

Paul has another famous phrase—what is it? ("For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain" (Philippians 1:21).) He did not acknowledge the identity of the Lord Jesus Christ, that the Lord Jesus Christ was the incarnate God living on earth, or the fact that the Lord Jesus Christ was the embodiment of God. By contrast, Paul saw himself as Christ. Isn't that revolting? (It is.) It is revolting, and the essence of this problem is very severe. In Paul's mind, who exactly was Christ? What was His identity? How could Paul be so obsessed with being Christ? If, in Paul's mind, Christ was an ordinary person with corrupt dispositions, or an insignificant person who played an unremarkable role, who had no power, no noble identity, and no abilities or skills that surpassed those of ordinary people, would Paul still want to be Christ? (No, he would not.) He certainly would not. He thought of himself as well-educated, and did not want to be an ordinary person, he wanted to be a superhuman, great man, and to surpass others—how could he wish to be a Christ that other people considered humble and insignificant? Given this, what status and role did Christ have in Paul's heart? What identity and status must someone have, and what authority, power, and bearing must they display in order to be Christ? This exposes what Paul imagined Christ to be, and what he knew about Christ, that is, how he defined Christ. This is why Paul had the ambition and desire to be Christ. There is a certain reason why Paul wanted to be Christ, and it is partly revealed in his letters. Let us analyze several matters. When the Lord Jesus was performing work, He did some things which represented His identity as Christ. These things are symbols and concepts that Paul saw the identity of Christ as possessing. What things were these? (Performing signs and wonders.) Exactly. Those things were Christ healing people of their illnesses, casting out demons, and performing signs, wonders, and miracles. Even though Paul admitted that the Lord Jesus was Christ, it was just because of the signs and wonders that He performed. Therefore, when Paul spread the gospel of the Lord Jesus, he never talked about the words the Lord Jesus spoke, or what He preached. In the eyes of Paul, a nonbeliever, the fact that Christ could say so many things, preach so much, perform so much work, and get so many people to follow Him, lent a certain honor to the Lord Jesus' identity and status; He had limitless glory and nobleness, making the Lord Jesus' position among men particularly great and distinguished. This is what Paul saw. From what the Lord Jesus Christ manifested and revealed while performing work, as well as His identity and essence, what Paul saw was not God's essence, truth, way, or life, nor God's loveliness or wisdom. What did Paul see? To use a modern turn of phrase, what he saw was the glitter of fame, and he wanted to be a fan of the Lord Jesus. When the Lord Jesus spoke or performed work, so many people listened—how glorious must that have been! This was something that Paul had long-awaited, he coveted the arrival of this moment. He longed for the day when he could preach without end like the Lord Jesus, who had so many people looking at Him in rapt attention, with admiration and longing in their eyes, wanting to follow Him. Paul was bowled over by the Lord Jesus' impressive bearing. Actually, he was not truly bowled over by it; rather, he envied having an identity and bearing which people looked up to, paid attention to, idolized, and thought highly of. This is what he envied. So how could he achieve it? He did not believe the Lord Jesus Christ achieved these things through His essence and identity, but believed that it was because of His title. Therefore, Paul longed to be a personage, and to have a role, where he could bear the name of Christ. Paul put a lot of effort into getting himself into a role like that, didn't he? (Yes.) What efforts did he go to? He preached all over the place, and even performed miracles. Ultimately, he used a phrase to define himself which satisfied his inner desires and ambitions. What phrase did he use to define himself? ("For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain.") To live is Christ. This is the main thing he wanted to accomplish; his chief desire was to be Christ. What connection does this desire have to his personal pursuits and the path he walked? (He revered power, and sought to have people look up to him.) This is a theory; you should speak about some facts. Paul manifested his desire to be Christ in practical ways; My definition of him is not just based on a single phrase that he said. From the style, methods, and principles of his actions, we can see that everything he did revolved around his goal of becoming Christ. This is the root and essence of why Paul said and did so many things. Paul wanted to be Christ, and this influenced his pursuits, his path in life, and his belief. In what ways was this influence manifested? (Paul showed off and testified to himself in all of his work and preaching.) This is one way; Paul showed off at every turn. He made it clear to people how he had suffered, how he did things, and what his intentions were, so that when people heard this, they thought he resembled Christ to a tee, and truly wanted to call him Christ. That was his goal. If people truly did call him Christ, would he have denied it? Would he have rejected it? (No, he would not.) He definitely would not have—he would certainly have been elated. This is one way the influence it had on his pursuits manifested. What other ways were there? (He wrote letters.) Yes, he wrote some letters so that they would be passed down through the ages. In his letters, work, and throughout the process of him shepherding churches, he never once mentioned the Lord Jesus Christ's name, or did things in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, or exalted the Lord Jesus Christ's name. What negative effect did him always working and speaking in this way have? How did it influence those who followed the Lord Jesus? It made people deny the Lord Jesus Christ, and Paul took His place. He longed for people to ask, "Who is the Lord Jesus Christ? I've never heard of Him. We believe in Paul the Christ." That way he would be happy. This was his goal, and one of the things he sought after. One way that influence manifested was the way he worked; he rambled on about hollow ideas, and talked endlessly about empty theories to make people see how capable and compelling he was in his work, how much he helped people, and that he had a certain bearing, as though the Lord Jesus Christ had reappeared. Another way that influence manifested was that he never exalted the Lord Jesus Christ, and he certainly did not exalt His name, nor did he testify to the Lord Jesus Christ's words and work, or how people benefited from them. Did Paul preach sermons about how people should repent? He certainly didn't do that. Paul never preached about the work the Lord Jesus Christ performed, the words He spoke, or all the truths He taught people—Paul denied these things in his heart. Not only did Paul deny the words the Lord Jesus Christ said and the truths He taught people, but he treated his own words, work, and teachings as the truth. He used these things to replace the words of the Lord Jesus, and made people practice and adhere to his words as though they were the truth. What prompted these manifestations and revelations? (His wish to be Christ.) They were prompted by his intention, desire, and ambition to be Christ. This was closely connected to his practice and pursuits. This is Paul's sixth sin. Is it a serious one? (Yes, it is.) Actually, all of his sins are serious. They all spell death.

Now I will fellowship on Paul's seventh sin. This one is even more serious. Before Paul was called by the Lord, he was a believer in Judaism. Judaism is the belief in Jehovah God. What concept do those who believe in Jehovah God have of God? It is of the things their forefathers experienced when Jehovah God led them out of Egypt to the good land of Canaan: how Jehovah God appeared to Moses, how He sent ten plagues down on Egypt, how He used pillars of cloud and fire to lead the Israelites, and how He gave them His laws, and so on. Did those who believed in Judaism at the time think all these things were just fantasy, notions, and legends, or did they think they were facts? At the time, God's chosen people and those who were true followers believed and acknowledged that God in heaven existed and was real. They thought, "The fact that God created humankind is true. No matter how long ago it happened, this fact remains true. Not only must we believe it, but we must be certain, and share this fact. This is our responsibility and our obligation." However, another group of people who were nonbelievers felt that these things were likely just legends. No one tried to verify the stories or research whether they were real or fictional, they just half believed them. When they needed God, they hoped He was real and could grant them what they pursued, prayed, and yearned for; when they prayed to God hoping to get something, they hoped this God existed. By doing this, they were just treating God like a psychological crutch. They did not see the fact that God saves man, nor did they accept the truths God expressed. This was not true belief in God; they were already nonbelievers. How did the most inferior type of person manifest themselves? All they did was serve God at church, make offerings to Him, follow all the rituals, and even believe all sorts of legends. However, God was not in their heart, and the God of their notions and imaginings was vague and hollow. What did a person like this believe in? Materialism. They only believed in things they could see. In their eyes, the stuff of legends, vague things, and anything in the spiritual realm that they could not touch with their hands, see with their eyes, or hear with their ears did not exist. Some people say, "Then, do they believe in the existence of things they cannot see, like microorganisms?" They absolutely believe in those things. They absolutely believe in science, electrons, microbiology, and chemistry. Nonbelievers believe those things are true more than anything. They are true materialists. We are talking about this in order to analyze these three types of people: true believers, those who half believe, and materialists who do not believe in the existence of God at all. Some people say, "Is there really a God? Where is He? What does He look like? I heard that God is in the third heaven. So, how high up is the third heaven? How far away is it, and how big is it? People also say there is a heaven, and that it is paved with gold bricks and jade tiles, and that the walls are gold too. How could there be such a wonderful place? It's nonsense! I heard that in the Age of Law, God gave His laws to His chosen people, and that the tablets of the laws still exist. That's probably all just legend, something the ruling class uses to control the masses." Does this group of people have true belief in God? (No, they do not.) They do not believe that God really exists, or the fact that He created humans and has led humankind up until the present day. So, why do they still serve in the church? (Because they treat serving God as a job and a meal ticket.) That's right. They see it as a job and a meal ticket. So, which type of person was Paul? (The third type.) This is connected to his nature essence. Paul liked to ramble on about empty theories. He liked empty things, vague things and things which are fantasy. He liked things which are deep and hard to grasp, and which can't be laid out in concrete terms. He liked to overthink things, he was prejudiced and stubborn, and he had a distorted understanding. People like this are not human. This is the sort of person he was. Looking at Paul's disposition and nature essence, as well as his preferences, hopes, pursuits, and aspirations, although he served in the church and was a student of a famous teacher, the knowledge he learned was just a tool for him to satisfy his own desires, ambitions, and vanity, and to get himself a meal ticket, status, and standing in society. Looking at Paul's nature essence and pursuits, how much faith did he have in Jehovah? His faith was not a promise, just empty words. He was a nonbeliever, an atheist, and a materialist. Some people ask, "If Paul was a nonbeliever, why did he become the Lord Jesus Christ's apostle and spread the gospel of the Age of Grace?" Tell Me, how was he able to walk this path? What prompted him? What was the turning point for him that made him take up this role, and made a nonbeliever like him able to walk a path like this, and make a turnabout? What am I referring to when I talk about a "turnabout"? It was when Paul was struck down on the road to Damascus—that was the turnabout of his life. He experienced two kinds of turnabouts: One is that he went from not believing in God to believing that God definitely exists because the Lord Jesus who he had initially been persecuting appeared to him on the road to Damascus. Paul exclaimed, "Who are You, Lord?" Actually, deep down inside, Paul did not believe that this Lord and God existed, but he couldn't help himself from calling out, "Who are You, Lord?" What did the Lord Jesus say? ("I am Jesus whom you persecute" (Acts 9:5).) The moment the Lord Jesus said that, Paul was convinced of a fact: A Lord had appeared who he had never seen before, was incapable of imagining, and who was more powerful than he could imagine. How was he convinced that the Lord was more powerful than he could imagine? Because when Paul least expected it, the Jesus who he absolutely did not believe to be

God appeared right in front of him. How powerful is the Lord Jesus? Paul was convinced of the magnitude of His power when his eyes were blinded by His light. Then, could he be convinced that the Lord Jesus is God? (No.) Why not? (Because Paul didn't believe God existed in the first place.) That's right, because he didn't believe in God's existence at all. Right now, you all have faith and a foundation in your hearts, so if God were to appear to you, even if it was just His voice or His back, and if He spoke to you or called your name, you would be convinced of a fact: "This is the God I believe in. I have seen Him and I have heard Him. God has approached me." You would be convinced because you have faith in your heart, you have dreamed of this moment, and you are not afraid. But is this what Paul thought? (No.) He never had faith in his heart. What was his first thought? (Fear.) He was afraid because this entity was capable of striking him down and killing him! This scared and terrified him more than hell, which he couldn't see. He was scared out of his mind. His heart had no faith in God at all—you could say he had no concept of God. Therefore, when the Lord Jesus did His work, whether it was performing signs and wonders or preaching sermons, no matter how many people followed Him, how impressive He was, or how big a scene it was, in Paul's mind, the Lord Jesus was nothing more than an ordinary person. He looked down on the Lord Jesus and had no regard for Him. But now, the ordinary Son of man that he looked down on was standing right in front of him, no longer in the body of an ordinary person, and with not just a voice, but a column of light! For him, it was a moment he would never forget in a million years. The light was blinding! How did God strike Paul down? When God approached Paul, Paul was blinded in an instant and fell to the ground. What was going on? Did he fall willingly and of his own volition, or was he already prepared for it? (No, he just couldn't bear it.) Man's body is just flesh; it cannot bear it. When God truly approaches you, He will not be in the ordinary physical body that you saw the Lord Jesus in—so pleasant and approachable, so humble and ordinary, made of flesh and blood, someone who seems unremarkable to you, and who you give no second thought. When God truly approaches you, even if He does not strike you down you will not be able to bear it! Deep in Paul's heart, the first thing he felt was, "I have been approached by the Lord Jesus who I used to persecute and look down on. This light is so powerful!" Did God tell him to bow down? Did He say, "You should bow down"? (No, He didn't.) Then why was Paul face-down on the ground? (He was scared.) No. Humankind was created by God, and they are so small and weak that when God's light touches their flesh, they cannot help but fall to the ground. God is too big and strong; He is too much for their capacities and nerves to handle. Paul did not acknowledge the Lord Jesus as God, or as Lord, so why would he bow down of his own accord? He had fallen down flat on his face; he was completely incapacitated and paralyzed. His initial pride, arrogance, cockiness, selfrighteousness, and self-importance disappeared in that instant. God did not even appear to Paul in His real person; it was just His light that shone on him, and when Paul saw it, this was the result; this was how much of an impact it had on him. This was Paul's turnabout. If there was no unique context behind this turnabout, or it was not a special case, then to an ordinary person with humanity and a conscience, who pursues positive things and who pursues the truth, it would be a good thing because when a person sees God, it influences the pursuit of their entire life. Judging from what is recorded in the Bible, throughout the centuries it was rare for a person to hear God speak. Job heard God speak to him in a whirlwind after testing him. Job spent his whole life seeking to submit to God's arrangements, and to understand God's sovereignty, but Job never saw God until he was seventy years old; he only experienced His sovereignty, yet Job had the faith that he did. When he heard God speak to him with his own ears, was it not a huge turnabout in his faith? (Yes, it was.) This turnabout was an elevation, a point at which his faith was increased even more. It confirmed to him even more that all the work the God he believed in and obeyed did in people was right and good, and that people should obey Him. It was not a small turnabout like the average person experiences, where they gradually move from a doubtful faith to true faith free of doubt. Rather, it was an elevation, through which his faith reached a higher plane. With regard to Paul, what turnabout was it that God's appearance in the form of striking him down should have brought about? Certainly not elevation, because he never believed in God before that, so it couldn't be called elevation. So, what impact did it have on him? This is yet again connected to his pursuits. Tell Me. (In order to preserve his life, Paul wanted to atone for his sins by sharing the gospel and rendering service.) That is exactly right. He was afraid of death, too, and he was very slippery. When he found out that the Jesus he had persecuted was actually God, he was scared out of his wits, and thought, "What should I do? All I can do is listen to the Lord's orders, otherwise I will die!" From that point on, he accepted God's commission and started to spread the gospel and render service in order to atone for his sins. He thought, "If I am actually successful in spreading the gospel and the Lord Jesus is satisfied, I might even get a crown and reward!" Those were the calculations deep in his heart. He thought he had finally found a better chance at obtaining blessings. Paul accepted the Lord's commission in order to atone for his sins and save his life; that was the intention and goal behind him believing in and accepting the Lord. Ever since he met the Lord Jesus on the road to Damascus and was struck down, he made a turnabout which marked a new start for his pursuits and life of belief in God. Was this new start positive or negative? (It was negative.) He did not recognize God's righteousness, and he accepted the Lord Jesus' commission using a method of transaction that was even more slippery, unspeakable, and underhanded just because he feared God's majesty and being struck down. This is even more disgusting. However, that is not the point of My fellowship today. From Paul's turnabout after encountering God's great light, and the various ways he manifested himself, we can clearly see what path Paul was on, and what sort of a person his nature essence showed him to be. These things are completely clear.

Ever since being struck down, Paul believed that the Lord Jesus Christ existed, and that the Lord Jesus Christ was God. The God he believed in had instantly switched from

God in heaven to the Lord Jesus Christ—it had switched to God on the earth. From that moment on, he could not refuse the Lord Jesus' commission, and began to render service for the incarnate God—the Lord Jesus—unyieldingly. Of course, the goal of his service was partly to absolve him of his sins, but it was also partly to satisfy his desire to be blessed, and to obtain the destination he wanted. When Paul said "through the will of God," did "God" refer to Jehovah or Jesus? He became a bit confused, and thought, "I believe in Jehovah, so why was I struck down by Jesus? Why didn't Jehovah stop Jesus when He struck me down? Exactly which one of Them is God?" He couldn't figure it out. Either way, he would never see the Lord Jesus as his God. Even if he acknowledged Him verbally, there was still doubt in his heart. As time went on, he gradually went back to believing that "only Jehovah is God," so in all of Paul's letters after that, when he wrote "through the will of God," "God" likely referred mainly to Jehovah God. Because Paul never clearly stated that the Lord Jesus is Jehovah, always saw the Lord Jesus as God's Son, referred to Him as the Son, and never said anything like "the Son and the Father are one," it proves that Paul never recognized the Lord Jesus as the one true God; he was doubtful and only half believed it. Looking at this view he had of God, and his method of pursuit, Paul was not someone who pursued the truth. He never understood the mystery of incarnation, and never recognized the Lord Jesus as the one true God. From this, it's not hard to tell that Paul was someone who worshiped power and was slippery and crafty. What does the fact that Paul worshiped evil, power, and status show us about what his belief was? Did he have true belief? (No.) He had no true belief, so did the God he defined in his heart actually exist? (No.) Then why did he still travel around, expend himself, and do work for the Lord Jesus Christ? (He was controlled by his intention to be blessed.) (He was afraid of being punished.) We have circled back to this point again. It was because he was afraid of being punished, and because he had a thorn in his flesh that he could not remove, so he always had to travel around and do work, lest the thorn in his flesh hurt more than he could bear. From these manifestations of his, from his words, his reaction to what happened on the road to Damascus, and the effect being struck down on the road to Damascus had on him after the fact, we can see that he had no belief in his heart; one can more or less be sure that he was a nonbeliever and an atheist. His perspective was, "Whoever has power, in them I will believe. Whoever has power and can subdue me, for them I will run errands and do my utmost. Whoever can give me a destination, a crown, and satisfy my desire to be blessed, that is who I will follow. I will follow them to the end." Who was the God in his heart? Anyone could be his God, so long as they were more powerful than him and could subdue him. Was this not Paul's nature essence? (Yes.) So, who was the entity he eventually believed in who was capable of striking him down on the road to Damascus? (The Lord Jesus Christ.) "The Lord Jesus Christ" was the name he used, but the entity he really believed in was the God in his heart. Where is his God? If you were to ask him, "Where is your God? Is he in the heavens? Is he amongst all created things? Is he the one who is sovereign over all humankind?" he would say, "No, my God is on the road to Damascus." That's who his God really was. Is the reason Paul was able to go from persecuting the Lord Jesus Christ to working, expending himself, and even sacrificing his life for the Lord Jesus Christ—the reason he was able to make such a big turnabout—because there was a change in his belief? Was it because his conscience had awakened? (No.) Then what caused it? What changed? His psychological crutch changed. Before, his psychological crutch was in the heavens; it was an empty, vague thing. If it were replaced with Jesus Christ, Paul would think He was too insignificant—Jesus was just a regular person, He couldn't be a psychological crutch—and Paul had even less regard for famous religious figures. Paul just wanted to find someone he could rely on, who was capable of subduing him and making him blessed. He thought that the entity he encountered on the road to Damascus was the mightiest, and that that was the one he should believe in. His psychological crutch changed at the same time as his belief changed. Based on this, did Paul truly believe in God or not? (No.) Let's summarize, now, in one sentence what influenced Paul's pursuits and the road he was on. (His psychological crutch.) Then, how should we define Paul's seventh sin? In all respects, Paul's belief was a psychological crutch; it was empty and vague. He was a nonbeliever and an atheist through and through. Why didn't an atheist and nonbeliever like him leave the religious world behind? For one thing, in his vague imagination there was the issue of destination. For another, there was the issue of him having a meal ticket in life. Fame, gain, status, and a meal ticket were his pursuits in life, and the idea of having a destination after death was a comfort to him. These things constitute every root and crutch behind what people like this pursue and display, and of the path they walk. From this perspective, what was Paul? (A nonbeliever. He believed in a vague God.) (An atheist.) It is accurate to say he was an atheist, and that he was a nonbeliever and an opportunist who lurked in Christianity. If you just call him a Pharisee, isn't that an understatement? If you look at the letters Paul wrote, and see that on the surface they say "through the will of God," you might assume that Paul viewed the God in heaven as the highest, and that it was only because of people's notions, or because they were ignorant and didn't understand God, that they divided God into three levels: the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, and that that is just man's foolishness, and it is not a very serious problem, because the entire religious world thinks that way, too. However, now, after analyzing it is this the case? (No, it's not.) Paul didn't even acknowledge the existence of God. This is an atheist and a nonbeliever, and he should be put under the same umbrella as atheists and unbelievers.

I have finished summarizing Paul's seven sins. Give Me a brief summary of what they are. (The first sin, is that Paul treated the pursuit of a crown of righteousness and the pursuit of blessings as appropriate objectives; the second, is that Paul treated his imaginings and the things he thought were right in his own notions as the truth, and preached them everywhere, deceiving people; the third, is that Paul treated his gifts and knowledge as life; the fourth, is that Paul denied the identity and essence of the Lord Jesus Christ, and denied the Lord Jesus' work of redemption; the fifth, is that Paul preached "There is laid up for me a crown of righteousness," and openly incited and deceived people, making them try to force God's hand, clamor against Him, and oppose Him; the sixth, is that Paul believed that for him to live was Christ. He denied the truths that the Lord Jesus expressed, replaced the Lord Jesus' words with his own, and made people practice and adhere to them. Paul's seventh sin, is that he treated belief in God as a psychological crutch, and was an atheist and a nonbeliever through and through.) Our analysis of these issues Paul had is so detailed, that it can make everyone who worships Paul come to their senses. This is meaningful. Out of these dispositions and essences that Paul displayed and manifested, and his personal methods of pursuit, which of them has obvious correlations to you? (All of them do.) The first sin is treating the pursuit of a crown of righteousness and the pursuit of blessings as appropriate objectives. Why do I say this is wrong, and that people should reflect on it and change it? When Paul pursued a crown of righteousness, pursued blessings, and sought to enter the kingdom of heaven, he considered the pursuit of these benefits as appropriate. So, what displays and manifestations do you have in real life that match this state? (Sometimes I seek to do important work and make contributions to God's house. I think that by pursuing these things, God will ultimately perfect me. I treat the work I do and the duties I perform as a list of achievements.) This is one part of it. Treating the duties you perform as a list of achievements is the same as pursuing a crown of righteousness; it is the same sort of thing; it is the same state. That is what you work and suffer for. That is what directs the source of your suffering, and the motivation for your suffering. If you did not have these things directing you, you would not have any energy; you would be utterly spent. Does anyone have anything else? (Treating past instances when I gave things up, expended myself, suffered, was arrested and spent time in jail, and things like that as personal capital, and as a basis and reason for being blessed.) This is just a description. What is the underlying state, here? What sort of situation makes you fall into this state? You wouldn't think this way for no reason. There's no way you'd always be thinking this when you're eating, sleeping, or doing things in the day-to-day. You need to know what backgrounds and situations put you into this state. Tell Me. (When I am slightly effective in my duties, I think I have traveled around for God, expended myself for Him, labored and done a lot for Him. Just like Paul, I think I have fought the good fight for God, and made a contribution. This is when my ambitions and desires rear their heads.) Actually, you were not originally without ambitions and desires; they were hidden inside your heart right from the beginning, and now they are coming to the surface and revealing themselves. When this happens, you are no longer humble, your words are not indirect, and you become cocky. Paul's incorrect views were at the root of everything he did. Because the views underlying his belief in God were wrong, it ensured the root of his actions was wrong. He didn't realize this, however, and even thought it was appropriate, so he pursued in an incorrect direction. This caused the result of his pursuits to be the opposite of what he intended; they did not have a good result, and he did not gain the truth. People now are the same way. If the views and direction guiding your pursuit are always wrong, but you still treat them as correct methods of pursuit, then what will you ultimately gain? It will likely disappoint you or inflate your nature. For example, if God blesses you in a special way, or bestows something upon you alone, you will think, "Look, God is gracious toward me. This proves that God approves of everything I have done. God has accepted it. My sacrifices and effort were not in vain. God does not treat people unfairly." This is how you comprehend God not treating people unfairly, His blessings, and acceptance, but this comprehension is wrong and distorted. The key, now, is how to transform these wrong and distorted intentions, views, and pursuits into correct and pure views and thoughts. Only doing things according to correct thoughts and views constitutes practicing the truth, and it is the only way you can gain the truth. This is the key.

By listening to sermons frequently, people are now beginning to reflect on themselves, and compare themselves to God's words. They are starting to recognize problems they have performing their duties, and are able to detect abnormal states, extravagant desires, and displays of corruption within themselves. They are not completely unperceptive. The only problem, is when they detect they are in the wrong state, or are displaying corruption, they don't have the ability to restrain it, and do not seek the truth to resolve it. Sometimes they live according to satanic philosophies, not offending anyone, and think they're pretty good. However, they haven't changed in any real way; they have muddled about wasting their days, and as a result, have no real experiential testimony to speak of even after believing in God for a decade, and feel ashamed. The key problem that needs to be resolved now, is how to change the incorrect direction of your pursuits. You are clear that the path of pursuing the truth is correct, yet you insist on pursuing fame, gain, and status. How can this problem be turned around so that you are able to get onto the path of pursuing the truth? This is a real problem that believers must resolve. You should fellowship often about how you experience God's work, and see who has experiential testimony of pursuing the truth, and whose experiential testimony is good, then accept it and follow suit, so that you benefit from it and break free from the constraints of your corrupt disposition. It is no easy thing to walk the path of pursuing the truth—you must understand yourself, and not just understand your transgressions; the most important thing is to understand your corrupt disposition, what is wrong about your preferences and pursuits, and what consequences could result. This is the most crucial thing. The majority of people pursue fame, gain, and status. Every day, they think about how to become a leader, how to make other people look up to them, how they can show off, and how to live a dignified life. If people are incapable of reflecting on these things, cannot see the essence of living this way clearly, and keep muddling along until who knows how many years later when they hit a brick wall, stumble and finally come to their senses, won't it delay the important matter of their life's growth? Only by taking a clear look at their own corrupt disposition and the path they have chosen can people step onto the path of pursuing the truth. If this is the effect they want to achieve, isn't it crucial to understand themselves? Some people don't understand themselves in the slightest, yet have crystal clear insight into the smallest detail of others' issues, and are particularly discerning. So, when they discern others, why don't they use it as a mirror to examine themselves? If you always say other people are arrogant, self-righteous, deceitful, and don't submit to the truth, but cannot see that you are the same way, then you are in trouble. If you never perceive your own problems, and no matter how many sermons on the truth you hear, while you understand what you hear, you don't compare yourself to it, are not willing to examine your state, and are incapable of seriously handling and resolving your own problems, then you will have no life entry. If people are always incapable of entering into the truth realities, will they not have an empty feeling in their hearts? They will not sense what work God has done in them, as though they had no perception. They will always be in a foggy state, and their pursuits will not be aimed toward a correct objective or direction. They will just pursue according to their own preferences, and walk their own path. This is just like Paul, only putting importance on pursuing rewards and a crown, and not accepting or practicing the truth at all. If your mind is always in a vague state, and you do not have a correct path of pursuit, then you have not achieved any effect after listening to sermons for several years, and the true way has never taken root in your heart. Although you may know how to talk about a lot of doctrine, it is incapable of resolving your negative state or corrupt disposition at all. When you encounter any sort of difficulty, the doctrine you understand will not help you overcome it, or smoothly go through it; it will not help you change or correct your state, let you live with a sense of conscience, give you freedom and liberation, or stop you from being constrained by anything. You have never been in a state like this before, so it proves that you fundamentally have not entered into the truth realities. If you want to enter into the truth realities, understand God's words, achieve true faith in God, know God, and be sure that God truly exists, then you must compare your state to God's words, and then find a path to practice and entry in God's words. Some people read God's words and want to compare themselves to it, but no matter how hard they try, they aren't able to. For example, when God reveals that man's disposition is too arrogant, they think, "I'm very humble and stay in the background. I'm not arrogant." What is this arrogance God talks about? It is a kind of disposition, not the manifestation of a haughty personality, or speaking in a loud voice or in a particularly cocky way. Rather, it refers to something in your disposition—it is a disposition where you do not yield to anything, and are disdainful of, look down on, and care nothing for everything. You are arrogant, conceited, self-righteous, always think you are capable, and do not listen to anyone. Even if you hear words of the truth you care nothing for them and see the truth as unimportant. You don't think it's a problem when you display a corrupt disposition, and even think that no one can match you, always thinking you are better than everyone else, and demanding that others listen to you. This is an arrogant, self-righteous person. People like this have no life entry, and no truth realities.

How should one evaluate whether a person has truth realities? Of course, an accurate appraisal must be made according to God's words. First, look at whether you truly understand yourself, and whether you truly understand your corrupt disposition. For example, is your disposition arrogant? Do you display an arrogant disposition when doing things? If you don't know, then you are someone who does not understand themselves. If a person cannot see their state clearly, hasn't the slightest understanding of the corruption they display, does not base their words and actions on the truth, is not discerning in situations they encounter, and blindly applies the rules when looking at every matter, but does not know if it's right or wrong, then they are someone who has no understanding of the truth. If you understand the truth, you will be able to understand yourself, know that you have an arrogant disposition, be able to discern your true state, truly repent and change, and know how to practice the truth. However, if you do not pursue the truth, have no understanding of the practical side of the truth of God's words, do not reflect on people's corrupt essences which God reveals, or compare yourself to them, then you will forever be a muddle-headed person. Only the truth can make you discerning, and make you able to differentiate between right and wrong, and black and white; only the truth can make you smart and rational, give you wisdom, and give you the ability to clearly distinguish between what positive things are and what negative things are. If you cannot clearly distinguish between these things, you will forever be a muddle-headed person; you will always be in a muddled, clueless, and mixed-up state. People like this have no way of understanding the truth, and no matter how many years they believe in God, they are still unable to enter into the truth realities. If their service is not up to standard, then all that is left for them is to be cast out. For example, a highly renowned person does something, and most people see it as a good thing, but if someone who understands the truth looks at it, they will have discernment, and determine that evil intentions are concealed within their actions—that it is fake goodness, tricks, and deceit, and that only an evil person or a devil king could do something like that. What is the basis for saying this? The essence of this "good thing" was determined according to the truth. No matter what other people say, only by using the truth to evaluate it can you see its essence clearly: If it's good, then it's good; if it's bad, then it's bad. Evaluating it according to God's words will absolutely be accurate. However, if you do not understand the truth, notions will arise in you, and you will say, "Why are they being exposed and condemned for doing something good? They're not being treated fairly!" This is how you will evaluate it. The truth is not your basis for evaluating this matter, but rather things imagined up by your mind. If you always view things according to human notions and imaginings, you will never be able to see the essence of problems clearly; you will only be deceived by outward appearances. When you don't have the truth, no matter what you are looking at, your view will always be muddled, hazy, foggy, and unclear, yet you think you have insight and depth of thought. This is a lack of selfknowledge. For example, if God says a person is evil and should be punished, but you say they are a good person and have done good things, aren't your words in exact opposition and contrary to God's words? This is what happens when people do not understand the truth, and do not have discernment. Some people have believed in God for many years, but do not understand the truth. They are not meticulous in any matter, and there are many matters which they cannot see clearly. They are easily deceived by false leaders and antichrists; no matter what situation arises, so long as there is an evil person causing a disturbance, they get all mixed up and speak as the evil person would without realizing it. It is only when the evil person is exposed and revealed that they come to their senses. People like this often live in a clueless frame of mind, and their essence is that of a muddle-headed person. People like this haven't an ounce of caliber; not only do they not understand the truth, but they can be deceived at any time, and so they have no way of entering into the truth realities. Every church has some people like this—when a false leader does work, they follow them; when an antichrist is deceiving people, they follow them. In short, they will follow the leader whoever that person is; they are like a woman who follows her husband in whatever he does. If the leader is a good person, then they follow a good person; if the leader is a bad person, then they follow a bad person. They do not have their own opinions or standpoints. Therefore, don't expect this sort of person to be able to understand the truth or enter into reality. It's already good if they can perform a small amount of service. The Holy Spirit works in people who love the truth. People who love the truth are all people of caliber who are at least able to understand God's words, and understand the sermons and fellowship of God's house. No matter how many heresies and fallacies the religious world disseminates and spreads, and no matter how the evil force of antichrists defames, condemns, and persecutes the church, people who love the truth are still convinced that God's words are the truth, and believe that the sermons, fellowship, and experiential testimony of God's house are in line with the truth and are real testimonies. That is what it means to have comprehension ability. If you realize that all the words God speaks are the truth and the life realities that people should possess, this realization proves that you already understand part of the truth. If you comprehend that all of the truths God expresses are positive things and are truth realities, and you are positive this is the case and acknowledge one hundred percent that this is the case, then you have understanding of God's work. It is no easy thing to understand the truth; it is something only people enlightened by the Holy Spirit can achieve. Those who truly understand the truth already acknowledge deep in their hearts that everything God has done is positive, that it is all truth, and that it is all so precious to humankind. People who truly understand the truth can clearly see that everything in the world of unbelievers is negative, and goes against the truth. No matter how good their theories sound, they deceive and harm people. Everything God does is positive, is the truth, and is salvation for people. Everything

Satan and devils do is negative, erroneous, and absurd, and deceives and harms people; it is the exact opposite of what God does. If you are completely clear on this, then you have discernment. If you are also able to pursue the truth, accept the judgment and chastisement of God's words, understand yourself through God's words and compare yourself to them, see your corruption as it truly is, resolve the corrupt dispositions you display in every circumstance God creates for you, and are ultimately able to not just understand yourself, but also to be discerning toward others, and can discern between who truly believes in God, who is a nonbeliever, who is a false leader, who is an antichrist, and who deceives people—if you are able to accurately evaluate and discern these things—it means you understand the truth and have some reality. Say, for example, that your relatives or parents are believers in God, and because of evildoing, creating disturbances, or not having any acceptance of the truth, they are cleared out. However, you are not discerning toward them, don't know why they were cleared out, feel extremely upset, and are always complaining that God's house has no love and is not fair to people. You should pray to God and seek the truth, then evaluate just what kind of people these relatives are based on God's words. If you truly understand the truth, you will be able to accurately define them, and you will see that everything God does is right, and that He is a righteous God. Then, you will have no complaints, will be able to submit to God's arrangements, and will not try to defend your relatives or parents. The point here is not to sever your kinship; it is just to define what kind of people they are, and make it so that you are discerning toward them, and know why they were cast out. If these things are truly clear to you in your heart, and your views are correct and in line with the truth, then you will be able to stand on the same side as God, and your views on the matter will be fully compatible with God's words. If you are not able to accept the truth or view people according to God's words, and still side with relationships and perspectives of the flesh when viewing people, then you will never be able to cast off this fleshly relationship, and will still treat these people as your kin—closer even than your brothers and sisters at church, in which case there will be a contradiction between God's words and your views toward your family in this matter—a conflict, even, and in such circumstances, it would be impossible for you to stand on the side of God, and you would have notions and misunderstandings about God. Thus, if people are to achieve compatibility with God, first of all, their views on matters must be in line with God's words; they must be able to view people and things based on God's words, accept that God's words are the truth, and be able to put aside the traditional notions of man. Regardless of what person or matter you are faced with, you must be able to maintain the same perspectives and views as God, and your perspectives and views must be in harmony with the truth. This way, your views and the way you approach people will not be hostile to God, and you will be capable of obedience to God and compatibility with God. Such people could never possibly resist God again; they are the very people that God wishes to gain.

The first step in entering into the truth realities is to reflect on yourself according to God's words, and compare all of your different states to His words. If you want to enter deeper, you must dissect and understand your corrupt disposition more deeply. What should you do after you have understood it? You should find a way to practice and enter, and put thought into how to practice the truth and cast off your corrupt disposition; this is the correct path. Some people become negative after gaining an understanding of themselves; they cry and sob that they have been cast out and are service-doers and foils, and they don't even want to perform their duties. What kind of people are these? These are absurd people, and drama queens. So, what is the best way to fix it? At the very least, they should not cry or make a fuss, and moreover, they should not give up or blame God. The most important things they should do are seek the truth and come to understand what God's will actually is, what the most sensible course of action is, and what path they should choose; these are the most important things. It is easiest for people to lose their sense when they are constantly controlled by the intention to be blessed. People who lack sense are the most pitiful, but people who, in all things, choose to obey God and seek only to satisfy God, are those with the most sense and who have the biggest conscience. When a person is exposed by God, how should they handle it, and what choice should they make? They must seek the truth, and should not, under any circumstances, become muddle-headed. It is good for you to experience God's judgment and chastisement, and to see your corruption as it truly is, so why are you negative? God exposes you so that you gain an understanding of yourself, and in order to save you. Actually, the corrupt disposition you display stems from your nature. It is not that God wants to expose you, but if He does not expose you, won't you still display it? Before you believed in God, He had not exposed you yet, so wasn't everything you lived out a satanic corrupt disposition? You are someone who lives according to a satanic disposition. You shouldn't be so shocked by these things. When you display a little bit of corruption it scares you to death, and you think it's over for you, that God doesn't want you, and that everything you've done is for naught. Don't overreact. It is corrupt humans whom God saves, not robots. What do I mean by corrupt humans? I mean people who display a satanic corrupt disposition, who are arrogant and self-righteous, do not accept the truth, are capable of resisting and rebelling against God, of being antagonistic toward Him, and who are capable of following in Paul's footsteps. These are the sort of humans God saves. If you want to accept God's salvation and achieve salvation, you must face the corrupt disposition that exists in your heart, face the corrupt disposition you display every day, and every day you must seek the truth and reflect on yourself, compare yourself to God's words, practice discernment and dissection of the corrupt disposition you display, and battle it. Some people battle with it several times but are defeated, and say, "Why do I always display arrogance? Why don't other people?" In fact, everyone displays arrogance. When other people display it, you don't know, but they know. Or, it could be that they themselves don't know when they are displaying arrogance, but God knows. Also, there is another issue people must remember: God fixes people's corrupt dispositions; He does not fix their way of doing things. God does not hate the momentary intention you have while doing something, or a particular way of doing things, or if you are occasionally lazy or do not pay a price; these are not the things God hates. What God hates is your corrupt disposition. Whenever you feel you are displaying a corrupt disposition, you should become aware of it on your own before God disciplines you. You shouldn't guess whether God hates you or has cast you out; you should be aware of your problem, then seek how you should repent, and what way of practicing the truth will bring about change. This is a manifestation of normal sense. What you should first become aware of is, "These words of mine are not sensible, and they display arrogance. I am not capable of doing this task, yet I talk myself up and say that I can, so isn't it just a lot of big talk? Big talk and talking myself up show I have an arrogant disposition." God does not condemn you for big talk, but does that mean you can just let it go? No, you cannot let it go. You must dissect it, and say, "Why am I so good at talking myself up and talking big? Why do I brag about things I can't do, or things which I don't even know if I can do? Why do I have this foible?" This is not a foible. A foible is a surface-level bad habit. Big talk is one of the ways an arrogant disposition displays itself; it is your satanic disposition that directs you to live in a state like this—you are entirely directed by your disposition. If you can suppress it, and not display an arrogant disposition, does this mean you do not have an arrogant disposition anymore? Does it mean it has been fixed? It is absolutely not that simple. It is not just by changing the way you do something, being outwardly rule-abiding and well-behaved, not being cocky, and having a cultured manner that makes you not arrogant. Those are just masks, and add new problems on top of being arrogant, and the result is even more troublesome. If you want to fix your arrogance, and fix every sort of corrupt disposition, you must seek the truth to fix it when performing your duties. This is the correct way. For example, suppose the leader arranges for you to perform a certain duty, and after listening you say cavalierly, "I have done duties like this before. This will be a piece of cake!" But right after, you realize you displayed arrogance, and that this way of thinking was wrong, and quickly pray and adjust your thinking, saying, "Oh, God! I've displayed arrogance yet again. Please deal with me; I am willing to perform my duty well," this is the first thing you should do. Then, how should you treat your duty? You think, "I am doing this for God, and I am doing it in His presence, so I must handle it carefully. I cannot mess it up. If I do, it will be so embarrassing!" Then, you mull it over, and think, "No, that's not right. Why should I be afraid of embarrassing myself?" This state isn't right, either; you have started to stray from the path. How should you correct it? Which direction is the right way to go? Again, this has to do with practicing the truth to fix problems. You should think, "I am not afraid of embarrassing myself. The key is that I should not be detrimental to the church's work," and your state will have turned around. But if you then think, "What if I am detrimental to the church's work, and am pruned and dealt with? I will have no pride," your state will be

incorrect again. How can this be fixed? In your heart, you must think, "I never place any importance on my duty, I'm lazy about doing it, and I'm so arrogant. I deserve to be dealt with. I must pray to God and let Him work. I'm a hard nut to crack, but God is almighty and nothing is impossible for Him, so I will lean on God." This is right; this is the right way to practice. God has imparted certain talents to you, and let you acquire some knowledge, but acquiring this knowledge does not necessarily mean you can perform your duty well. Isn't this a fact? (Yes.) How does a person arrive at this conclusion? (Through experience.) This experience taught you a lesson, and gave you insight. Namely, that what God gives to people is not something they inherently possess, nor is it their capital; God can take away what He has given them at any time. When God wants to expose you, no matter how talented you are at something, you will forget it and be unable to use it—you will be nothing. If, at this time, you pray, "God, I am nothing. I have this ability only because You gave it to me. I beg You to give me strength! Please bless and guide me, so I am not detrimental to Your work." Is this the right way to pray? (No, it is not.) What changes should you make at this point? You say, "Oh, God! I am willing to submit to Your arrangements. I cannot always think that I am right. Although I know a few things about this area of work, and have some proficiency at it, it doesn't necessarily mean I can do the task well. Because my corrupt disposition is a disturbance, I am given to doing things in a careless and sloppy manner, and do not take my duty seriously. I am incapable of controlling myself, and cannot get a grip on myself. I beg You to protect me and guide me. I am willing to submit to You, do the best I can, and give You the glory." If you do your duty well, and give eighty percent of the credit to God and twenty percent to yourself, is that appropriate? (No, it's not.) It isn't sensible to divide things up that way. If God was not at work, could you do your duty well? Absolutely not, because not only do you lack the truth, you also have a corrupt disposition. No matter what sort of corrupt state exists in people's hearts, they must always reflect on themselves, and seek the truth to fix it. Once their corrupt disposition has been cleansed, their state will be normal.

Sometimes a wrong thought or idea will appear in a person's heart, and it disturbs their heart. They get stuck in that state, and are unable to emerge from it for a day or two. What should a person do at a time like this? You should seek the truth to fix the situation. First, you should get clear on how the wrong thought or idea arose, how it gained a hold over you, made you negative and depressed, and made you display all sorts of rebelliousness and unsightly ways. Then, when you realize that these things were dictated by your corrupt disposition, and that God hates it, you should quiet yourself before God and pray, "God, discipline me and let me learn the lessons I need to. I am not afraid of being exposed, nor am I afraid of being embarrassed or losing face. All I am afraid of is my actions offending Your administrative decrees, and displeasing You." This is the right path, but do you have the stature to walk it? (No.) If you do not have the stature, does it mean you cannot pray in this direction? Since it is the right path, you should pray in this direction. Now, people's stature is small, they must frequently come before God, lean on God, and let God protect them more and discipline them more. When their stature has grown, and they can shoulder a burden and do more tasks, God will not need to worry so much, and will not need to constantly protect them, discipline them, try them, or watch them. This is a matter of the heart, and God looks at people's hearts. God does not care how well-behaved or obedient you are on the outside; He looks at your attitude. Maybe you say nothing all day, but what attitude do you have in your heart? "I have been given this duty, so I have a responsibility to do it well, but I have a habit of being unbridled, and I always do as I please. I know I have this issue, but I can't control myself. I am willing for God to orchestrate my environment, and remove the people, matters, and things surrounding me which could disturb me, impact the performance of my duty, or impact my practice of the truth, so that I do not fall into temptation, can accept God's trials, and can accept His discipline." You must have a heart of willing submission. When these thoughts are in your heart, how can God not see them? How can He pay them no heed? So, God acts. Sometimes when you pray like this once or twice, God does not heed you. When He tests a person's work and sincerity, He will not say anything, but this does not mean that what you did was wrong. Under no circumstances should you tempt God. If you always tempt God, and say, "Am I right in doing this? Did You see it, God?" then you are in trouble. This is an incorrect state. Just focus on taking action. No matter whether God is disciplining you, leading you, trying you, or guiding you, pay no heed. Just focus on putting effort into the truth you understand, and acting in line with God's will. That is enough. So far as what the result will be, a lot of times it is not your responsibility. What should you take responsibility for? Performing the duty you should perform, spending the time you should, and paying the price you should. That is enough. Anything that concerns the truth must be examined, and effort must be put into understanding it. The crucial thing is that people walk the path they should. This is enough. This is what people should be doing. As for what level of stature you have, what trials you should go through, what discipline you should experience, what situations you should experience, and how God rules sovereign, you do not need to pay attention to these things. God will do it. You say, "I am small in stature. Don't make me undergo any trials, God, I'm afraid!" Would God do that? (No, He wouldn't.) There is no need for you to worry. You say, "I am so large in stature, and have ample faith. God, why don't You put me through a few trials? Try me like You did with Job and take away everything I have!" God would not do that. You do not know your own stature, but God knows well and is very clear; He can see the heart of every person. Can people see God's heart? (No, they can't.) People cannot see God's heart, so how do they understand God and cooperate with Him? (Through His words.) Through understanding His words, performing their duty well, and holding fast to their place as people. What is people's duty? It is the labor that people should do, and are capable of doing. These are the tasks that God has given you. What do the tasks that have been given to you include? The area of work you are familiar with, those tasks which the church gives you, those tasks which you should do, and those tasks which are within your ability to do. This is part of it. Another part has to do with the matter of life entry. You must be able to practice the truth and obey God. Just focus on practicing and entering into the truth. Don't pay attention to others' evaluation of you or how God sees you. You do not need to pay attention to these things, nor is it necessary for you to pay attention to these things—these are not the things you should be bothering yourself with. People have no say in their good fortune, misfortune, longevity, all the things they experience in their lifetime, their luck, or their life; no one can change these things. You must be clear on this. God is sovereign over these things. People absolutely must clearly recognize and understand this in their hearts. Don't concern yourself with anything on behalf of God; don't try and decide what God wants to do. Just focus on effectively handling what you should do, what you should enter into, and the path you should be on. That is enough. As for what your future destination will be, do you have any say over it? (No.) Then how can you solve this problem? Part of it, is by doing everything you should do each day well, and fulfilling your duty as a person. This is the commission God gives to everyone. You came into this world, and God has led you this whole time—no matter whether He has given you various sorts of gifts, or nurtured you and given you a talent or ability, this shows that God has given you commissions. It is very obvious what commission God has given you, and there is no need for God to tell you directly. For example, if you know English, then God definitely has requirements for you in this area. This is your duty. There is no need for God to call down from heaven and say to you directly, "Your duty is translation, and if you don't do it, I'll punish you." There is no need to say this. It is already very clear to you because God has given you normal rationality, thought processes and thinking, as well as the ability to understand this language. That is enough. What God has given you is what He is telling you to do, and this is very clear to you in your heart. During the process of performing your duties, and during the process of accepting God's commission, you must accept everything God has done to you, including the positive guidance, watering, and provision He has given you. For example, by frequently eating and drinking God's words, listening to sermons, living church life, fellowshiping on the truth, and harmoniously cooperating with others whilst performing your duty. Another part of it, is through individual life entry—this is the most important. Some people always want to know if they have life, and if they are effective. It is fine to reflect on these things momentarily, but don't focus on them. It's like planting crops every year—none of the farmers say how much yield there must be that year, and that if they don't achieve that result, they will die. They are not this foolish. They all sow seeds when it is the season for it, then water them, fertilize them, and tend to them normally. Then, when the season is right, they are guaranteed a harvest. You must have faith like this; this is real faith in God. Don't be so calculating with God, saying, "I have put in some effort the last while, will God reward me?" It's not acceptable to always be asking for rewards, like an office worker asking for their wages at the end of the month. It's not acceptable to always be asking for wages. People's faith is too weak, and they do not have real faith in God. Once you see clearly that the path of following God is the path to salvation, and is real life, that it is the correct path that people should be following, and the life that created beings should have, just focus on pursuing the truth and seeking to enter into reality, listening to God's words, and walking and acting in the direction God points you. This is right. Don't always ask God, "God, how much longer is it until I have followed You to the end of the road? When will I be saved? When will I be rewarded and get a crown? When will the day of God arrive?" These are all states that people have, but does this make it right? (No.) Some people say "The law cannot be enforced when everyone is an offender," but this saying is a fallacy, it does not hold water, and it is not in line with the truth. The fact that everyone has these states proves that everyone has a corrupt disposition, so they must all remedy this problem and get over this hurdle. You must always examine yourself in your heart, not focus on looking at how others are doing, and while you examine yourself, you must correct any corrupt states you have. People's minds are dynamic, and are always actively thinking—one moment they lean left, and the other they lean right; their way of thinking is always a bit off. They do not walk the right path. They insist on following others, and on following evil trends in the world and walking the wrong path. This is people's nature essence, and they couldn't control it even if they wanted to. If you cannot control it, then don't control it. When an incorrect intention or view surfaces, then fix it. This way, the corruption you display will gradually lessen. So, how can you fix it? By praying, and constantly gaining understanding and turning things around. Sometimes, no matter how you try to turn things around, those things surface, so pay them no heed, and just do what you are supposed to do. This is the easiest method. So what is it that people are supposed to do? Perform their duty well, and keep to their duty. You cannot reject the commission God has given you; you must complete it well. Apart from this, in terms of individual life entry, you must do your best to strive for the truth while doing your duty, and work hard to achieve whatever level of entry you can. Whether you are ultimately up to par will be decided by God. People's own feelings and verdicts are of no use. People cannot decide their own fate, and are unable to evaluate their behavior, or determine what their ultimate end will be. Only God can evaluate and determine these things. You must trust that God is righteous. To borrow the words of unbelievers, you must dare to act, dare to be accountable for your actions, dare to face the facts, and be able to take responsibility. People who have a conscience and sense should perform their duty well and take responsibility.

It is crucial that people frequently examine themselves, and it is crucial for people to accept God's scrutiny. It is also crucial for people to seek the truth, reverse their states and views, and emerge from them, when they examine themselves and find that they have incorrect states or views. In this way, without realizing it, you will experience fewer and fewer incorrect states, and you will become more and more discerning toward them.

After you reverse your incorrect states, the positive things within you will increase, and you will perform your duty with greater and greater purity. Although, on the outside, the way you speak and your personality will be the same as before, your life disposition will have changed. In what ways will this be apparent? You will be able to follow the truth principles when doing things and performing your duty, and you will be able to take responsibility in these things; when you see others doing things in a careless and perfunctory manner you will be angry, and when you see evil phenomena, as well as passive, negative, improper and evil practices that reveal corrupt dispositions, you will detest them. The more you look at these things, the more distaste you will feel, and you will become increasingly discerning toward them. When you see some people who have believed in God for a very long time, and who speak very clearly about words and doctrines, but don't do any real work and lack principles, you will get angry and loathe it. In particular, when you see leaders and workers who don't do real work, who always talk about words and doctrines, and who have believed in God for years but haven't changed, you will have discernment toward them, you will be able to expose and report them, and you will possess a sense of justice. Not only will you hate yourself, but you will also hate it when these evil and unjust things occur. This will prove that there has been a change inside of you. You will be able to look at issues and treat the people, events, and things around you from the perspective of the truth, from God's side, and from the perspective of positive things—this will show there has been a change in you. So, will you still need God to evaluate you? No—you will be able to sense this yourself. For example, before, if you saw someone doing things in a careless and perfunctory manner, you thought, "That's normal. I'm the same way. If he didn't do things that way, then it would make me look like I was doing things in a careless and perfunctory manner." Everyone was doing things in a careless and perfunctory manner, so you felt you were doing pretty good. At that time, you won't think that way anymore. You will think, "Doing things in a careless and perfunctory manner is unacceptable. The work of God's house is important. It was rebellious enough that I was doing things in a careless and perfunctory manner—why are you being like I was, and doing things that way too?" You will think you were so ignorant and immature before, that the way you saw things was so despicable and shameful, and that there's no way you could give an account of it to God, and your conscience will not be able to get over it. The fact that you will be able to have thoughts and feelings like this will prove that the truth and God's words have already taken root and germinated within you. The perspective from which you view things, and the standards by which you evaluate things will have changed. You will already be a completely different person from before, when you lived within your corrupt dispositions. You will have already changed in a real way. Have you changed a bit, now? (A little.) Now you have changed a little, and occasionally, when you see people doing things in a careless and perfunctory manner, not wanting to practice the truth, and always indulging in physical comfort, you don't think it is a good thing. However, if you were asked to go help and support them, satanic philosophies would still have a hold over you. Though you discover this problem in people, you do not dare say anything out of fear of offending them, and even think, "No one elected me as group leader, so there is no need for me to stick my nose into other people's business." When you encounter these unjust and negative things, you are unable to stand on the side of the truth in your speech and actions, or take responsibility; you just turn a blind eye, and think that is a great way to comport yourself, distancing yourself from contention. You think, "If anything goes wrong it will have nothing to do with me. I'm dodging a bullet." If you still have views like this, will you be able to practice the truth? Will you have life entry? With views like this in your heart, you are a nonbeliever, and cannot accept the truth. That is why views like this cannot go uncorrected. If you want to have life entry, in one respect, you must be able to supervise yourself. In another respect, you primarily need to accept God's scrutiny. If you notice there is reproach inside your heart, you should reflect on yourself, and figure out where this reproach is coming from. If you can feel that God is scrutinizing you, and you believe that God is scrutinizing you, then you should accept His scrutiny. It is only by frequently feeling remorseful, unsettled in your heart, and that you owe God on account of being in those states, that you will have the motivation to practice the truth and enter into the truth. There are some standards for, and practical manifestations of, entering into the truth realities. To what extent have you entered into them, now? (When a situation arises, I can see many shortcomings in myself, but I spend a lot of time stuck in that state. I don't know how to adopt the perspective of the truth to dissect or understand what issues I have; I do not have clear discernment toward myself; I do not see myself clearly, and I often can't see other people's states clearly, either.) If you cannot see yourself clearly, then you cannot see others clearly. This statement is correct. When other people have an issue, you think it has nothing to do with you, but in fact, the states are consistent, and the same. If you cannot see your own state clearly, you will not be able to resolve your issues, let alone resolve others' issues. Once you have resolved your issues, you will be able to see others' issues very clearly, and fix them right away. If you want to have life entry, you must abide by the following two things: One, is that you must perform your duty well, and the other, is that while you are performing your duty, you must frequently examine yourself, seek the truth to reverse your various incorrect views, thoughts, stances, intentions, and states, and emerge from every sort of incorrect state. If you have the strength to emerge from them, you will overcome Satan and cast off your corrupt dispositions. Then, you will have turned yourself around. You will have emerged from your passive and negative states, and will not be constrained or controlled by these states. This in and of itself is a step forward. You must resolve this issue first. What negative or passive states do you have? Some people think, "That's just the way I am. There's nothing I can do to fix my arrogant disposition. In any case, God knows about it, and I reckon that He has already classified me. I've tried to change so many times, but I'm still the same. This is just who I am." You have a bad view of yourself, but this is a negative state; it's a bit of a mindset of abandoning yourself to despair. You haven't sought the truth to resolve this issue, so why do you think you are hopeless? People frequently live in states like this; one momentary revelation of corruption and they think they have been classified, and that this is the type of person they are. This is a negative state; it should be reversed, and you should emerge from it. What other negative or passive states do you have? (I frequently live in a state where I do things based on my gifts and caliber, and lack life entry. This state is very severe.) When people do things based on their gifts and caliber, they always like to compete with others, thinking, "How come you can complete this task but I can't? I have to work hard and put effort into this task, to try and do it better than you!" In this your devilish nature has emerged. What should be done about this? If, when you do things, you have this motivation or starting point, pay it no heed. It is a momentary revelation, or a momentary ignorant thought. Don't act according to it, and you will be fine. You must do things in a down-to-earth manner, and in the way they should be done. If you encounter a difficulty, take the initiative to look at how other people have handled it. If they've handled it well, talk with them and learn from them. This way, you will reverse your incorrect states. If you have those thoughts and reveal corruption inside, but do not act in that way, then your corrupt dispositions will be thwarted. However, if you have those thoughts and act in that way, and your actions are even more severe than your thoughts, then this spells trouble, and it will make a mess of things. People's corrupt dispositions are what God hates the most.

God's approach to your corrupt dispositions is not to make you hide them, cover them up, or disguise them. Rather, He allows you to reveal them, exposing you and making you gain knowledge of them. Once you have knowledge of them, is that it? No. After you have knowledge of them, and know it is wrong to do things according to your corrupt dispositions, and that it is a dead-end road, you must come before God, and pray to Him and seek the truth to resolve your corrupt dispositions. God will enlighten you, and give you a correct path of practice. God's words talk about what people should do, but people have corrupt dispositions, and sometimes don't want to do as God says; they want to do things their own way. So, what does God do? God gives you freedom, and allows you to act this way for the time being. As you go along acting this way, you will hit a wall and feel you have messed up. Then, you will go back to God and seek what you should do. God will say, "In your heart, you understand My requirements. So, why don't you listen?" And you will say, "Then discipline me, God." God will discipline you, and it will hurt, so you'll think, "God doesn't love me. How can He be so cruel to me? He is so heartless." God will say, "Okay, then I won't do this anymore. Keep doing things however you intend to," and you will be back on the path that you were on before. You will do things, hit a wall again, and ponder, "There is something not right about what I'm doing. I have to go back and confess my sins. I am indebted to God." You will go back to God again and pray and seek, understand that what God says is right, and then do as God says. But when you are doing it, you will think, "Doing this will hurt my pride. Maybe I'll just take care of my pride first." Then you will be in trouble again, and have fallen short again. You will go back and forth again and again like this over time. If people can reflect on themselves, always recognize the deviations within themselves, reflect on and understand their corrupt dispositions, and then seek the truth to resolve them, then during the course of this experience, their stature will also be constantly growing. For people who have hearts, who are willing to practice the truth and love positive things, they will gradually experience fewer setbacks and failures, the parts of them which are obedient to God will increase, and the parts of them that love the truth will increase. That is why God allows you to fail and rebel while you experience and practice the truth; He does not look at these things. It is not like God will no longer want you, or that He'll send you to hell, or sentence you to death for not listening to Him on one occasion. God does not do this. Why is it said God's love is extremely vast when He saves people? This is where God's love is manifested. It is manifested in His tolerance and patience toward people. He is constantly tolerating you, but not indulging you. God's tolerance is about Him knowing people's stature, knowing their innate capacity, knowing what people reveal in certain circumstances, and what they can attain based on their stature, and allowing you to reveal these things, giving you a certain amount of space, and accepting you when you come back to Him and sincerely repent, while also recognizing the sincerity of your repentance. Therefore, when you return and ask God whether it is right to act in that way, God will continue to tell you and give you an answer. God will patiently tell you that it is right to act in that way, and give you validation. But when you change your mind again, and say, "God, I don't want to do this. It isn't beneficial to me, and it makes me unhappy and uncomfortable—I still think I should do things my way, that way, I'll not lose face, I'll be smooth and slick, and I'll be able to satisfy myself in every regard—I will satisfy my individual desires first," God will say, "You can come up short, but by doing so, you are the one who will ultimately lose out, not Me." When God is saving you, He sometimes allows you to be willful like this; this is His tolerance and this is the mercy He shows people. However, people cannot be self-indulgent when they see His mercy, and treat His patience and tolerance as a sort of weakness, or see it as an excuse for rebelling against Him and not heeding His words. This is rebelliousness and wickedness on the part of people. People must see this clearly. The tolerance and patience God shows you stretches on without limit. If you can sense God's earnest intentions, that is a good thing. It is not that God is incapable of using extreme measures to save you—you must understand that there are principles behind God's actions. He does things in many ways, but He does not use extreme measures. Why is this? God allows you to experience all kinds of adversity, frustrations, and tribulations, as well as many failures and setbacks. In the end, through the process of allowing you to experience these things, God makes you realize that all He has said is correct and the truth. At the same time, He makes you realize that what you think and imagine, as well as your notions, knowledge, philosophical theories, philosophies, and the things you learned in the world and which were taught to you by your parents are all wrong, and that these things cannot guide you onto the right path in life, and cannot lead you to understand the truth or come before God. If you still live by these things, then you are walking the path of failure, as well as the path of resisting and betraying God. In the end, God will make you see this clearly. This process is something you must experience, and it is only in this way that results can be achieved, but it is also a painful thing for God to see. People are rebellious and have corrupt dispositions, so they must suffer a bit, and experience these setbacks. Without this suffering, they would have no way of being purified. If a person truly has a heart which loves the truth, and is truly willing to accept God's various methods of salvation and to pay the price, then there is no need for them to suffer so much. God does not actually want to make people suffer so much, and does not want to make them experience so many setbacks and failures. However, people are too rebellious; they are unwilling to do as they are told, unwilling to obey, and unable to walk the right path or take shortcuts; they only go their own way, rebel against God and resist Him. People are corrupt things. All God can do is hand them over to Satan and put them in various situations to constantly temper them, thereby allowing them to gain all kinds of experiences and learn all kinds of lessons, and to come to understand the essence of all kinds of evil things. After that, when people return and take another look, they will realize that God's words are the truth, admit that God's words are the truth, and admit that God is the reality of all positive things, and the One who truly loves, worries about, and can save people. God does not want people to suffer so much, but humans are too rebellious, want to take the wrong path, and want to go through this suffering. God has no choice but to put people in various situations to constantly temper them. To what extent are people ultimately tempered? To the extent that you say, "I have experienced every kind of situation, and now I finally understand that apart from God, there is no person, matter or object that can make me understand the truth, that can make me enjoy the truth, or that can make me enter the truth realities. If I obediently practice according to God's words, obediently stay in man's place, uphold my status and duty as a created being, obediently accept God's sovereignty and arrangements, have no further complaints nor desire extravagant things from God, and can truly submit before the Lord of creation, only then will I be someone who truly submits to God." When people reach this level, they truly bow down before God, and God need not set out any more situations for them to experience. So, which path do you wish to take? No one, in their subjective desires, wants to suffer, and no one wants to experience setbacks, failure, difficulties, frustrations, or adversity, but there is no other way. People have satanic natures; they are too rebellious, and their thoughts and views are too complicated. Every day, your heart is in constant contradiction, strife, and turmoil. You understand few truths, your life entry is shallow, and you lack the power to overcome the notions, imaginings, and corrupt dispositions of the flesh. All you can do is take man's usual approach: constantly experiencing failure and frustration, constantly falling down, being buffeted by hardship, and rolling around in the muck, until a day comes when you say, "I'm tired. I'm fed up. I don't want to live like this. I don't want to experience these failures. I am willing to come before the Creator in obedience; I shall listen to what God says, and do what He says. Only this is the right path in life." Only on the day you are fully convinced and admit defeat will you be able to come before God. Have you come to understand something of God's disposition from this? What is God's attitude toward people? No matter what God does, He wants the best for people. No matter what situations He sets out or what He asks you to do, He always wishes to see the best outcome. Say you go through something and encounter setbacks and failure. God does not wish to see you discouraged when you fail, think you are finished and have been snatched by Satan, then give up on yourself, never find your feet again, and plunge into dejection—God does not wish to see this outcome. What does God wish to see? That while you may have failed in this matter, you are able to seek the truth and reflect on yourself, find the reason for your failure, accept the lesson this failure has taught you, remember it in the future, know that it is wrong to act this way and that only practicing according to God's words is right, and realize, "I am a bad person. I have a corrupt satanic disposition. There is rebelliousness in me. I am far from the righteous people of whom God speaks, and I do not have a God-fearing heart." You have seen this fact clearly; you have come to recognize the truth of the matter, and through this setback, this failure, you have gained some sense and matured. This is what God wants to see. What does maturing mean? It means that God can gain you, that you can be saved, that you can enter into the truth realities, and that you have embarked on the path of fearing God and shunning evil. God hopes to see people take the right path. God does things with earnest intentions, and all of this is His hidden love, but people often can't sense this. People are narrow-minded and extremely petty. The moment they can't enjoy God's grace and blessings, they blame God, become negative, and act out in anger, but God doesn't hold it against them. He just treats them like ignorant children and does not nitpick them. He lays out circumstances for people that let them know how grace and blessings are obtained, let them understand what grace means to man, and what man can draw from it. Say you like to eat something that God says is bad for your health when eaten in excess. You do not listen, and insist on eating it, and God allows you to make that choice freely. As a result, you get sick. After experiencing this several times, you realize that the words God speaks are actually right, that what He says is true, that you must practice according to His words, and that this is the correct path. So, what comes from the setbacks, failures and suffering that you experience? For one thing, you can sense God's earnest intentions. For another, it makes you believe and feel sure that God's words are right and that they are all practical, and your faith in God grows. On top of that, by experiencing this period of failure, you come to recognize the veracity and accuracy of God's words, you see that God's words are the truth, and you understand the principle of practicing the truth. And so, it is good for you to experience failure though it is also something which makes you suffer, and which tempers you. But if being tempered thus ultimately makes you return before God, makes you understand His words and accept them into your heart as the truth, and makes you come to know God, then the tempering, setbacks and failures you experienced will not have been in vain. This is the result that God wishes to see. However, some people say, "Since God is so tolerant of people, I'll just let loose, do things however I please, and live the way I want." Is this okay? (No, it's not.) What created beings should do is practice according to the correct path God has pointed them toward, and not waver from it. If they are unable to fully meet God's will, so long as they do not contravene the truth, and can accept God's scrutiny, it's okay. This is the minimum standard. If you stray from the truth, do not pray, and do not seek, then you have strayed too far from God, and have already crossed over into dangerous territory. When you are too far from God, do not perform your duty in the church, and have already left the space where God works to save people, the Holy Spirit will stop working on you, and you will have no chance, and no salvation to speak of. To you, God's love is just empty words.

When you believe in God, you first must understand God, understand His will, and His attitude toward man. By doing this, you will know what truth God ultimately wants you to understand and enter into, and understand what path you should follow. After you know these things, you must do your utmost to cooperate with what God wants to do, and what He wants to accomplish in you. If you truly cannot cooperate and your energy and strength are exhausted, then that's just how it is; God will not force people. However, people now do not put all their strength into these things. If you do not put your full strength into practicing the truth, but put your full strength into obtaining blessings and a crown of righteousness, then you have strayed from the right path. You must put your effort into practicing the truth, and into cooperating with the missions and duties that God gives you; you must give of yourself and expend yourself for these things with all your heart. Then, you will meet God's will. God pays no heed to people who do not attend properly to their duties, but paying them no heed does not mean there are no principles behind His actions. When God pays them no heed, it shows He is tolerant, accepting, and patient. He knows what things people must experience in their lives, what these created beings are capable of accomplishing, and what they are not, what certain types of people can accomplish at certain ages, and what they cannot. God has the most clarity about these things, much more so than the people themselves. However, just because God is clear about these things, it doesn't mean you can say, "Okay, then, just do as You like, God. I don't need to think about anything. I can just sit around all day and wait for manna to fall from the heavens. It's fine for God to handle everything." People must do their utmost to cooperate when carrying out their responsibilities, the things they should do, the things they should enter into, the things they should practice, and the things that are within people's innate capability to accomplish. What does it mean to do

one's utmost to cooperate? It means that you must put time and energy into your duty, suffer and pay a price for it. Sometimes, your pride, vanity, and self-interest must take a loss, and you must completely let go of your yearning for a destination, and your desire to be blessed. These things should be let go, so you must let them go. For example, God says, "Do not lust after comforts of the flesh, for it is not beneficial to your life growth." You are unable to obey Him, and after experiencing several failures, you think, "God is right. Why can't I put it into practice, and rebel against the flesh? Am I incapable of changing? Is this how God sees me, too? Will He not save me? I'm a lost cause, so I will just be a service-doer, and render service until the end." Is this acceptable? (No, it's not.) People are often in this state. Either they only pursue blessings and a crown, or else having experienced a few instances of failure—they think they are not up to the task, and that God has also passed a verdict on them. This is wrong. If you can turn things around in time, change your heart and mind, let go of the evil committed by your hands, return before God, confess and repent to God, acknowledge that your actions and the path you walk are wrong, and admit your own failures, then practice according to the path God has indicated to you, without giving up pursuing the truth no matter how tainted you are, then you're doing the right thing. In the course of experiencing changes in their disposition and being saved, people will necessarily encounter many difficulties. For example, being unable to submit to the situations laid forth by God, their own various thoughts, views, imaginings, corrupt dispositions, knowledge, and gifts, or else their own various problems and faults. You must battle all manner of difficulties. Once you have overcome these myriad difficulties and states, and the battle in your heart has ended, you will possess the truth realities, you will no longer be bound by these things, and you will have been set free and liberated. One problem people often encounter during this process is that, prior to discovering problems in themselves, they think they're better than everyone else, and will be blessed even if no one else is, just like Paul. When they discover their difficulties, they think themselves nothing, and that it's all over for them. There are always two extremes. You must overcome both of these extremes, so that you do not veer one way or the other. When you encounter a difficulty, even if you are already aware that the problem is utterly intractable and will be hard to fix, you should face it properly, come before God and ask for His help in fixing it, and by seeking the truth, gnaw away at it bit by bit like ants gnawing on a bone, and turn this state around. You must repent to God. Repenting is proof that you have a heart that accepts the truth and an attitude of obedience, which means there is hope that you will gain the truth. And if, in the midst of this, any more difficulties appear, don't be afraid. Quickly pray to God and lean on Him; God is secretly watching and waiting for you, and as long as you do not depart from the setting, stream, and scope of His management work, there is hope for you—you absolutely must not give up. If all you display is a normal corrupt disposition, then as long as you are able to understand it and accept the truth, and practice the truth, a day will come when these problems are solved. You must have faith in this. God is the truth—why do you need to fear this little problem of yours cannot be solved? This can all be solved, so why be negative? God has not given up on you, so why give up on yourself? You should not give up, and you should not be negative. You should face the problem properly. You must know the normal laws for life entry, and be able to see the display and manifestation of a corrupt disposition, as well as occasional negativity, weakness, and confusion, as normal things. The process of changing one's disposition is a long and repetitious one. When you are clear on this point, you will be able to face problems properly. Sometimes, your corrupt disposition displays itself severely, and it disgusts anyone who sees it, and you hate yourself. Or, sometimes, you are too lax and are disciplined by God. This is no cause for fear. As long as God is disciplining you, as long as He is still caring for and protecting you, still working in you, and is always with you, this proves that God has not given up on you. Even when there are times that you feel God has left you, and that you have been plunged into darkness, do not be afraid: As long as you are still alive and not in hell, you still have a chance. However, if you are like Paul, who stubbornly walked the path of an antichrist, and ultimately testified that for him to live is Christ, it's all over for you. If you can come to your senses, you still have a chance. What is the chance you have? It is that you can come before God, and can still pray to Him and seek, saying, "Oh God! Please enlighten me so I understand this aspect of the truth, and this aspect of the path of practice." As long as you are one of God's followers, you have hope of salvation, and can make it to the very end. Are these words clear enough? Are you still liable to be negative? (No.) When people understand God's will, their path is a broad one. If they do not understand His will, it is narrow, there is darkness in their hearts, and they have no path to tread. Those who do not understand the truth are as follows: They are narrow-minded, they always split hairs, and they always complain about and misunderstand God. As a result, the further they walk, the more their path disappears. In fact, people don't understand God. If God treated people as they imagined, the human race would have long since been destroyed.

Paul's seven sins represent displays typical of corrupt humanity, but Paul was just the most severe case. His nature essence was already determined—that was the person he was. However, these corrupt dispositions are common to all corrupted humans; every person has them to a different extent. These states all stem from a corrupt disposition. Although you are not the same type of person as Paul, you possess these corrupt dispositions, too; you just do not manifest them as severely as he did. At the present time, states of this sort that the majority of you have are seen by God as displays of corrupt dispositions. However, Paul did not just display a corrupt disposition; he was on the path of resisting God, and stubbornly refused to repent. He was sentenced and condemned. He had a demonic nature, and this truth-hating demonic nature of his was beyond help. After this, you should fellowship on this discourse, and compare yourselves to it. The goal of this is to recognize the severity of these mistakes that Paul made, then uncover all of the corrupt states you have which are like Paul's, and fix them step by step. The point of fixing these corrupt dispositions is to make people capable of living with increasing human likeness, and increasing compatibility with God. Only by fixing these corrupt dispositions can people truly come before God, be compatible with Him, be a true created being, and make God look upon them with satisfaction. Do you draw comparisons with yourselves? (We are a bit lacking in this regard.) The thing you lack the most is the truth. Truth is what you should be entering into. You have quite a few things inside you now, but the majority of these things are corrupt and negative. You have some absurd knowledge, are too petty, always think about making transactions and trades, have an overabundance of negative things, and become negative when you don't do a task well, or perceive a difficulty. When you see that God's work is not in line with your wishes, negative emotions rise up in you, and you are opposed to His work and fight it. When you accomplish some small result in your work, it goes to your head and you forget yourself. You become arrogant and don't know your place in the universe, think you are a cut above everyone else, and want God to give you a crown and a reward in exchange; you also dare to be unrestrained in public. In sum, these states are consistent with Paul's states—they are the same, and God despises them.

We have summarized and defined Paul's seven major sins. Paul ultimately became the object of punishment. When God decided Paul's end, did He base it on just one of his sins? (No.) Taken together, this was the end he should have had; it was the way he should have ended up. The facts are right in front of you; you cannot deny them. If there are some among you who walk a road like Paul's from start to finish, manifest all of Paul's seven sins, and cannot seek the truth to resolve them, what will your end ultimately be? (The same as Paul's.) You will become an antichrist demon like Paul, and should be punished. When you are punished, do not accuse God of being unrighteous. Instead, you should praise God's righteousness, and say, "God is righteous! God revealed Paul's seven sins, and His words explained them. It was me who didn't enter into His words!" Now things are different than two thousand years ago; God tells people about every truth clearly and transparently, and it is written out for you, so that you hear and understand it, and you see that that is how God works and accomplishes things in real life, too. If you are still unable to enter into the truth, and cannot fix your corrupt disposition according to God's words, do not blame God for punishing you according to His righteous disposition. In the Book of Revelation, God said, "My reward is with Me, to give every man according as his work shall be" (Revelation 22:12). God repays people according to what they do. This is God's righteous disposition. Those who believe in God should reflect on and understand themselves in light of God's words, and in light of Paul's seven sins that God revealed, and achieve true repentance. This is what God commends.

Only in the Practice of the Truth Is There Life Entry

Where should a person start when taking the first step into life entry? What does a person need to have in order to achieve life entry? What are the most crucial and important things a person should pursue and gain in order to enter into the truth realities? Have you ever considered these questions? What is life entry? Life entry is a change in a person's day-to-day life, in their actions, in their life's direction, and in the goal of their pursuit. Having been foolish and ignorant in the past, and having always acted according to the thoughts, notions, and imaginings of the flesh, a person now, through God's revelations, watering, and provision, may come to understand that they should act in accord with God's words. Additionally, this person has undergone a transformation as a result of God's words, in daily life, with regard to their views and style of conducting themselves, and with regard to their direction and goals in life. This is life entry. What is the basis of life entry? (The words of God.) That's right. Life entry is inseparable from the words of God; it is inseparable from the truth; every word God speaks is the truth. What is manifested in people who have achieved life entry? (They are able to rely on the words of God to live.) That's right. They are able to rely on the words of God to live. Their actions, speech, thoughts about problems, viewpoints, stances, and perspectives all rely on the words of God and on the truth. These are manifestations of having attained life entry. So, what is life entry primarily connected to? (God's words.) It is connected to God's words and the truth. So, now, could one define a person with life entry as a person who pursues the truth, and a person who truly pursues the truth as a person with life entry? (Yes.) What is the goal of defining things this way? In what direction should we aim our fellowship? (At pursuing the truth.) Pursuing the truth is the main topic I want to fellowship on today. At the present time, you are not too clear on the relationship between life entry and pursuing the truth—it is not very evident to you. I am always fellowshiping on life entry, transforming people's dispositions, and dissecting Paul's path. What is the main topic that this all boils down to? It is pursuing the truth. No matter whether I dissect the path Paul followed, or talk about the path to perfection that Peter followed—no matter what I talk about, ultimately, what kind of path is it My goal to make everyone follow? (The path of pursuing the truth.) When people are able to pursue the truth, enter into the truth realities, live according to God's words, understand God's will, and do things according to the principles of God's words, are the goals people pursue, and the paths they follow not clear? (Yes, they are.) Pursuing the truth is a topic which is impossible for people to avoid when they believe in God, seek to transform their disposition, and pursue salvation. Only those who pursue the truth are true believers, and can achieve salvation. Some people have passion and are willing to expend themselves for God, but they are not necessarily people who pursue the truth. Although everyone is willing to pursue the truth, some people are of poor caliber, they lack comprehension ability and cannot grasp the truth. Some people do not have spiritual understanding; no matter how they listen to sermons, they never understand, nor do they understand when they read God's words. They always interpret things in a distorted way, and try to apply rules. These are people who do not have spiritual understanding. There are people in the church who have spiritual understanding, and those who do not have spiritual understanding; there are those with poor caliber who lack comprehension ability, and those of good caliber who have a pure understanding of God's words; there are those who pursue the truth, and those who do not. These different types of people all have different states and manifestations, and you must be able to discern between them clearly.

Let's start by discussing the first type of person—people who do not have spiritual understanding. For example, we fellowship on an aspect of the truth, and after we finish fellowshiping on this aspect of the truth and people's states, attitudes, intents, and manifestations, there are some people who don't understand what was said, don't understand what was fellowshiped on, who can't compare themselves to it, and don't know what relationship their behavior and manifestations, their corrupt disposition, and their nature essence have with the truth that was fellowshiped on. They also don't know what this has to do with the things they pursue in their life, or why this sermon was preached—all they understand from it is doctrine, and they read rules into it. When someone asks them what they understood, they say, "Although many topics were fellowshiped on today, the main point was the same: If something happens, pray more." There are others who say, "I understand. God makes people be good, not do bad things, and do lots of good deeds. God likes this." There are still others who say, "God is telling people they must expend themselves for God, and give a lot of themselves." Have they understood God's words? (No.) These people all think they have understood His words, but they are actually fumbling around in the dark, and have latched on to just one sentence from His words. Their understanding is too one-sided, and they don't understand what God meant at all. For people who don't understand God's words, no matter how much God says, all they see are rules, doctrine, one kind of theory, one kind of perspective, or one kind of saying. When it comes to putting it into practice, how do they put it into practice? For example, when we talk about the truth of submitting to God, after listening they say, "I will do whatever God tells me to do. This is what it means to listen to His words and submit to Him." Isn't this overly simplistic? That's all they can understand. They do not understand what way of practicing God's words is true submission to Him, how to seek God's will and achieve submission to God, how to submit to the Holy Spirit's guidance, and how to practice the truth according to God's words, let alone how to stand on God's side and protect the church's work. The more something has to do with truths that are key to submitting to God, the more they are incapable of grasping it. All they know how to do is obey rules. This is what it means to not have spiritual understanding. Besides obeying rules and getting stuck in the rut of their own thinking, people who do not have spiritual understanding are impervious to reason. What is the primary expression of people who do not have spiritual understanding? (Obeying rules.) It is obeying rules. They often take a sentence or an event and designate it as a rule or a mode to follow. Do these people, then, treat the truth in the same way? (Yes.) Those who do not have spiritual understanding remember one aspect of the manifestations of the truth that you fellowshiped today; they designate those words and behaviors as rules that should be practiced, remembering each of them without fail. Then, next time, upon encountering a different situation, if no one fellowships, they will apply those prior methods and rules indiscriminately, and put them into practice. This is a concrete manifestation of people who do not have spiritual understanding. How do such people feel while they are obeying rules? (Tired.) They do not feel tired; if they did, they would stop. They feel they are practicing the truth; they do not feel they are obeying a set of rules, nor do they feel they do not have spiritual understanding. Still less do they feel they have not understood the truth, or that they have no understanding of what the truth principles are. On the contrary, they think they have understood the practical side of the truth, as well as the principles of that aspect of the truth; at the same time, they think they have understood God's will, and that, if they can act in line with their rules, they will have entered that aspect of the truth reality, satisfied God's will, and put the truth into practice. Isn't this what people who do not have spiritual understanding think? (Yes, it is.) Does this way of thinking accord with the standards required by God? Is practicing by obeying rules actually a manifestation of pursuing the truth? (No, it's not.) Why not? (Because when something happens they do not seek the truth, and do not put effort into contemplating the matter; they just cling stubbornly to the way they've always done things.) This is how the type of people who do not have spiritual understanding act—they stubbornly cling to old ways, are lazy, do not seek the truth when things happen, and do not think about things or investigate. Also, even if they investigate, are they able to understand what it means? (No.) Why don't they understand? (Because they do not have spiritual understanding.) Correct. What it boils down to is that people like this do not have spiritual understanding, and will never understand the truth.

Actually, in their hearts, people who do not have spiritual understanding are willing to pursue the truth, but they go about it in the wrong way. To be precise, they rely mainly on obeying rules, coloring within the lines, and adhering to doctrine, or applying other people's ways of doing things, and mimicking their words. So, what is the essence of this sort of person? Why do they treat obeying rules as practicing the truth, and think that practicing in this way is pursuing the truth? Why does this problem occur? There is a root—can you see it? (They treat their views, notions, and imaginings as the truth. They do not understand God's words, and have not truly grasped God's will.) This is part of it. What else? (They are arrogant and self-righteous, and when something happens they do not seek the truth. They treat the things they think are right as the truth.) This is the way some people who do not have spiritual understanding are, but this is not the root of the problem. What made people like this manifest themselves this way? People who do not have spiritual understanding and like to obey the rules listen to sermons very earnestly, especially when it concerns their practice. For example, how to perform their duties, and how to do the things they should do well. They pay attention, but the central problem is that they cannot draw comparisons between their state and what they hear in the sermon. For example, if it talks about people's rebelliousness, after they listen, they think, "Rebellious? Not me! If people are not allowed to be rebellious, then if I come across a situation like this in the future, I shouldn't speak up. I should just bear it, and read people's tone and expressions. I will look at what people around me say, and how they do things, and follow suit. Then, I won't be rebellious, right?" After they listen to a sermon, the conclusions they draw are just a bunch of their own logic and methods of practice. They have no response to all the states exposed in the sermon, and cannot draw any comparisons with themselves. Their minds are muddled. What do I mean by "muddled"? They do not know what the sermon is actually talking about. Inside, they think, "What is being fellowshiped on? Why is it not put in plainer terms? Today this stuff is being fellowshiped on, and tomorrow it will be some other stuff." From their perspective, practicing the truth is easy: Just do what you are asked to do. So far as all the states and corrupt dispositions that are exposed in the sermon, they cannot compare them with themselves. They are hazy and draw a blank when it comes to what thoughts, ideas, and various corrupt dispositions people reveal in each sort of circumstance during the process of life entry. They can't distinguish between the details, nor draw comparisons with themselves. How do people who can't draw comparisons with themselves feel after listening to the truth? (They think it is talking about other people, and that it has nothing to do with themselves.) That's right. This is the main feature; they cannot draw comparisons with themselves. When they see words which reveal people's corrupt states, they think it is talking only about other people. They can admit it when average problems or common problems people have are revealed, but when it comes to words pertaining to corrupt dispositions or people's essences, they categorically do not accept it; they will not admit it under any circumstances—it is as though admitting it would mean they were condemned. This is the problem all people who do not have spiritual understanding have in common. When they are faced with God's exposure of every kind of state and manifestation people have, and every way their nature essence reveals itself, they do not accept any of it, nor do they compare themselves with it or reflect. Instead, they frequently take these words and problems and project them onto other people, thinking it has nothing to do with themselves. Not only do people like this not accept the truth, but they do not have normal thought processes, their words are evasive and circle around, and the question they answer is not the one you asked. For example, if you ask them whether they have eaten yet, they say they do not want water; if you ask them if they feel sleepy, they say they are not thirsty. They are frequently in this kind of muddled state, and mixed-up frame of mind. This is how people who do not have spiritual understanding manifest themselves. There are people who do not have

spiritual understanding in every church. Although they have problems in common with each other, there are also subtle differences. Are there any people who completely lack spiritual understanding? (Yes.) People who have believed in God for under three years are very fuzzy on matters like believing in God, life entry, pursuing the truth, pursuing the transformation of their dispositions, and being perfected. They rely on just passion to perform their duty, doing this or that for God, and are at the stage of putting in effort and service. They do not understand matters to do with life entry, and they have absolutely no concept of life entry and pursuing the truth. They just like to do things which are visible on the outside, and lean into their passion to do it. These are people who completely lack spiritual understanding. Can someone who completely lacks spiritual understanding at this stage be labeled as someone who does not pursue the truth? (No.) They haven't believed in God for a long enough time, so they cannot be labeled yet. Because they are still in the passionate stage, they do not understand anything about the aims of God's management plan, people's path to salvation, or the different paths each type of person follows, so their lack of spiritual understanding is forgivable; this is a normal thing. However, as for those who already understand what life entry is, and have already begun to be acquainted with all the truths pertaining to life entry and the transformation of dispositions, are there any among them who completely lack spiritual understanding? (Yes, there are.) They still exist. Even if someone who completely lacks spiritual understanding is willing in their heart to pursue the truth, they cannot achieve it, so it can be said with certainty that there is no way people who completely lack spiritual understanding are people who pursue the truth, and absolutely no way their manifestations will be that of a person who pursues the truth.

What are the different ways people who have spiritual understanding and those who do not have spiritual understanding manifest themselves? People who do not have spiritual understanding are fundamentally unaware and ignorant of the truths God has fellowshiped on, as well as the states, context, and indications of His words, and they cannot compare themselves to it. Those who have spiritual understanding are the exact opposite. For example, if I fellowship on people's rebelliousness, and that within rebelliousness there is intransigence, selfishness, and stubborn foolishness, as well as misunderstandings about God, and resistance and opposition toward Him, when I talk about states pertaining to this topic, no matter whether I give an example, talk about an aspect of the truth, touch on a state that exists in your heart, or fellowship on topics about the truth principles, if you truly understand what you hear, then you are a person who has spiritual understanding. If you understand what you hear and are able to put it into practice, then you are a person who practices the truth. When people who have spiritual understanding hear God's words, they are capable of pure comprehension, and can even understand the truth. No matter what God talks about, they are able to keep up, and are able to draw comparisons between their state and God's words, and can find a path to practice. This is the manifestation of having spiritual understanding. After people who have spiritual understanding read God's words, their heart is brightened and they gain something from it. Their spirit is particularly free, and they feel there is a path they can follow. Therefore, every time they listen to a sermon they gain something from it, and every time they read God's words, they are enriched. This is how spiritual understanding manifests itself. No matter what God fellowships, after those who have spiritual understanding hear it, images will surface in their minds, and when God reveals people's states, they can draw comparisons. When He talks about misunderstandings about God, they apply it to their state, and realize, "This demand of mine, and these imaginings I have are actually misunderstandings about God." They have made the connection. When He talks about resistance and opposition toward God, if they have these same emotions, live in the same states, and have these dispositions and essences inside, they can draw a comparison between them. What sort of things can they use to draw comparisons? Thoughts, ideas, or the actions and behaviors they display; these can all be used to draw comparisons. When people can understand what God is saying, and understand what exactly He's talking about, and know what behavior, revelations, manifestations, states, and essences of theirs match the states God has exposed, and which are talked about in sermons, then they have manifested spiritual understanding. Can you tell whether or not you have spiritual understanding? (Sometimes I understand, and sometimes I don't.) This can be remedied, but if you do not understand at all, then it spells trouble. If you know what God's words are talking about most of the time, even if you cannot draw any comparisons with yourself, but you know you have states of this sort, or have noticed them in other people, and know this aspect of the truth, and how you should enter in, then it already counts as having spiritual understanding. However, is this sort of person able to manifest spiritual understanding every time they hear a sermon? No, sometimes they have spiritual understanding, and sometimes they don't. Because life entry touches on many aspects of the truth. There are some truths you understand and have entered into, and others which you don't understand and have not yet entered into. There are some truths you have not encountered at all, and have not even heard of. Now you have heard it, but it's hard to say whether or not you can understand it, and you may even have notions or misunderstandings about it. However, this is normal. If there are some aspects of the truth you understand, then those are aspects in which you have spiritual understanding; if there are some aspects of the truth you do not understand, then those are aspects in which you do not have spiritual understanding; if there are some aspects of the truth you have never heard of and which are still quite foreign to you, or which you even have notions about, then those are aspects in which you are even more lacking in spiritual understanding. You must go through a period of experience until you understand the truth before you attain spiritual understanding in those aspects. For example, some people have misunderstandings about God, but they still think, "I haven't misunderstood God; I have never misunderstood God. I couldn't love God more! So how could I misunderstand Him?"

These are the words people who do not have spiritual understanding speak. If you say, "People often misunderstand God, but they can't control it; the misunderstandings crop up at any time and any place. However, as of this time, I am seemingly unaware of any aspects in which I have misunderstood God, or have been in contradiction with Him. I need to go through things with a fine-toothed comb, have experiences, and pray to God and ask Him to orchestrate situations to reveal these things to me." This is ideal. This is the wish you should have in mind—you must keep on striving to improve. If someone says, "I have never misunderstood God. This is talking about other people," the fact that they could say something so absurd shows they do not have spiritual understanding. What dispositions do people who do not have spiritual understanding primarily reveal? Arrogance and stubborn foolishness. What is stubborn foolishness? It means you are both foolish and stubborn. How does it manifest itself in concrete terms? (They are unaware of corrupt dispositions everyone else can see, and think they do not have these dispositions. They are also particularly self-righteous, and think they are completely in the right.) Not only do they think they don't have this aspect of corruption, they also think they're doing well. They are controlled on the inside by their arrogant disposition, and think that they would never do something like that. No matter what other people say, so long as they themselves have not realized, seen, or experienced something, they think there is no need to reflect and understand, or accept it. This is stubborn foolishness. What's another way to describe stubborn foolishness? It is when you are impervious to reason. Are there any other terms? (Stupidity.) Yes, stubborn foolishness is largely connected to stupidity—they are both foolish and stubborn. For example, other people say, "You should be careful. Always drinking cold water can slow digestion and give you a stomachache." And they respond, "My body is in excellent health. There's nothing wrong with me. You're worrying about nothing." Is this not stubborn foolishness? (Yes.) They appear very stubborn and foolish because they have not experienced something, yet they are so self-righteous. Why do I say they are stubborn and foolish? Because they have no experience, yet dare contradict what someone with experience says. They do not confirm the accuracy of these words or learn a lesson from them; instead, they think they are so right, and do not accept what other people say. This is stubborn and foolish, as well as arrogant and self-righteous. In his life entry, Peter was able to learn from others' failures. What do God's words say? (God says Peter "assimilated what was good from times gone by, and rejected what was bad" (The Word, Vol. 1. The Appearance and Work of God. How to Know Reality).) Stubborn and foolish people cannot even accept things that happen right in front of their eyes, and they do not learn from it. People see this as being stupid, but it is actually a problem with their disposition—it is caused by an arrogant disposition.

Let us return to the topic of how those who have spiritual understanding manifest themselves, and how those who do not have spiritual understanding manifest themselves. What did I say just now was the main way in which those who have spiritual understanding manifest themselves? Tell Me. (Those who have spiritual understanding can understand which human states God's words are exposing, and draw comparisons with their own thoughts, ideas, actions, and behavior in their daily lives. They can understand what God is saying.) You hit most of the main points. When people who have spiritual understanding read God's revelatory words, they are able to draw comparisons with themselves, and know what truths God's words are talking about, what people should enter into, what human dispositions His words are exposing, and what human states and manifestations His words are exposing. They are able to hold themselves up for comparison to all these things, and be aware of them. This is how spiritual understanding manifests itself. Earlier, when I was fellowshiping about how people who have spiritual understanding manifest themselves, we raised a question, which was whether they have spiritual understanding in all matters. Do they? (No. In some matters, they are able to compare themselves to the states God's words expose, and so they manifest spiritual understanding; whereas in matters which they have not yet experienced they are unable to draw comparisons with themselves, so they do not have spiritual understanding.) If they have not yet experienced something and are unable to draw comparisons with themselves, then they do not have spiritual understanding. What if, then, there are things which they have experienced, but they do not understand the truths contained therein, and so they do not accept them, or do not acknowledge them as truth—does that count as having spiritual understanding? (No.) This is not having spiritual understanding, either. What if they do not understand that the things they hear are the truth—does this count as having spiritual understanding? (No.) Do any of you manifest yourselves in these ways? For example, when it comes to truths about obedience, some people say, "We must be obedient in this matter. People have nothing to brag about, and it is their duty and obligation to be obedient." After hearing this, you think to yourself, "What sort of truth is this? Be obedient in this matter too? The way I see it, there is no need to be obedient here!" Do you not lack spiritual understanding in this matter? (Yes.) Actually, this has nothing to do with how deep or shallow your experiences are; it is purely a question of whether or not you have spiritual understanding. I'll give an example. When Job was tested, what did he say? ("Jehovah gave, and Jehovah has taken away; blessed be the name of Jehovah" (Job 1:21).) After people hear him say this, can they understand the truth therein? (No.) So do people have spiritual understanding of this matter? (No.) No, they do not. Every person is capable of experiencing the two matters of God giving and taking away, are they not? (Yes.) You have already experienced them, but you do not understand the truth contained therein, so do you have spiritual understanding of these matters? (No.) No. you do not. What truth is contained in the words Job spoke? (That God is sovereign and rules over all.) It is that God is sovereign over all matters and all things, and the decision to give or take away lies with Him. So, what should people practice? (Obedience.) That is correct. They should obey, accept, and praise God's sovereignty. When people understand these words and the truth that is contained within them, then they have spiritual understanding of this matter. If people do not understand the truth contained within these words, then they do not have spiritual understanding of this matter. At this point in time, do you have spiritual understanding of Job's words? (No.) If what you understand is doctrine, you say, "Job had a good experience. God said that Job was a righteous person, so everything he did must certainly have been in line with the truth, and able to satisfy God's will." You understand the doctrine. So, when will this doctrine become your truth reality? (When God actually orchestrates circumstances wherein things are taken away from me, and I am able to thank and praise God, obey God, and not complain, and thereby practice this aspect of the truth.) You are able to practice it, but is your practice that of following rules and copying others, or a true understanding deep in your heart of God's sovereignty? There is a difference here, is there not? Which one is entering into the truth reality? There are many people now who, having seen the example Job set, are able to say the same things Job did, but when they say these things, are they just copying him, or are their words, like Job's, spoken upon realizing, after several decades of experience, the truth and fact that God is sovereign over humankind? Which of these is the truth reality? (That which comes from experience is reality.) Only things that you feel and understand through experience are the truth reality; copying things that other people say is not reality. The phrase Job spoke had an aspect of reality to it, but when the same phrase is spoken by people who copy his words, it becomes a slogan they use to dress themselves up and disguise themselves as spiritual people. These people are religious frauds. Some people who are chosen to become leaders in the church and who have responsibility and status often fellowship with brothers and sisters on those words that Job spoke: "Jehovah gave, and Jehovah has taken away; blessed be the name of Jehovah." How do the people listening feel? What they feel is, "These words are from God. They were brought forth through the enlightenment of the Holy Spirit and God's guidance. They are extremely real." Less than a year later, those leaders are dismissed for not doing real work, for delaying the life entry of God's chosen ones, and for delaying the progress of the church's work, and afterward they become negative and complain. People like this speak the same words Job did, but have not experienced the things Job did, and do not have a deep understanding, experience, or comprehension of these words. Therefore, when they speak, are they copying or speaking with sincerity? (They are copying.) When it comes down to what they think deep inside, when they speak, their words include their personal feelings, and are sincere. They have a wish, which is that when God gives them things, they are always able to praise Him and thank Him for the blessings and gifts He has bestowed on them, and that when God takes things away from them, they absolutely will not complain, but will be able to praise God like Job did, and thank God for His guidance and sovereignty. However, this is just a wish, and it is not yet something they have experienced. When their position and title are gone, and they are just a regular believer, do they walk the talk? (No.) I can't say that they do not walk the talk at all; that depends on what type of person they are. People who pursue the truth use these words to evaluate their own behavior, and use them as the guide for their experience, and are able to draw comparisons with themselves, and find a path of practice in them. They are not too upset or negative, and are able to perform their duty normally. By contrast, people who do not pursue the truth and who instead recite slogans are in trouble; they manifest themselves differently. What are the most obvious ways you have seen people of this type reveal themselves? (After being dismissed, some leaders do not try to know themselves, and do not submit. They think that their dismissal was unfair, and become negative and complain. The next time there is an election they struggle to regain power, and ultimately become an antichrist and are expelled.) This is the most severe case. What other manifestations are there? (Some people just work at a regular job after being dismissed, and do not perform a duty.) What sort of person is this? Why did they boast and recite slogans before? They were reciting things for others to hear, and used these slogans, doctrine, and pleasant-sounding words to embellish themselves, win people over, and make people revere them. That was their goal. What other manifestations are there? (Before they are dismissed, some leaders and workers outwardly appear to pursue hard, and say, "Jehovah gave, and Jehovah has taken away," but after they are dismissed, they are negative and cannot pick themselves up, and even lash out and get mad at people, thinking that what they expended and gave of themselves before was all in vain, as though God's house owes them.) People who say these things and act this way have a severe problem. First of all, one must discern the nature of them saying these things. They do not pursue the truth; they copy Job's words; they fabricate a beautiful crown for their head, and pass themselves off as spiritual people in order to show off and deceive people. Is this not a manifestation of toying with the truth, and of blaspheming against God? Tell Me, which type of people, when they lose their reputation, self-interest, and status, have a particularly big reaction, nosedive into negativity, stop doing their duty, make a bad situation worse by writing themselves off as a lost cause, and even stop believing? (People with poor humanity, and evil people.) That's right. People with poor humanity and evil people certainly are not people who pursue the truth, but if people with good humanity do not pursue the truth, will they also manifest themselves this way? They certainly will. Besides evil people manifesting themselves in this way, there is another situation which is directly connected to what people pursue and the path they walk on. Even if on the surface it seems like people who do not love the truth have some humanity, no good will come of it, and they all have evil essences, are capable of violating the truth and resisting God, and if they have status, they are capable of doing evil. There is another, most severe, problem, which is that people like this are particularly keen on pursuing status. If they are not allowed to have status, or are not allowed to be a leader, it is as though their life is being taken away. Can they accept it? When they have status, no matter how much they suffer or how much mistreatment they endure, they are willing. However, one cannot say they are people who pursue the truth just because they are willing, or because they endure suffering and pay a price. That would be wrong. What they pursue is reputation, selfinterest, and status; what they pursue are the benefits of status. In what way is this similar to Paul? (He pursued a crown.) That's correct. He pursued a crown, and it was the crown of righteousness. This is what people like Paul pursue—they treat the pursuit of a crown as a proper pursuit, and as the pursuit of the truth. After this, will you have some discernment regarding people of this sort? (Yes.) Suppose that a person lashes out and gets mad at people after being dismissed and losing their status, and doesn't pay any attention to or talk to brothers and sisters they see, and when they are asked to spread the gospel, they say, "I will not spread the gospel. I will not serve you! You think of me when you need me, but just kick me to the side and dismiss me when you don't. I'm not that stupid!" What kind of words are these? Are they easy to discern? How are they a believer? They are not any sort of true believer, or any sort of good person. Which type of people have the biggest reaction after being dismissed? (People who pursue reputation, self-interest, and status.) Just now, you said that people of this type have poor humanity, or that they do not pursue the truth or life entry. Is that related to the essence of this problem? (No.) What you say seems to make some sense, but it has no connection to the essence of this problem. It is not the essence of this problem. Just now, you said that the reason why some people complain and write themselves off after being dismissed is because they have poor humanity. Why do I say this is doctrine? It is because some people have fairly good humanity, and sincerely give of themselves and expend themselves, it is just that they do not pursue the truth, and always pursue reputation and status. As a result, when they are ultimately dismissed they have a huge reaction. This shows that the ways they manifest themselves are not just problems of poor humanity, but problems with their disposition—their disposition is so severely corrupted! Some people sum it up in one phrase, and say, "This person does not pursue the truth. That is the reason." This statement is too broad. There are many ways in which not pursuing the truth can manifest itself: Complaining, not being devoted to performing your duty, etc. are all examples. One cannot explain every problem with the single phrase "they don't pursue the truth." This is overly broad and not concrete. It is an explanation based on doctrine.

Now I will fellowship on how a lack of spiritual understanding manifests itself. What attitude do those who do not have spiritual understanding have toward the truth? How do they approach their own state, manifestations, and the corruption they reveal? Are they capable of possessing the manifestations of a person who pursues the truth? (No.) What is the biggest problem here? (They do not understand which human states or manifestations God's words are exposing, and are unable to use these things to draw comparisons with themselves.) It is mainly that they cannot draw comparisons with themselves. Can they be said to understand the truth if they are unable to draw comparisons with themselves? (No.) You are talking about one thing, but they always talk about something completely opposite to it; they are always at odds with you and debate with you. There is no common focus in the issue that you and them are debating, and it is not the same matter, but they still think they are quite justified. This is how those who do not have spiritual understanding manifest themselves. People who do not have spiritual understanding cannot understand the truth. Are they capable of pursuing the truth? (No.) This is troublesome. If they are not capable of pursuing the truth, then can they have life entry? (No.) Those who do not pursue the truth can't possibly have life entry; this is an absolute. If a person has believed in God for several years but does not understand the truth at all, then are they a person who pursues the truth? They certainly are not. Some people say, "That's not always the case. Although some people do not understand the truth, they are very passionate, and forsake everything to expend themselves for God. How could they not be someone who pursues the truth?" Is this view correct? When evaluating whether a person pursues the truth, one can't just look at whether they forsake everything to expend themselves for God. The main thing one must look at is what their heart puts importance on. If what their heart puts importance on is practicing the truth, entering into the truth, and gaining the truth, and they are effective in life entry, then they are someone who pursues the truth. If they forsake and expend themselves in order to obtain a crown and reward, and they have forsaken and expended themselves for many years, suffered much, but have not been able to understand the truth or enter into reality, and have not been able to understand God, then is their forsaking and expending actually pursuit of the truth? It is apparent that they are not someone who pursues the truth, because their forsaking and expending has not resulted in them understanding the truth or entering into the truth realities. Therefore, the fact that they forsake and expend does not mean they pursue the truth. People like this are just like Paul. Paul spent half his life preaching and working on behalf of the Lord, but he did not gain the truth, nor did he gain the Lord. So, can you say that Paul was someone who pursued the truth? When it comes to whether a person pursues the truth, it is crucial that one looks at whether the goal they are pursuing, and their intent, put importance on gaining the truth. If they actually do put importance on putting effort into the truth, and have been effective at things like practicing the truth and entering into reality, only then are they someone who pursues the truth. Everyone who truly pursues the truth is capable of practicing the truth, and only those who practice the truth are those with life entry. If someone says they are a person who pursues the truth, but they do not practice the truth, then would you say this person has life entry? They certainly do not. How could someone who doesn't practice the truth have life entry? This is absolutely impossible. If they think they are someone who pursues the truth and has life entry, then you should ask them, "What is the proof of your life entry?" It is not enough to just take their word for it. If there is no proof, what they say holds no water. If you say you are someone who pursues the truth, how many truths do you understand? How many truths have you put into practice? Which aspects of the truth realities have you entered into? Can you talk about your experiential testimony? If you cannot talk about your experiential testimony, then you are tricking and misleading people by saying you are a person who pursues the truth. Why do I say that Paul was not someone who pursued the truth? It's because the letters Paul wrote did not contain any testimonies of life experience at all; he wasn't able to talk about a true understanding of God, let alone talk about love or obedience to the Lord Jesus. He didn't even have an understanding of his own corrupt disposition. He just said that he was the worst sinner. He said this based on the fact that he was punished for resisting the Lord Jesus. By saying he was the worst sinner, he was simply admitting the fact that he had sinned by fanatically resisting the Lord Jesus. Does this mean he truly understood his own corrupt disposition and essence? (No.) That's why I say that when it comes to what constitutes pursuing the truth, and what sort of person has life entry, it should be determined based on whether they understand the truth and practice the truth, rather than just on what they themselves say. Do you understand what I am saying, now? Why are we fellowshiping in such detail? Is it necessary? (Yes.) Why is it necessary? I am fellowshiping in this way in order to dissect your fallacious views, fix things you wrongly think are right, help you find a way out, let go of the things you wrongly think are right, and then enter the path of true pursuit of the truth. Then people will truly have life entry, and be capable of achieving true pursuit of the truth. People who do not have spiritual understanding do not understand matters of life entry or transforming dispositions. They think they have already transformed many aspects of themselves, and have achieved life entry. For example, they have changed some bad habits: They do not eat too much, sleep too much, are not lazy, and are more industrious than before, so they think this means they have life entry. There are other people who think about how they used to always scold people, but now they don't; they are able to say nice things and constructive things to people, and are sometimes able to help people. Because they can do these things, they think they are already practicing the truth and have gone through a transformation. Some people think they have life entry because they can forgo the pursuit of reputation, self-interest, status, and physical pleasures. This is a problem common to all people. They have practiced what they understand, what they think is right and good according to their notions, and they have already tackled many bad habits and problematic traits of the flesh, or have changed the regimen of their lifestyle on account of believing in God and pursuing the truth. At the same time, they have forsaken many fleshly benefits, forsaken their family and work, and abandoned their marriage and the secular world. They think they have transformed and are saved, and say, "Could I let all this go if I didn't believe in God? Could I have such a big transformation?" Is this not the biggest misunderstanding believers make? (Yes, it is.) Regardless of whether people have spiritual understanding or not, they all have this misunderstanding. Why do I say this is a misunderstanding? Why do I say a serious problem exists here? It's mainly because people believe in God but do not understand His will, meaning they do not understand what exactly God demands of people. Instead, they think according to human notions and imaginings, believing that being able to let go of their family, work, feelings, the secular world, the entanglements of the flesh, and even their property, means that they have life entry. This is a misunderstanding. Actually, God's will is that when people believe in God, they must fix their corrupt disposition, fix their problem of resisting God, and resolve the root of the sins they commit. To do this, people must understand the truth and understand God's disposition before they are able to cast off their corrupt disposition and achieve true obedience to God. This is what God demands of people, and also the work He does of saving people. People know nothing of God's work; they do not see the goal and effect He wants to accomplish through this work, so they replace the truth with human notions and imaginings, and take people's pursuits and what they are capable of accomplishing as God's will and what He demands of people. This is the misunderstanding people have when believing in God. These things they are capable of accomplishing only demonstrate their passion, and when they forsake things they are actually looking to make a transaction with God—it is done in exchange for a reward and a crown. They think transactions such as this are really worth it and that they're scoring a deal. That's the reason why they forsake everything. Forsaking things does not mean they have the truth realities, nor does it mean they are able to obey God. While they forsake and expend, do they really understand the truth? (No, they don't.) If they do not understand the truth, is their forsaking and expending tainted? Most certainly. Then what exactly are they pursuing by expending and suffering like this? People like this have never cared about what the truth is, or what God's demands are; they always think these things have nothing to do with them. In their hearts, whatever they think is right, whatever they think is good, and whatever they think is life entry, that is what they practice, and after practicing it, they think God has commemorated it. They treat these things as chips to trade and capital. Are these manifestations of pursuing the truth? (No.) This is a misunderstanding made by people who do not pursue the truth. It is one of the ways people who misunderstand life entry interpret things. So, how does one evaluate and prove that these things are not manifestations of them pursuing the truth, and that they do not have life entry? What facts can be used to verify that these things they say are wrong? (They act without the truth principles.) This is part of it. They act based on what they imagine. From the outside, they look like true believers; they are able to forsake things and expend themselves, but they are unprincipled in their actions. Why are they unprincipled? Because they do not pursue the truth. The perspectives from which they view things are still the same notions and imaginings they started with. There is one biggest problem people like this have: Do they submit to the environments God orchestrates? Do they understand why God orchestrated these environments? (No.) Is this enough to prove they do not have true life entry? (Yes.) They have made many changes to their bad habits and problematic traits, and have made many sacrifices.

Ultimately, when they are tested, not only do they not understand God's will, but they are still capable of complaining and cannot submit. What problem is this? It is that they do not have life entry. People who do not have life entry do not have the truth realities, isn't that right? (Yes.) When things happen, they rely completely on their own notions, imaginings, and natural preferences. When you truly get serious with them and ask them to obey, they are not obedient at all; they just rely on human reasons, excuses, and imaginings, and look for all sorts of ways to defend themselves, and accomplish their goal of disobedience to God, and denial of God's work. There are even some people who are so extreme that they are not only unable to obey, but still try and think up all the ways to prove their own notions and imaginings are correct, that the methods and paths they think of are right, and that God's actions and orchestrations are not necessarily right. This reveals that they have no life entry; everything they do and all they give of themselves or change about themselves are not life entry, they are just evil habits which no longer exist. The personal habits, regimen, and way of their life have changed a bit, and some people's tempers may even have changed; they speak more gently and in a more cultured way, and their outward behavior may be more standard, but when they do things they have no truth reality, and never do things according to God's words or the truth; it is all their own personal imaginings and wishes. They have no real understanding of God; they only know how to talk about a bit of spiritual theory, and have gotten stuck in human notions, imaginings, and feelings. What do you think, are these people pitiful? (Yes.) And are there many people like this? (Yes.) How do you know there are a lot? (Because I am one of them.) This strikes a chord with you, right? Then talk about your experiences in this regard. (I'll share an experience. A brother pointed out my shortcomings in front of a lot of other brothers and sisters, and at the time I felt humiliated. In order to regain my pride, I tried to defend and justify myself. I did not accept the brother's comments.) You were influenced by your pride. Why are people always influenced by pride? Because people with dignity all have thin skins, is that it? (No.) Actually, people do this because they want to maintain a perfect image in other people's eyes. They care about their status, and want to present themselves in a particularly perfect way, free of flaws. They want to leave a perfect impression in people's minds, and not let people see the truth about how they really are. This is the consequence of an arrogant disposition. Is this problem now resolved? (Not yet. I still reveal it often.) If a person is able to reflect on themselves and recognize their own corrupt disposition, then it will be easy to change. If they do not reflect on themselves, are unable to recognize their own corrupt disposition, and are numb to their problems and have no awareness, then it will be difficult to change. If they already have awareness, and feel that their arrogant disposition is severe, that their pursuits are askew, and that they are still far from pursuing the truth, but when they are pruned and dealt with, they are negative for a few days, and always look for ways to regain pride in every situation, then can a person like this change? It's hard for them to change. So, how should they resolve this problem?

By just accepting the truth and reflecting on themselves they still have hope of fixing the problem. If they cannot accept the truth, then they have no way of fixing the problem. The key is that people must have the resolve and wish to pursue the truth. When they have a heart which thirsts greatly for the truth, they will be able to love the truth and accept it, and they will have the strength to practice the truth and forsake the flesh. Only by accepting the truth can people thoroughly fix the problem of a corrupt disposition, and once their corrupt disposition has been fixed, they will be able to practice the truth, and then they will have life entry.

Those people who do not have spiritual understanding, and who always misinterpret the truth and life entry think that pursuing the truth is easy, that all it is is changing a few bad habits or problematic traits, or occasionally giving up things which are in their own interest, that so long as they do not do evil, and persevere in their faith until the end, they have gained life, and can exchange these things for God's rewards and blessings. Are people who base their belief in God on views like these people who pursue the truth? (No.) Are people who do not pursue the truth able to have life entry? (No.) There are many people who are not clear at all on what life entry is all about. They think one has life entry just by putting in some effort, doing one's duty, changing some bad habits and problematic traits, doing as one is told, and obeying a bit. They see life entry in an overly simplistic way. By believing in God this way, will they transform their life disposition? (No, they are just changing themselves on the outside, their essence hasn't changed.) You have changed a bit now, but are there changes to your outward behavior, or are there some changes to your life disposition? Have you found a way out of your incorrect views about life entry, and started to gain life entry? Are you able to evaluate which parts of yourselves have changed, and which parts have not? If you were given a duty to perform and were originally incapable of obeying, to what extent are you able to obey now? For example, you are a brother, and if you were asked to make meals and wash the dishes for the other brothers and sisters every day, would you obey? (I think so.) Perhaps you could in the short term, but if you are asked to do this duty long term would you obey? (I could obey on occasion, but as time went on I might not be able to.) This means that you have not obeyed. What is causing people to not obey? (It's because people have traditional notions in their hearts. They think men should work outside the home, and women should handle domestic work, that cooking is a woman's job and a man loses face by cooking. That's why it's not easy to obey.) That's right. There is sexual discrimination when it comes to the division of labor. Men think, "We men should be out there making a living. Things like cooking and washing should be done by women. We shouldn't be made to do it." But now these are special circumstances, and you are being asked to do it, so what do you do? What hang-ups must you get over before you can obey? This is the crux of the issue. You must get over your sexual discrimination. There is no work that must be done by men, and no work that must be done by women. Do not divide up labor this way. The duty people perform should not be determined according to their sex. You can divide labor this way in your own home and daily life, but now this has to do with your duty, so how should you interpret it? You should receive this duty from God and accept it, and change the incorrect views you have inside. You should say, "It is true that I am a man, but I am a member of the church and a created being in God's eyes. I will do whatever the church assigns me to do; things are not divided according to sex." First, you should let go of your incorrect views, then accept your duty. Is accepting your duty true obedience? (No.) In the days that follow, if someone says your food is too salty, or does not have enough flavor, or says you didn't make something well and they do not want to eat it, or tells you to make something new, will you be able to accept it? At that point, you will feel uncomfortable, and you will think, "I am a selfrespecting man, and I've already stooped to making meals for all these brothers and sisters, yet they still point out all these problems. I have no pride left at all." At this point, you don't want to obey, do you? (No.) This is a difficulty. Whenever you cannot obey, it is caused by a corrupt disposition revealing itself and causing trouble, and making you unable to practice the truth and obey God. At this point, your heart will be conflicted your thoughts are controlling you and making you think you have lost face, and you are upset inside. What should you do at this point? (Seek the truth.) How do you seek the truth? You must pray, "God, no matter what other people ask of me, I will treat it as my duty. No matter who it is I am outwardly serving or doing things for, I will accept it all from God. This is my duty and I should obey; I do not need my pride. In God's house, duties are not divided into high-level and low-level, high-status and low-status, duties for men, duties for women, duties for the elderly, and duties for the young. There are just duties which are done well and duties which are not, those done with devotion, and those which are not." After you have let go of your pride, status, position, and dignity, have you completely let go of yourself? (No.) You will still have a reaction. Sometimes, people will disrespect you, think you are stupid, and treat you as inferior, saying "A man who is that happy cooking won't amount to anything! I would never do that." They will lead you in the wrong direction, instill incorrect ideas and notions in you, and influence your practice. They see positive things like you placing importance on life entry, being a normal person, and being devoted to your duty as a form of humiliation, and therefore they treat you as inferior and judge you. If you cannot take it, you will immediately fall into negativity and think that this duty always makes you lose face in front of others, and makes people treat you as inferior and order you around. Then you won't obey again, right? When no one treats you as inferior or judges you, you think you are already able to obey, already have life entry, have some truth reality, and have some stature. Is this way of thinking correct? Then why, when someone judges you and your stature is challenged, do you become negative and think, "How much longer do I need to keep cooking before this is over? This person always looks down on me. It's not right of them to look down on me, and I can't accept it!"? Trouble has come up again. When you can't accept it, do you also complain at the same time, and say, "How could the leader assign this sort of duty to me? Why did they pick me in particular instead of picking someone else? Do I look easy to bully? People bully me, the leader doesn't look favorably upon me, and God does not protect me"? Your rebellious disposition has reared its head again. What is the problem here? Could it be that your stature is too small? You can't even withstand this small affront, and it makes you complain and become negative. Is this what it is to have truth realities? You do not have any truth realities. There is a very simple method to solve this problem: In your heart, you must think, "No matter who looks down on me or looks at me with disdain, I should do my duty. I cannot abandon God's commission. I am not doing it for other people, nor am I doing it so that others think something of me—what use is it for others to think something of me? I must fulfill my duty in order to satisfy God." This is how you should think in your heart. Now when you cook, don't you feel self-assured? Is the problem solved, then? Actually, it is not completely resolved. Ultimately, you are in a constant state of conflict, constantly falling into weakness and negativity and then pulling yourself back up; you are constantly being tempered. You have examined every state, and you are unwilling to always be living in such a taxing manner. You do not want these difficulties to always plague you, disturb you, or control you. You want to fulfill your duty easily and simply. So how do you accomplish this? You must constantly seek the truth, constantly stick to your conviction, and practicing according to God's words is always the right thing to do. You say, "No one can disturb me. This is my duty; this is the commission God gave me; this is my responsibility and my obligation. No matter who makes fun of me, gaslights me, or tempts me, it is of no avail. It is my honor to be able to perform my duty, and if I can handle it, all the glory goes to God. If I cannot handle it, then I have shamed myself. Whoever makes a joke of me and looks down on this duty is not someone who pursues the truth." Is this not fact? (It is.) This is fact. When Job was tested, Satan disturbed and tempted him, but did Job doubt? (No.) Because the truth, God's words, and God's way were in his heart. When faced with circumstances and tests, whether you are able to uphold the truth and uphold the commission God gave you depends on the extent to which you know, comprehend, and accept the truth. Some people are always doubtful of the truth, and can't get to a place of certainty about it, or with regard to their duty, they are never sure how they should be doing something, and whether it's the right way to do it. They are never able to stick with things that are right; they are always disturbed by some people, events, or things, and when bad people, evil people, demons, or Satans sidle up to them and say things which tempt or disturb them, they become weak and are deceived. Doesn't this mean they are small in stature? (Yes.) Is small stature easy to fix? In theory, it is. It depends on whether you can be sure the road you are on is one led by God. When you perform your duty, you should practice the truth and accept God's commission. This is crucial. The only thing to fear is that in your heart you have a biased view of your duty, and think your duty makes you lose face and amount to nothing. When you have biased views and others disturb you on top of that, it becomes even more troublesome. When your heart is all mixed up you cannot perform your duty well. When Job was tested, there were many people around him who disturbed him. What was it his wife said? ("Curse God, and die" (Job 2:9).) By which she meant, "Don't believe. If what you believed in was actually God, why would these things happen to you?" What did Job say? ("You speak as one of the foolish women speaks" (Job 2:10).) Job condemned his wife, because he was already certain that God was the true God, that God did this, that it was His sovereignty, and that it was the work of God's hands. Job was so certain, so once people today understand the truth, why can't they stick to the true way and stand firm in their testimony? It is because people's hearts are too tainted; not only do they not understand the truth, but they are not people who love the truth or seek the truth. Therefore, no matter how many words and doctrines people can talk about or how many resounding slogans they can spout, ultimately, they cannot stand firm. As soon as someone in the church says something slightly different, or someone says things which are disturbing or deceitful, or which condemn and humiliate, they think they are being mocked and humiliated, and are completely destroyed. If people manifest themselves in this way, are constantly conflicted inside, and constantly adjusting their views, but at the same time, are also constantly accepting God's sovereignty and arrangements, continuing to understand the truth, gradually entering different facets of the truth, entering into all the truths, and are ultimately able to avoid being disturbed, affected, or controlled by any sort of person, event, or thing, and firmly believe that the truth principles they practice are correct, then they have transformed their disposition.

At the present time, when you perform your duties, is it still possible for you to be controlled by every sort of person, event, or thing? Are you able to stick to the truth and do things in accordance with the principles? (No.) Then what difficulties do you usually have? (Sometimes, when I see other people doing things which harm the interests of God's house, I point it out, but when I see they do not accept it, or that they have a bad attitude, I am afraid of starting an argument, so I compromise.) Is compromising right or wrong? (It's wrong, but I'm afraid that if I press the matter an argument will break out and destroy the peace, and people will not have a good impression of me.) If you wish to avoid arguments, is compromise the only way? In what situations can you compromise? If it has to do with small matters, such as your own self-interest or your pride, then there is no need to argue about it. You can choose to be tolerant or to compromise. But with matters that can affect the church's work and harm the interests of the house of God, you must stick to the principles. If you do not observe this tenet, then you are not being loyal to God. If you choose to compromise and abandon the truth principles in order to save face or preserve your interpersonal relationships, is this not selfish and base of you? Is it not a sign of being irresponsible in your duty and disloyal to God? (It is.) So, if a time comes during the course of your duty when everyone is in disagreement, how should you practice? Is arguing about it with all your might going to solve the problem? (No.) Then how should you resolve the problem? In this situation, a person who understands the truth should come forward to resolve the issue, first laying the issue on the table and letting both sides say their piece. Then, everybody is to seek the truth together, and after praying to God, the relevant truth in God's words is to be brought out to fellowship on. After they have fellowshiped on the truth principles and gained clarity, both sides will be able to submit. They must learn to submit to the truth. If most people are able to submit to the truth, but there are a few who do not submit to the truth, or whom one cannot get to see reason, then they are people who do not accept the truth, and their natures are those of evil people, and God's chosen people will easily discern them. This is the best way to resolve the issue of arguments in the church. Using the truth to resolve problems is an important principle, and one cannot make unprincipled compromises. If, in order to preserve your personal relationships, pride, and self-interest, you are able to sacrifice the interests of the house of God, you are compromising with Satan. This is unprincipled, and disloyal to God. If each person fights to save their own face and puts emphasis on their own reasons, is this the attitude of seeking the truth? Is this the attitude one should have in their duty? (No.) For a person to achieve devotion in their duty, they should not fight over reputation or self-interest, they should let God have the authority, and let the truth be their master; the interests of the house of God are first and foremost, and effective work is first and foremost. Isn't this principle correct? (Yes.) If you are all able to adhere to this principle, what is left to argue with people about? There will be no arguments. Those who always protect their own interests and do not practice the truth at all are not good people, and those who always sell out the interests of God's house in order to garner favor from others are even worse. All these people are nonbelievers, and people who betray God. If a person gets into conflicts and debates with others in order to protect the interests of the house of God and the effectiveness of the church's work, and their attitude is a bit unyielding, would you say that is a problem? (No.) Because their intent is right; it is to protect the interests of God's house. This is a person who stands on God's side and sticks to the truth principles, a person in whom God delights. Having a strong, resolute attitude when protecting the interests of the house of God is a sign of a firm stance and sticking to the principles, and God approves of it. People may feel there is a problem with this attitude, but it is not a big one; it does not have to do with the revelation of a corrupt disposition. Remember, sticking to the truth principles is what is most important.

Life entry is the most crucial thing. What is life entry connected to, primarily? (Pursuing the truth.) That's right. It is primarily connected to pursuing the truth. Only people who pursue the truth have life entry. If people want to have life entry, then it concerns practicing the truth. How should one discern whether a person pursues the truth? What type of person does not pursue the truth? Do you know? The first type I talked about was people who do not have spiritual understanding. What is the essence of people who do not have spiritual understanding? (After reading words from God which expose people's corrupt dispositions, they are unable to draw a connection between God's words and their own states and manifestations; they think God is talking about other people.) It is mainly that they are unable to compare themselves to God's words, but do they know this? (No.) People who do not have spiritual understanding are incapable of realizing these things. Their hearts are still sunny; they think they understand many of God's words, but in fact, to them every word is just a rule. They think, "If God makes me do something, I will do it. If He makes me forsake something, I will forsake it; if He makes me expend myself, then I will do so. By obeying God this way, I am saved." After believing in this way for several years, they think they have capital, just like how Paul said, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: From now on there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness" (2 Timothy 4:7–8). No matter how you put it, Paul lacked spiritual understanding. It's a real pity. It's already troublesome when he did not have spiritual understanding, but on top of that, he did not pursue the truth. He treated all of his own doctrine, slogans, imaginings, notions, knowledge, and philosophies as though they were the truth, and used them as a foundation from which to expand his own pursuits. As a result, no matter what he did, he was not living out the truth realities, and no matter what he did, it was not in line with God's will. This problem of his was severe! Paul takes the cake when it comes to lacking spiritual understanding, isn't that right? (Yes.) Do people who do not have spiritual understanding love the truth? Absolutely not, because people who do not have spiritual understanding are incapable of grasping the truth, and if they do not grasp the truth, there is no way they can love the truth. How do people who do not have spiritual understanding manifest themselves? The primary manifestation is that no matter how people fellowship with them on God's words, they still do not understand, and no matter how clearly people fellowship with them on the truth, they are still incapable of grasping it. This is directly connected to being of too low a caliber. Can people who do not have spiritual understanding pursue the truth? They couldn't even if they wanted to. People who do not have spiritual understanding cannot understand what God is talking about, do not know what states God exposes, and cannot draw comparisons with themselves. They treat all of God's words as rules, phrases, slogans, and doctrine, and never know that God's words are the truth. What is the problem here? It is that their caliber is too low, they possess no comprehension ability at all, and are manifesting a lack of spiritual understanding.

The second type is people who have spiritual understanding. People who have spiritual understanding can understand the truth, draw comparisons with themselves when they eat and drink God's words, and understand what God's words are exposing, what truths are in God's words, and what God demands. Is the ability to understand equivalent to having entry? (No.) Then when I say they can understand, to what is it referring? What is it addressing? (They can draw comparisons between God's words and themselves.) The ability to draw comparisons with themselves is part of it. They admit man's corrupt dispositions and every kind of state that God exposes. So, are they capable of knowing what God demands? They should know to a certain degree—know

God's demands, know what principles are spoken of in God's words, and what His will is. They are clear on these things and understand them; that's why they are called people who have spiritual understanding. When people who have spiritual understanding eat and drink God's words, they are able to draw comparisons with themselves, understand what God's words are referring to and what His demands are. This shows that this type of person possesses the caliber and ability to comprehend the truth. So, does possessing this caliber and ability necessarily mean they have life entry? (No.) There are several different scenarios. Some people can understand God's words, and possess the caliber and ability to comprehend His words, but have never drawn comparisons with themselves. They just draw comparisons between God's words and other people, look for flaws in other people, hold their shortcomings over them, nitpick their states, and try to read their minds, as though they were a detector. When they have nothing else to do, they muse over what other people think, try to detect what people are thinking in their hearts, what thoughts and ideas are in their hearts, what their intent is, what their aim is, what their motivation is, what they hope for, and what corrupt dispositions they reveal while doing things. What is their goal in detecting these things? To draw comparisons between God's words and other people, then solve their problems. For example, the environment in which "Mr. Smith" lives, what his family background is like, how many years he has believed in God, what issues he usually has, what weaknesses he has when pursuing the transformation of his disposition, what difficulties he often has when things happen, in what situations it is easy for him to become negative, how well he performs his duty, how he approaches God's words, and whether his spiritual life is normal—they have a clear grasp on all these things. They are very intelligent, but unfortunately they don't apply their intelligence in the right places. They solve other people's problems, but do not practice the truth themselves. This type of person is often a leader or worker, or someone with some amount of responsibility. Is this method of pursuit that this type of person has problematic? (Yes.) This method of pursuit is problematic, and severely so. How severely? We should fellowship on this. This type of person has spiritual understanding, can understand God's words, and knows how to draw comparisons with God's words, but they have never drawn comparisons between God's words and themselves; instead, they draw comparisons between God's words and other people. What is their goal in drawing comparisons with other people? (To show off.) That's right. They show off to satisfy their desires and ambitions, to make their status more secure, and to make them more capable of capturing people's hearts. The fact that they could do this is connected to their nature, and directly connected to what they are pursuing when believing in God. If one were to judge by the fact that they put their whole heart into things and do their job to the full extent, and the fact that they are able to grasp all the various states that other people have very well, could one say that they are people who pursue the truth? Not necessarily. Then how can one tell whether someone is a person who pursues the truth? If they are particularly responsible when it comes to

brothers' and sisters' life entry, put a lot of heart and work into things, do their work very well, often seek the truth with regard to every sort of state brothers and sisters have, and then resolve the problems, by being able to perform their duty like this, are they a qualified leader? Judging from these manifestations and revelations of theirs, can one be sure they are someone who pursues the truth? (Not necessarily.) Why? (They can solve other people's problems, but have never drawn comparisons between God's words and themselves.) If they have never solved their own problems, then how do they solve other people's problems? (They rely on words and doctrines to solve them.) They understand some words and doctrines, have some smarts, have a good memory, react quickly to things, and as soon as they have heard a sermon, they are able to immediately go and show it off to others. Judging from these things, do they have entry? (No.) Resolving other people's difficulties but never resolving their own difficulties is not a manifestation of pursuing the truth. They just use doctrine and God's words, or all sorts of tactics and methods, to persuade and convince other people; they use the words and doctrines they understand, or imitate and copy words of life experience to help people out of hardship. They use these methods to resolve other people's difficulties rather than using what they have personally gone through and their actual experiences to resolve them. This proves that this person is not someone who pursues the truth. What is it they provide to other people? (Doctrine.) Why do we say it's doctrine? Because it does not come from their own experiences, it is not something they have actually gone through, and is not their true understanding. What is it they are actually watering others with? Doctrine, phrases, and words which persuade and console people. They also use human methods, tactics and smarts, and no matter what, they think that answering people's questions is solving problems, and that this is doing work. Judging from their manifestations, from the things they provide to others, the way they work, and the path they pursue, is this person someone who pursues the truth? (No.) They are not someone who pursues the truth. Isn't using the truth to resolve problems when they themselves have no entry a bit disingenuous? (Yes.) It is disingenuous; it is hypocritical, and it deceives others. So, can people like this perform their duties well? (No.) Why not? Because they do not pursue the truth, and there is a direct connection between performing one's duty well and understanding the truth. For example, one must understand the truth to water the church; one must understand the truth to resolve problems; one must also understand the truth to handle problems; understanding the truth is even more necessary in order to have discernment over people. Every facet of the church's work has to do with the truth; if one does not understand the truth, they will not do the church's essential work well, and will only do an okay job on general tasks. Therefore, if a leader does not pursue the truth, no matter how busy they are, how much legwork they do, or how much they suffer, they will not do a good job, and will be unable to fulfill their duty to the full extent of the job and responsibilities. When they work, they run around from place to place without cause, seeing where there are problems and then fixing them in a simplistic way. When someone has some sort of difficulty, they fellowship a bit of doctrine, and when someone is negative and weak, they encourage them and exhort them; these are the things they do. They think that if they keep their eye on the people they lead, so long as everyone is busy and not idle, they are doing their work well, and that if they can go around everywhere inspecting and directing work, not have anyone report or expose them, be able to preach and speak wherever they go, and have everything go smoothly without any hinderance, that they are fulfilling their responsibilities and duty. This is doing the work from the place of status, not using the truth to solve problems in a practical sense. They put importance on doing work, and while putting importance on working, they may not do anything for their status—all they do is single-mindedly use doctrine and slogans to exhort this person or encourage that person, single-mindedly busying themselves with this work. They think that so long as they are not idle, it is okay. The first thing is that they cannot slack off, the second is that they must be industrious, and the third is that they must be able to withstand suffering. They bustle about all day—if there is a problem somewhere it must be fixed at the earliest opportunity, and they must always ask around if anyone has any problems. They think that doing this is pursuing the truth. In actuality, does having these manifestations necessarily mean they pursue the truth? Does it necessarily mean they have life entry? This is still a matter of question. This is the first manifestation of people who have spiritual understanding but do not pursue the truth.

The second manifestation of people who have spiritual understanding but do not pursue the truth, is being able to understand God's words, understand the practical side of what His words are saying, and being able to draw comparisons between it and themselves, but never putting it into practice. This type of person does not do things according to God's words, or according to the truth principles, nor do they restrain themselves. When something happens, they just want to make people submit to them and listen to them, but they themselves do not want to submit to the truth. They treat practicing the truth and submitting to the truth as other people's responsibility, obligation, and duty, and as something which other people should do. They treat themselves as though they were set apart. No matter how much they understand, or how many of God's words they can link to themselves, they think everything God says is directed at other people and has nothing to do with themselves. So, what is it they do? They are very busy too. They go to church and see who has a criticism about them, then make note of it. Then, they wrack their brains to think of ways to "fix" it. They say, "Let's open ourselves up and fellowship. Whatever you think inside, whatever opinions you have about me, and whatever criticisms you have about me, just let me know and I will do my best to change and do things differently." What is their goal in changing? To make other people like them. Besides this, they see who has a criticism about them, and who does not submit to them, and then find relevant passages of God's words to "fix" it. They say, "God is the master when the house of God elects leaders and workers. In the house of God, the truth is the authority. Whoever the brothers and sisters elect as leader, that is what God wished, and you should submit to it. You are not submitting to me, but to the guidance of the Holy Spirit, and to the truth. If you do not submit, you will be punished!" After listening, some people know the leader is misinterpreting God's words, and twisting the facts to deceive people, and do not listen. When the leader sees these people are not quite submitting to them, they think, "You're refusing to submit to me, aren't you? I have other ways of dealing with you. I'm going to take off the kid gloves." The leader says to the people who do not submit to them, "Have you finished the task I gave you?" And the people say, "There is just a little bit left to do before it is finished. It won't cause any delays." The leader says, "How is there being a little bit left not a delay? In God's eyes, a little bit is a lot. This is a manifestation of disloyalty. You call this doing your duty?" Actually, is this really what the leader wants to say? What goal do they have in their heart? They want to force the other people into submission, defeat them, and take them down a peg, but they cannot say so explicitly. If they did, the brothers and sisters would see through them and expose them, so they must find an upstanding reason and excuse for doing things; they must suppress people in a "respectable and reasonable" manner, so that after they have suppressed people it is not apparent to others, makes the people in question submit, and achieves the leader's goal of strengthening their stance and solidifying their status. What disposition is this? (They are insidious and scheming.) They are insidious, scheming, venomous, and do things for the sake of status. They pay no heed to things which do not concern their status, and do not put any heart into them, but when it comes to things which affect their status, reputation, selfinterest, pride, and their position in the church, they latch on to these things and don't let them go, and start to get serious. When fellowshiping on the truth in their usual gatherings, they will sometimes know themselves, draw comparisons between God's words and themselves, and expose their own corrupt disposition, but there is an objective behind it, an intent: It is all to make others look up to them, envy them, and revere them, and to solidify their status. They have ambitions and an objective. If it is not for the sake of their status, they do not say a word; if it is not for the sake of securing their status, then they do nothing—everything they do is for the sake of their status. They will break their back for the sake of their status, but if it is for the sake of the church's work, when they discover problems they will not resolve them, when other people report problems they will not address them, and they will not lift a finger to attend to anything; they see other people busy performing their duties, but they do nothing at all. What sort of person is this? (A base and vile person who lives only for reputation, self-interest, and status.) Is someone who just lives for status someone who pursues the truth? Are they capable of pursuing the truth? (No.) It's hard to say. If they have a little bit of an awareness of conscience, have a sense of shame, have dignity and character, and are able to accept the truth after experiencing some chastisement and judgment, experiencing being pruned and dealt with, or being tested and refined, then it is possible

they can turn things around. However, if they are numb, dull-witted, intransigent, and do not accept the truth at all, then no matter how much they understand, is it of any use? (No.) No matter how much they understand it will not be able to move their heart. No matter how busy they seem on the outside, how much time they spend running about the streets, how much they sacrifice, give up, and expend, can the kind of people who only ever speak and act for the sake of status be considered those who pursue the truth? Absolutely not. For status, they will pay any price. For status, they will suffer any hardship. For status, they will stop at nothing. They try to find dirt on others, frame them, or give them a hard time, trampling other people underfoot. They don't even fear the risk of punishment and retribution; they act for the sake of status without any thought of the consequences. What do people such as this pursue? (Status.) Where is the similarity with Paul? (The pursuit of the crown.) They pursue the crown of righteousness, they pursue status, reputation, and self-interest, and treat the pursuit of status, reputation, and self-interest as legitimate pursuit, rather than pursuing the truth. What is the foremost characteristic of such people? It is that in all respects, they act for the sake of status, reputation, and self-interest. This type of person, who does things for the sake of reputation, self-interest, and status, is the most adept at deceiving others. When you first meet them, you cannot see through them. You see that the doctrine they speak sounds good, what they say seems practical, the work they arrange is very fitting, and they seem to have some caliber, and you admire them quite a bit. This type of person is also willing to pay a price when performing their duty. They work hard every day but never complain about being tired. They don't have a single ounce of fragility. When other people are weak, they are not. They also do not lust after comforts of the flesh, and are not picky eaters. When their host family prepares something special for them, they refuse it and do not eat it. They only eat everyday foods. Whoever sees people like this admires them. So, how can one discern whether they are doing things for the sake of status? First, one must look at whether they are a person who pursues the truth. Where will this be evident? (Their intent and starting point when doing things.) This is part of it. It will mainly be evident in the goal they are pursuing. If it is for the sake of gaining the truth, they will put importance on reading God's words often, understanding the truth and knowing themselves through God's words. If they fellowship often on knowing themselves, they will be able to see that they lack too many things, do not have the truth, and will naturally strive to pursue the truth. The more people know themselves, the more they are able to pursue the truth. Those who always say and do things for the sake of status are obviously not people who pursue the truth. When they are pruned and dealt with they do not accept it—they are very afraid of their reputation being damaged. So, are they able to accept God's words of judgment and chastisement and reflect on themselves? Can they truly understand deviations in their own experience? If they do not have any of these manifestations, then one can be certain that they are not people who pursue the truth. Tell Me, what other manifestations do people have who do not love the truth and who

pursue status? (When others give them criticism, they do not accept it, and instead get defensive, justify themselves, and give reasons. They speak in order to maintain their pride and preserve their status. If someone does not support them, they attack and judge them.) When people attack and judge others, and speak and defend themselves for the sake of their own pride and status, the intent and goal behind their actions is obviously wrong, and they are living entirely for status. Can the sort of people who say and do everything for the sake of status have consideration for God's will? Can they accept the truth? Absolutely not. They think if they have consideration for God's will they must practice the truth, and if they practice the truth they must suffer and pay a price. Then, they will lose the enjoyment that comes with status, and will be unable to enjoy the benefits of status. Therefore, they choose to just pursue reputation, self-interest, and status, and pursue getting rewards. In what other ways do people who pursue status manifest themselves? What other things do they do? (If they see some talented individuals around them who are more given to pursuing the truth, and who are worthy of nurturing, and who brothers and sisters are more inclined to support, then out of fear that these people will stand up and replace them, and threaten their status, they think of ways to suppress these talented individuals, and find all sorts of reasons and excuses to put them down. The most common way, is to label them as overly arrogant, selfrighteous, and as always constraining others, and make people believe these things are true, and not let the house of God promote or nurture these individuals.) This is the most common manifestation. Is there anything you want to add? (They always like to testify for themselves and show off. They always talk about some wonderful thing about themselves; they never talk about their ugly side, and if they do something bad, they don't reflect on or dissect their actions.) They always talk about how they suffer and pay a price, how God guides them, and show the work they've done. This is also part of the way protecting and solidifying status manifests. People who pursue status and do things for the sake of status have another-most salient-trait, which is no matter what happens, they have to have the final say. They pursue status because they want to have the final say. They want to be the one who calls the shots, and the only person with authority. No matter the situation, everyone must listen to them, and no matter who has an issue, they must come to them to seek and ask for direction. What they want to enjoy are these benefits of status. No matter the situation, they have to have the final say. No matter whether what they say is right or wrong, even if it is wrong, they still have to have the final say, and must make others listen and submit to them. This is a severe problem. No matter the situation, they must have the final say; no matter whether or not it is a situation they understand, they have to stick their finger in it and have the final say. No matter what issue the leaders and workers are fellowshiping, they must make the decision, and there is no leeway for others to talk. No matter what solution they suggest, they must make everyone accept it, and if others don't accept it, they get angry and deal with them. If anyone has criticisms or opinions, even if it is right and in line with the truth, they have to think of all sorts of ways to object to it. They are particularly good at sophistry, will persuade the other person with smooth words, and ultimately make them do things their way. They have to have the final say in everything. They never negotiate with their co-workers or partners; they are not democratic. This is sufficient to prove that they are overly arrogant and self-righteous, cannot accept the truth at all, and do not submit to the truth at all. If something big happens, or something which is crucial, and they are able to let everyone make an assessment and voice their opinion, and ultimately settle on a method of practice as per the majority opinion, and ensure it will not harm the work of the house of God, and that it will benefit the work as a whole—if this is their attitude, then they are someone who protects the work of the house of God, and someone who can accept the truth, because there are principles behind doing things this way. However, would people who pursue status do things this way? (No.) How would they do things? If something happened, they wouldn't care what advice other people had. They would already have had a solution or decision in mind long before people shared their advice. In their hearts, they would have already decided that was what they would do. At this point, no matter what people said, they wouldn't give it the time of day. Even if someone reprimanded them, they wouldn't care at all. They give no consideration to the truth principles, whether it benefits the church's work, or whether the brothers and sisters can accept it. These things are not within the realm of their consideration. What is it they consider? They have to have the final say; they want to be the decision maker in this matter; this matter must be done their way; they must look at whether this matter is beneficial to their status or not. This is the perspective from which they view matters. Is this someone who pursues the truth? (No.) When people who do not pursue the truth do things, they always give consideration to their own status, reputation, and selfinterest; they always give consideration to how it benefits them. This is their starting point for doing things.

Some people have spiritual understanding but do not pursue the truth. There are indeed some people like this. As for their major manifestations, the first kind is doing things for the sake of doing them; they like to work and cannot sit still. So long as they are busy doing something they are happy, have a sense of accomplishment, and feel real. The second kind of manifestation is doing things for the sake of status. People of this type have particularly strong ambitions and desires. They always want to control and win people over, and always desire to replace God. Desiring to replace God—which of Paul's pursuits does this relate to? (His pursuit of becoming Christ.) Their aim in pursuing status is not simply being someone who is a cut above the rest, someone with status whom others venerate. Their ultimate goal is to be able to win people over and control them, to make others venerate them and treat them like God, and make everyone follow them, submit to them, and believe in them. What does this all imply? That they would become the God in people's hearts. This is not pursuit of the truth, but rather pursuit of Satan. The pursuit of status is obviously not pursuit of the truth, and neither is the pursuit of work or reputation pursuit of the truth. What other manifestations are there? (They pursue blessings.) That's right. They pay a price, expend themselves, suffer, and can forsake their self-interest in all sorts of matters, but they do this in order to be blessed. They only manifest themselves this way for the sake of being blessed and having a good destination. This is not pursuit of the truth either. This is the third way people who have spiritual understanding but do not pursue the truth manifest themselves. Just like Paul, they do things and suffer in order to be blessed and for the sake of their destination, sparing no cost whatsoever. Their aim in doing things is clear: Whatever is the most important and essential for receiving blessings, that is what they focus exclusively on doing. So long as they get approval and support from the brothers and sisters, it is alright. They focus solely on how everyone sees them, how the Above sees them, and whether they are in God's heart. So long as it is certain that they will be blessed and rewarded, it's alright. However, they never use the truth to evaluate what they do, and never give up the desire to be blessed; they do not submit to God's orchestrations and arrangements. If they do something poorly and are dealt with, if the Above is not pleased with them, and they see there is no hope of being blessed or perhaps receiving a good destination, they will become negative and give up, not wanting to do their duty. There are even some who simply don't want to believe; they think there is no point in believing in God. The three methods of pursuit above are all paths that those who do not pursue the truth follow. There are a good number of people of this type in every church, and all of them are people who do not love the truth. No matter what duty they perform, they always connect it to their own self-interest, receiving blessings, and being rewarded, and never connect it to their life entry, understanding the truth, or transforming their disposition. No matter how many years they have believed in God, or how many years they have performed duties, they have never pursued self-knowledge, never pursued life entry, and never pursued loving God or submitting to God. Whatever it is they are doing, they do not seek the truth. No matter what corruption they reveal, they do not draw connections between it and the truth in God's words. Whatever they are doing, their intentions are selfish and base, all aimed at securing blessings and personal gain. No matter how they are dealt with they do not reflect on themselves, and continue to think they are correct. People of this type are rarely negative. They are not afraid of any amount of suffering if it means they will be blessed and enter the kingdom. They indeed have perseverance, but it is very hard for them to accept the truth. They'd rather die than self-reflect and gain knowledge of themselves, and they think they're doing pretty good. People who have spiritual understanding but do not pursue the truth have another manifestation: Some people have listened to many sermons, but are not interested in the truths God expresses, or words of His which expose people's various states. Even if they understand these things, they are not interested. So, why do they still believe in God if they are not interested? They definitely have a sort of vague and unrealistic thought in their heart. They say, "I don't know what the God on earth is capable of doing.

I can't tell. It seems like He is mainly able to fellowship on the truth. I don't quite understand these so-called truths, but either way, the things He says are quite good, and make people follow the right path. However, I can't tell whether or not He is actually God." Since they doubt God so much, why do they stay in the house of God instead of leaving? It is because they have a vague view and fantasy in their heart. They think, "If I continue to kill time here, I might ultimately escape death, and eventually enter heaven and receive great blessings." So, while others pursue a change in disposition and accept being dealt with and pruned, they are there praying to the God in heaven, saying, "Oh God, lead me through these difficulties, and make me able to accept being dealt with and pruned. I am willing to submit to Your orchestrations and arrangements." You hear that the words they pray are not wrong, but they never admit to having a corrupt disposition or being wrong. In their heart, they only acknowledge the God in heaven. As for the God on earth—God incarnate—and God's words of judgment, they do not pay them any heed, as if these things have nothing to do with them. This is how simple and empty their belief in God is. No matter how others talk about the corrupt disposition of humans and the need to pursue a change in disposition, they muse, "How is it that you are all so corrupted and I'm not?" They think they are perfect and flawless, and do not have a corrupt disposition. Sometimes, they are prejudiced or look down on others, but they consider this normal, thinking it's just a bad thought and that it will go away if they suppress it. Or, when they see other people rebel against God, they think, "I have never rebelled against God. The love I have for Him in my heart has never wavered." They just say these few sentences and don't reflect on themselves or know how to act in line with the principles. Are people like this people who pursue the truth? (No.) Then why do they still think so well of themselves, and think that this way of believing in God is not bad? What's going on here? It shows they do not love the truth. According to people's notions, what kind of people are they? In what ways do they manifest themselves? They are eloquent, shrewd, quick to learn, and have a strong ability to understand things. They understand what you are saying as soon as the words come out of your mouth, and they are particularly quick to understand doctrine. However, no matter what they understand, the direction and aim of their pursuit of receiving blessings remain unchanged. Moreover, they treat the truths they understand as theological theories, or as a sort of dogma or teachings. They do not think they are the truth, and therefore they do not practice or experience them, let alone apply them to their life. They only accept and preach the doctrines they like and which conform to their notions and imaginings, thinking they have gained something. Being able to preach doctrines and impress many people is the biggest thing they gain from believing in God. As to whether they practice the truth or have any self-knowledge, they think these are trivial matters of little importance, and that being able to preach spiritual doctrines, answer questions, and make other people admire them are the most crucial and what qualifies them to enjoy the benefits of status. Therefore, they pay no attention to practicing the truth, they do not reflect on themselves, and are only satisfied with being able to preach lofty sermons. This problem is relatively severe, even more severe than it is in those who do not have spiritual understanding, because they know clearly that it is the truth but do not practice or experience it. This is someone who is sick of the truth and toys with the truth. Isn't the nature of this problem very serious?

Now, you are able to discern people who have spiritual understanding but do not pursue the truth, right? Do you manifest yourselves like this type of person in any way? (Yes, mainly in that I do things for the sake of status.) Saying things for the sake of status and doing things for the sake of status—everything revolves around status; this is troublesome. Is it possible to pursue the truth like this? What are the manifestations of doing things for the sake of status? Primarily, it involves focusing on one's own face, image, and dignity, as well as the status one holds in the hearts of others—whether others look up to and venerate them. Whatever they do, they only pay attention to these aspects, never exalting or testifying for God. For example, when someone who does not pursue the truth meets a new believer, they think in their heart, "You've only believed in God for a few years, you don't understand anything," and look down on them. If the new believer wants to seek the truth, they will first consider the new believer's appearance, the way they speak, and whether they like them. If the new believer is of poor caliber, they won't be willing to fellowship on the truth; they'll just offer a few words of encouragement and leave it at that. What is the problem here? (They think they have been a believer for many years and have capital, so they throw their seniority around.) This capital is a manifestation of asserting their status. Having the capital, they feel entitled to speak from a position of status—a status self-bestowed, not given to them by others. Are such people who work and talk in this way those who pursue the truth? (No.) Do you manifest yourselves this way? You say, "I've believed in God for ten years. Isn't partnering me up with someone who has only believed for two years an insult to me? I don't even want to talk to them. Even one word would exhaust me. They don't understand anything!" This stems from being dominated by an arrogant disposition. If you did not have a heart which values status, did not rank people according to experience or seniority, and did not think you have capital, then would you treat someone this way? Clearly, due to having a corrupt disposition inside you, the manifestations of the way you treat people don't benefit others, which exposes your corrupt disposition, your pursuits, and what lies deep within your heart. There is another manifestation of acting for the sake of status. For example, some people have acquired professional knowledge or are experts in a certain field. However, when discussing this field, if others speak first, they get upset and think, "How can you speak without reason? You wouldn't know greatness if it were right in front of you!" They say, "I majored in this subject in university and dedicated all my research to these issues. After graduation, I worked in this field for several years. I've abandoned this profession for over ten years since believing in God, but I can remember everything about it with my eyes closed. I don't like talking about it, it seems as though I'm showing off." What do you think of these words? These words are those of secular academics, and are said based on satanic philosophies, making them appear knowledgeable and earning everyone's approval. They claimed they did not want to show off, but that's exactly what they're doing, just in a more skillful manner. They mentioned the capital they have, like the number of years they studied this profession and what they gained, using this method to send a message that they are an expert in that field. Does being an expert in a field mean you necessarily understand the field? Is this the approach you must take if you are an expert doing work in the house of God? (No.) Then what should you do? (Seek the truth; discuss and seek together with the brothers and sisters.) Everyone should seek together. You say, "I need to be honest. I worked in this profession for several years and know a little something about it, but I don't know the principles behind how the house of God makes use of this profession. I don't know if the knowledge I have is useful to the house of God—we can discuss it together. I'll tell you a bit about the basics of this field." This is a rational way of speaking. Although they are knowledgeable about the profession, they are humble and not prideful. They are not faking it; they truly want to do a good job, and share what they have learned and what they know with everyone, not holding anything back. They are doing this fully for the sake of performing their duty well, regardless of how others see or treat them. They are performing their duty fully for the sake of satisfying God, and for the sake of gaining the truth and living out a human likeness. Therefore, in every aspect of the performance of their duty, they consider the interests of the house of God and give mind to brothers' and sisters' life entry. No matter what they do, they fellowship with everyone first, then discuss it collectively to reach a consensus, letting the brothers and sisters contribute ideas and effort, all united in completing the task well. What do you think of this approach? Only people who pursue the truth would do it this way. Though they believe in God all the same, those who pursue the truth and those who do not manifest themselves in different ways. Which sort of person is disgusting? (People who don't pursue the truth are disgusting.) There's no need to show off if you know a bit about some profession, and there is no need to belittle or constrain others if you know a bit about the profession either. Some people get up on their high horse when they become a leader or a worker, they walk and talk with a pretentious demeanor, even putting on official airs. This way of doing things is even more disgusting. Even if you have some status there is no need to flaunt it or be haughty. You should act responsibly to lead the brothers and sisters to perform their duties well. This is your responsibility and what you should accomplish. Moreover, if you have humanity and are loyal, you must take responsibility when doing things. How should you take responsibility? By fellowshiping clearly on areas that people don't understand, areas where people are prone to make mistakes or be deceived, and rectifying any mistakes and deviations that arise, you ensure that everyone can do things using the right method, so they no longer make mistakes or are constrained by others. This way, you will have fulfilled your responsibility. This is being responsible and loyal in your duty. Once you have achieved this, could other people still say you pursue status? No, they couldn't. The principles you practice are already correct, as is your path. These are the manifestations of those who pursue the truth; this is how those who pursue the truth should practice. The opposite is nothing but a myriad of disgraceful behavior. Wanting to show off and be highly regarded, but also wanting to hold back and hide what they know, fearing that if others know these things they won't be able to showcase themselves or be highly regarded anymore—that is so rebellious! They disregard the interests of the house of God, and even stand by and watch, chuckling to themselves, "If I don't speak, let's see if anyone can explain this matter clearly! Even if I say something, I won't say everything. I'll disclose a little bit today, and a little bit tomorrow, and still won't tell you the truth. I'll let you ponder it on your own. It's not so easy to get something out of me! If I tell you all that I understand, making you understand it, then I will have nothing left, and you will be better than me. How will you view me then?" What sort of creature would think like this? This person is venomous! They are nothing good. Are they an honest person? (No.) Have any of you done this? (I have. Especially after I had spread the gospel for a longer period of time and gotten some results, I felt like I had some assets and capital. When other people asked if I knew of any good methods or had any good experience to share, I refused. I lived by Satan's poisonous saying, "Once a student knows everything the master knows, the master will lose his livelihood." I was afraid others would surpass me, and then I'd lose my status.) Being afraid of other people stealing your thunder is not an easy thing to overcome. Reputation and self-interest are goals people spend their whole lives fighting for, but they are also two daggers in the heart—they will cost you your life!

Some people who have done things which benefit the church's work and the brothers and sisters think they have made a contribution and have some status within the church. Every time they are in front of others, they mention these good things they did, so that everyone has a completely new perception and understanding of them—an understanding of their capital and status, and an understanding of their reputation and place within the church. Why do they do this? (To show off and flaunt it.) And what is the point of flaunting it? To establish themselves. And what can they do by establishing themselves? (Make other people look up to them.) Make people look up to them, talk them up, and revere them. After obtaining these things, how do they feel inside? (They enjoy it.) They enjoy the benefits of status. Do you also pursue these things? What causes these thoughts, ideas, and ways of thinking that people have? What gives rise to them? What is their source? Their source is man's corrupt disposition. It is man's corrupt disposition that causes people to reveal themselves this way, and gives rise to these sorts of pursuits. Some people often feel superior in the house of God. In what ways? What causes them to feel superior in these ways? For example, some people know how to speak a foreign language, and they think it means they have a gift and are skilled, and that if the house of God did not have them, it would probably be really difficult to expand its work. As a result, they want to make people look up to them everywhere they go. What method do people of this type employ when they meet others? In their heart, they assign all sorts of different ranks to people who perform different duties in the house of God. The leaders are at the top, people who have special talents come second, then come people who have average talents, and at the bottom are those who perform all sorts of supporting duties. Some people treat the ability to perform important duties and special duties as capital, and treat it as having truth realities. What is the problem here? Isn't this absurd? Performing some special duties makes them arrogant and haughty, and they look down on everyone. When they meet someone, the first thing they always do is ask what duty they perform. If the person performs an average duty, they look down on them, and think this person isn't worthy of their attention. When this person wants to fellowship with them, they are agreeable to it on the surface, but inside they think, "You want to fellowship with me? You're just a nobody. Look at the duty you perform—how are you worthy of talking to me?" If the duty the person performs is more important than theirs, they flatter them and envy them. When they see leaders or workers, they are obsequious and flatter them. Are they principled in the way they treat people? (No. They treat people according to the duty they perform, and according to the various different ranks they assign.) They rank people according to their experience and seniority, and according to their talents and gifts. What fact is revealed by how they rank people this way? It reveals a person's pursuits, a person's life entry, a person's nature essence, and the quality of their humanity. When some people see a superior leader, they nod their head and bow slightly, and are polite. When they see someone who has some abilities, who is gifted, who is skilled at speaking, who has performed important duties in God's house, or who the Above has promoted and views as important, they speak in an especially polite manner. When they see someone of low caliber or who performs an average duty, they look down on them and treat them as though they were invisible—the way they treat them is different. What are they thinking inside? "Someone like you is still low class even though you believe in God, yet you still want to talk as though you're on the same level as me, and fellowship with me about life entry and being an honest person. You're not fit to do so!" What disposition is this? Arrogance, viciousness, and evilness. Are there many people of this type in the church? (Yes.) Are you this type of person? (Yes.) Treating people differently based on who they are—none of these things are the manifestations of people who pursue the truth. What are they pursuing? (They're pursuing status.) People's behavior, revelations, and usual manifestations can show all the thoughts, views, intents, and pursuits they have, as well as the path they are on. What you reveal, and what you regularly manifest, is what you pursue—your pursuit is exposed. Even though people of this type have spiritual understanding, can understand God's words, draw connections with His words, and compare His words to their own states, whatever happens they do not seek the truth, and do not approach it using the truth of God's words as their principles. Rather, they approach it and act based on their own notions, imaginings, intents, objectives, and desires, as well as their own preferences. Can people like this enter into the truth realities? (No.) Their heart still harbors the principles and methods that people who don't believe have for dealing with the world; they still rank people according to their experience and seniority, and assign all sorts of different ranks to the people in God's house. They do not use the truth to evaluate people, but rather evaluate people using the views and standards of those who do not believe. Is this the pursuit of the truth? (No.) Although they seem like someone who understands the truth when they speak and preach, can any bit of truth reality be seen in how they perform their duties? (No.) Then, are these people who have life entry? (No.) There are too many corrupt things inside of them, and they fall too short of the mark with regard to fulfilling the requirements for salvation. If they always treat these things as capital, then how many of God's words that they understand can they put into practice? Does their heart actually contain the truth, or God's words? To them, how do life entry and transforming their disposition weigh? What is it, exactly, that has taken root in their heart? It is certainly all satanic philosophies and things inherited from man, as well as their notions and imaginings about belief in God. If these things take root too deeply in people's hearts, it will be extremely difficult for them to accept the truth. They always consider how the Above views them, whether the Above appreciates them, whether they are in God's heart, and whether God knows them. They view other people the same way: They look at whether the Above appreciates them, and whether God is pleased with them—they treat people differently based on who they are. When their heart always places importance on these things, how much of an effect can the truth have on them? What are people who always live in these states and live in these philosophies for dealing with the world actually pursuing? Can they enter the truth realities? (No.) Then what do they live their lives according to? (They live according to satanic philosophies for dealing with the world.) They live according to satanic philosophies, yet think they have knowledge, are learned and wise, and feel guite a lot of enjoyment inside. What do they see the house of God as? (As a society.) They see it as a society. They have not yet abandoned this view. So, how do they fix these issues? It is not just a matter of people reading God's words and being able to acknowledge the facts God revealed. They must also experience being pruned and dealt with, and go through trials and refinement. They also need to know their nature essence, see the essence of capital, gifts, knowledge, and qualifications clearly, let go of these things, accept the truths in God's words, and live according to the truth. Only then can the problem of a corrupt nature be fixed.

Pursuing the truth is not an easy matter. People must learn to see things according to God's words. In the past, people had many wrong views. If they do not seek the truth, they will not realize them, and will still carry on like before, thinking they are right, and being arrogant and self-righteous, where even if you deal with them they still will not admit their mistake. It is very hard to change the perspective from which people who do not pursue the truth view things. For example, when some people see that there is a person in the church who used to lead a company, feelings of respect and admiration arise in their hearts. They envy, admire, look up to, and even revere people like this. This person has status in their hearts. What should be done in this situation? You should discern this person and treat them in accordance with the truth principles, and see whether they are someone who loves the truth and pursues the truth, and whether they are someone worthy of respect. If, after interacting with them and discerning them, you discover they are not this sort of person, you will not look up to that person in your heart anymore, and will not hold them in high esteem. You should treat them and interact with them in a regular way. What does it mean to treat them in a regular way? It means being able to treat them correctly. People's hearts are full of their own preferences, wishes, and pursuits, and their values display themselves in many minute behaviors. If there is someone they revere, when they talk about them, their words will be especially tactful and polite, and they will refer to them in a particularly respectful manner. What does this indicate? That this person has status in their heart, and they look up to this person. Besides this, there are other things they say. They often say, "This person used to be an official. If they come to the house of God and are treated as a regular person, it would not be befitting." In their mind, they think God's house does not put importance on talented individuals. Such an elite personage was able to humble themselves and come into God's house, be a believer and perform a duty, yet no one looked up to them or promoted them, and the Above did not make a special point of introducing them to the brothers and sisters. You ask them how this person's duties are going, and they say, "This person used to own a company, and had several thousand people under them." Doing this little bit of work is nothing to them. There is no one in God's house who is of higher caliber than them. They are an elite. There are no elites in God's house." What kind of talk is this? They think the secular world has elites, but the house of God does not. People in the house of God have the truth—do people in the secular world have the truth? You say the secular world has elites, so why don't you believe in the elites? Why have you come here to believe in God? You have notions about God, and should hurry on back to the secular world. Doesn't the fact they are capable of saying things like this mean it is Satan's voice? It is Satan's voice. They believe in God and come into God's house, but exalt Satan. They have nearly said, "If a certain famous person believes in God, they will be the one who is of the highest caliber. If they cannot be perfected, then there's no hope for the rest of us. In their eyes, we are nothing." In their heart and in their eyes, people who believe in God are not as good as the famous people, entrepreneurs, and officials in the secular world. Only those people are elites, and those who carry weight. When you read between the lines of what they say, are they someone who pursues the truth? (No.) No matter how many sermons they listen to, their views and thoughts, their opinions of the world, and their opinions and views of famous people and elites don't change. Have they gained the truth? Do they have life entry? (No.) What is this person? (A nonbeliever.) They are a nonbeliever. They are a Judas and a traitor! In their mind, God is not the most high and the truth is not the most high. Rather, worldly power, prestige, reputation, and self-interest are the most high. This person is a traitor. These are the thoughts and views of Judas. They are the thoughts and logic of Satan. Even though these people can understand the truth, their thoughts and views will not change. What they pursue is reputation, status, and power. When you are around someone like this, the expression they have when talking to you isn't right, and it gives you a certain feeling: that this person is hard to get close to, and the average person is invisible to them. That's why they are capable of having so many notions about God. No matter how many truths God can express, there is always a barrier in their heart between them and God. They think the normal humanity of God incarnate is ordinary, and not at all great or mighty. That's why they are capable of revering knowledge and gifts, and idolizing great personages. When arrogant, self-important, and conceited people like this who are filled with a satanic disposition see Christ who has normal humanity and is full of truth, how can they bow down and worship Him? Inside, they think, "You are God. You only have the truth. You don't have knowledge. I have gifts; my knowledge is more advanced than Yours; my talents are more advanced than Yours; my ability to handle things is stronger than Yours, and I am better at speaking with the outside world than You." When they do some work in the church, have some capital, or make some contribution, they think even less of God. Is this a person who pursues the truth? (No.) People who do not pursue the truth exhibit a myriad of ugly behavior, and do not have an ounce of reason. So these people often get caught up in the outward phenomena of people, events, and things—one moment they think God is right, one moment they think He is wrong; one moment they think there is a God, one moment they think there is no God; one moment they think God is the One who is sovereign over the heavens and earth and all things, one moment they doubt that God is sovereign over the heavens and earth and all things. Their heart is always conflicted and battling. Although the second type of person has spiritual understanding and understands the truth in the most shallow sense of its meaning—which is that of mere words and doctrine, which still counts as having some comprehension abilities—while they are able to understand some truths, they never put them into practice. What are their manifestations? The pursuit of work, the pursuit of being blessed, the pursuit of satisfying their own vague faith and spiritual sustenance, and the pursuit of reputation and status. This is the second type of person.

The third type are people who have spiritual understanding and pursue the truth. People who have spiritual understanding can understand what God's words are saying, take the various states revealed in God's words and draw comparisons with themselves, and recognize what is problematic about their state. However, being able to draw comparisons does not mean you are someone who pursues the truth. If, after drawing comparisons with yourself, you practice and enter in, only then are you someone who pursues the truth. If people can understand God's words, and use the principles of God's words that they understand as a foundation on which to truly enter in, how do people like this manifest themselves in terms of pursuing the truth? For one thing, they can accept God's commission, and perform their duty well. For another, they can seek the truth when facing the circumstances God arranged, and achieve obedience. Another aspect is that they put importance on examining every aspect of their states and revelations in their daily life, and are then able to draw comparisons with themselves according to God's words, resolve problems, and are able to get to the point where they are principled in the way they approach every sort of matter, and have a path to practice in every sort of matter. For example, the last time I fellowshiped and dissected Paul's seven major sins, you must be able to draw comparisons with yourselves, truly understand it, and practice and enter in. Drawing comparisons and life entry are intricately connected to each other. Being able to draw comparisons with yourself is the gateway to life entry. How you enter after going through the gateway will depend on whether you understand this aspect of the truth. When you understand an aspect of the truth, you can enter into an aspect of reality, and when you understand two aspects of the truth, you can enter into two aspects of reality. If you just understand the doctrine and do not have the principles of entry, then you will be unable to enter into reality. Therefore, it is key that you first understand a lot of truths. How can you understand them? You must read a lot of God's words, ponder His words, draw connections between them and your real life and the duties you perform, find principles for practice, and find a path to practice. Then, it will be easy to enter into reality. If some real problems exist, you must compare them to relevant passages of God's words, and resolve them. If you have notions or misunderstandings about God, then it is even more necessary to draw comparisons with God's words, be able to discern in what way these notions or misunderstandings are actually wrong, and what nature of problems they are. You must be able to dissect these problems, then seek the corresponding truths to fix them. This is the path to life entry. Paul did so much work, but did he have a path to life entry? Absolutely not. What was the first of Paul's seven major sins? He treated the pursuit of a crown and the pursuit of blessings as appropriate objectives. In what way is treating the pursuit of blessings as an objective wrong? It flies completely in the face of the truth, and is not congruent with God's will to save people. Since being blessed is not an appropriate objective for people to pursue, what is an appropriate objective? The pursuit of the truth, the pursuit of changes in disposition, and being able to obey all of God's orchestrations and arrangements: these are the objectives that people should pursue. Say, for example, being pruned and dealt with causes you to have notions and misunderstandings, and you become incapable of obedience. Why can't you obey? Because you feel that your destination or your dream of being blessed has been challenged. You become negative and upset, and try to get out of doing your duty. What is the reason for this? There is a problem with your pursuit. So how should this be solved? It is imperative that you immediately abandon these mistaken ideas, and that you immediately seek the truth to solve the problem of your corrupt disposition. You should say to yourself, "I must not quit, I must still do the duty that a creature of God ought to, and put aside my desire to be blessed." When you relinquish the desire to be blessed and you walk the path of pursuing the truth, a weight is lifted off your shoulders. And will you still be capable of negativity? Even though there are still times when you are negative, you don't let this constrain you, and in your heart, you keep praying and fighting, changing the objective of your pursuit from the pursuit of being blessed and having a destination, to the pursuit of the truth, and you think to yourself, "The pursuit of the truth is the duty of a creature of God. To understand certain truths today—there is no greater harvest, this is the greatest blessing of all. Even if God does not want me, and I do not have a good destination, and my hopes of being blessed are shattered, I shall still do my duty properly, I am obligated to. Whatever the reason, it will not impact my performance of my duty, it will not affect my accomplishment of God's commission; this is the principle by which I conduct myself." And in this, have you not transcended the shackles of the flesh? Some may say, "Well, what if I'm still negative?" Then seek the truth again to resolve it. However many times you fall into negativity, if you just keep on seeking the truth to resolve it, and keep on striving for the truth, you will slowly emerge from your negativity. And one day, you will feel that you do not have the desire to gain blessings and are not constrained by your destination and outcome, and that you are easier and freer living without these things. You will feel that the life you had before, whose every day you lived for the purpose of gaining blessings and your destination, was exhausting. Every day, speaking, working, and racking your brains for the sake of gaining blessings—and what would that have gained you, in the end? What is the value of such a life? You did not pursue the truth, but wasted all your best days on insignificant things. In the end, you did not gain any truth, and you were unable to speak of any experiential testimony. You made a fool of yourself, utterly disgraced and failed. And what is the cause of this, really? It is that your intent to gain blessings was too strong, that your outcome and destination occupied your heart and bound you too tightly. Yet when the day comes on which you emerge from the bondage of your prospects and destiny, you will be able to leave everything behind and follow God. When will you be able to let go of those things completely? As your life entry ceaselessly deepens, you will achieve a change in your disposition, and that is when you will be able to let go of them completely. Some say, "I can let go of those things whenever I want." Is this consistent with natural law? (No.) Others say, "I figured all this out overnight. I'm a simple person, not complicated or fragile like the rest of you. You're so ambitious, which shows you're more deeply corrupted than I am." Is that the situation? It is not. All humankind has the same corrupted nature, undifferentiated in depth. The only difference between them lies in whether or not they have humanity, and in what kind of person they are. Those who love and accept the truth are capable of a relatively deep, clear knowledge of their own corrupt disposition, and others mistakenly think that such people are deeply corrupt.

Those who do not love or accept the truth are always thinking that they have no corruption, that with a few more good behaviors, they will be holy people. This viewpoint is obviously invalid—it is not, in fact, that their corruption is shallow, but that they do not understand the truth and have no clear knowledge of the essence and truth of their corruption. In brief, to believe in God, one must accept the truth, practice the truth, enter reality, and achieve changes in their life disposition before they can alter the incorrect direction and path of their pursuit, and before they can completely resolve the problem of pursuing blessings and walking the path of the antichrists. In this way, one can be saved and perfected by God. All the truths that God expresses to judge and purify man work toward this end.

Now, are there any among you who still have the desire to be God? (No.) Is the reason you don't have this desire because you do not dare to, or because you don't have hope or the appropriate background and environment? It's hard to say. Firstly, it's certain that there is no one who wishes to actively pursue being God. However, if, in special circumstances, there were people who revered you, exalted you, often complimented and commended you, you had status in their eyes, and they unconsciously established you as a sort of perfect and mighty image—although they did not testify that you were God, and they knew that you were human, they still revered you, obeyed you, and treated you as though you were God—how would you feel inside? Would you not feel exceptional enjoyment and satisfaction? (Yes.) This is enough to prove that you still have this desire. Everyone who has a corrupt disposition has the desire to be God. It is just that when no one treats you like God, you feel you are not qualified. When you feel that you are qualified, the environment is right, and the conditions are sufficient, you will elevate yourself to that position. Or, maybe you won't elevate yourself, but when other people single-mindedly elevate you, will you still be modest? You'd accept the elevation "without reservation." What is going on here? Satan's nature has entrenched itself deep inside people, and remains unresolved—people never want to be people, they always want to be God. Can a person be God just by wishing it? Satan always wanted to be God, and what happened to it? It was cast down from heaven to earth. Such was Satan's fate for wanting to be God. Tell Me, how do I feel about My own identity, status, and essence? You certainly do not know. I don't feel anything; everything is very normal. God incarnate is especially real and normal. There is nothing supernatural about Him, He has no particular feelings. You know what you think; you know what you like; you know which family you were born into, how old you are, and how much education you've received; you know how you look. But is it normal to know what your inner essence is, or is it normal to not know? (It is normal to not know.) It is normal to not have any feelings about this. Having feelings about it would be supernatural. It would not be of the flesh, and would not be normal humanity. Supernaturality is abnormal. Those who always express themselves in abnormal ways and have abnormal feelings are evil spirits, not mortal beings. Some people ask Me if I know who I am. Tell Me, would I know? Should

I know? I have the logic, and ways of thinking of normal humanity. I have normal thoughts, and a normal routine life of the flesh. I have the conscience, rationality, and judgment of normal humanity, and I have the principles of self-comportment, handling matters, and interacting with others of normal humanity. These things are all clear. As far as how to do things, how to treat different people, how to help people, and which people to help, I have all of these principles. Living in normal humanity and doing the things I should is normal humanity. There is nothing supernatural about it. God does not do supernatural things. It is normal that I do not know. If I did, it would spell trouble. Why would it spell trouble? If I knew, I would have a burden; there are too many matters that would be implicated, and they would be at odds with each other. The part that knows is not of the flesh or the material world; it is supernatural, and is at odds with the matters of this world. Just like how some people can see things that happen in the spiritual realm. They live in the flesh and in the material world, yet see a non-human, immaterial world. They can see two worlds, and can say some strange things. This is not normal. This will influence other people's thoughts and work. Apart from this, for people who believe in God and pursue the truth, it is still necessary for them to know something about matters of the spiritual realm. There are many things people have no way of knowing, but not knowing is actually no loss; knowing or not knowing are both fine. God has already delimited the range of things that mortal beings can understand, know, and feel. God does not speak one sentence less of what you need to know—He tells you everything, and does not leave your knowledge lacking. However, He thoroughly seals off what you do not need to know. He will not tell you, and will not unsettle your thoughts and mind. Another aspect is that, to mortal beings, matters of the spiritual realm are a sort of mystery, strange phenomena, or matters of a different world. In their hearts, people want to know a bit about them, but what can you do with such knowledge? Can you verify it? Can you be a part of it? Many matters of the spiritual realm are secret and cannot be revealed before their time. This is something nobody can take part in—knowing a limited amount is sufficient. God is sovereign over this world and this human race, and there are too many mysteries. What we should understand are God's words and truths, and His will; we should enter into the truth realities, achieve submission to all of God's sovereignty that people can access, understand and recognize it, and then become able to fear God, acknowledge God as your Creator, acknowledge the fact that God is sovereign over all, finally becoming able to utter those words that Job said: "Jehovah gave, and Jehovah has taken away; blessed be the name of Jehovah" (Job 1:21). What must people experience to achieve this result? They must experience judgment and chastisement, being dealt with and pruned, tested and refined, and experience every sort of circumstance that God arranges, and through which, know God's deeds, know His disposition, understand the essence of the Creator, and be able to draw comparisons between themselves and the words of God they have read or the sermons they have heard. Ultimately, no matter how God treats them, whether He takes away or gives, they achieve a fair and accurate understanding of God's deeds, and obey and accept them in a manner befitting the rationality of created beings. This is what God aims to accomplish.

Let's return to our topic of fellowship for today. The manifestations of people who pursue the truth, and the manifestations of people who do not pursue the truth are basically these three types. I have made a detailed distinction between these three types of people: The first type are people who do not have spiritual understanding; the second type are people who have spiritual understanding but do not pursue the truth; and the third type are people who have spiritual understanding and pursue the truth. Of these three types of people, which one has hope of entering the truth realities and can achieve salvation? (The third type.) Which type of person has hope of entering the truth realities, meaning they can develop and change into a person who has the truth realities? (The second type.) In this case, has the first type of person effectively been sentenced to death? Can people who do not have spiritual understanding turn into people who have spiritual understanding, or who have a half-understanding? There is a bit of hope for those who do not have spiritual understanding to become those who have a halfunderstanding; this is somewhat better than not having spiritual understanding at all. Of these three types of people, which has a greater hope of being saved? (The third type.) What about the second type of person? (It depends on their personal pursuit. If they are able to truly turn things around, repent, and pursue the truth, then they can have hope of being saved.) Let Me be frank with you. You are still not completely clear on the second type of person. Although the second type of person has spiritual understanding, they are all people who do not pursue the truth, and this is critical. Regardless of whether they have spiritual understanding or not, so long as they do not pursue the truth, they absolutely cannot achieve salvation. The thing I want to emphasize here is the first type of people, those who do not have spiritual understanding. Say that they do not have spiritual understanding but they have good humanity, and they expend themselves for God willingly, heed whatever God says, and have a submissive heart—it's just that they do not have comprehension ability when it comes to the truth—but they can understand some of God's words and check themselves against them, and then practice and enter into them. Such people have hope of being saved. They can come gradually to have spiritual understanding by undergoing such an experience for a while. The more intently they read the words of God, the more the Holy Spirit enlightens them; they are able to compare whatever they understand of God's words with their own states, accept being dealt with and pruned by God, His judgment and chastisement, and trials and refinement, pay the price for this, and, in the end, achieve some corresponding changes in their disposition. Such people also count as those who pursue the truth. Since they're considered to be those who pursue the truth, do they then have hope of being saved? (Yes.) They do—thus, such people cannot be consigned to death. On the contrary, it is hard to say what the outcome will be for the sort of people who can understand the truth and hold themselves up against it for comparison, yet never enter it. What is the root of this problem? (Their attitude toward the truth.) It is their attitude toward the truth, which is one of irreverence and disdain. What does "disdain" mean? It means not accepting the truth; it means looking down on the truth. It means not acknowledging the words of God as the truth, and not regarding them seriously. No matter how much they understand of what they hear, they do not practice the truth; and, no matter the extent to which they hold themselves up against it for comparison, even if they know what sort of people they are, they still do not repent. Although they know that the most crucial aspect of believing in God is practicing the truth, the word "practice" is irrelevant to such people. Such people are not easily saved.

Now, how should we define pursuing the truth? What exactly is pursuing the truth? Who can tell Me? (Being able to accept God's words, use God's words to reflect on oneself and draw comparisons with oneself, and also having life entry. Only this counts as pursuing the truth.) That's right. Only by being able to accept the truth and practice the truth is someone a person who pursues the truth. If they do not accept God's words and cannot reflect on themselves, then they will not have life entry, and are not a person who pursues the truth. Therefore, there is a direct relationship between pursuing the truth and life entry. If a person is able to speak a lot of words and doctrines, but has never practiced the truth, does not have true faith in God, and even if they clearly know something is God's sovereignty and arrangements and comes from God, they do not submit, and they resist, judge, and keep rebelling, and they still live according to satanic philosophies, and do things according to their own preferences, then they are not someone who pursues the truth. Some people have spiritual understanding and can understand God's words, but do not love the truth, so they do not practice the truth such people are not those who pursue the truth. Some people are willing to pursue the truth, but their caliber is too poor, and they fall short of the truth. As a result, they believe in God for many years but cannot understand the truth. Are people like this those who pursue the truth? No. What major manifestations do people who do not pursue the truth have? The foremost manifestations are that they do not read God's words, and are not willing to pray to God, let alone fellowship on the truth, and are even unwilling to attend gatherings or listen to sermons. When they listen to sermons, they feel as though every word is directed at them, and is exposing them, which makes them feel pinned and uncomfortable. So, whenever it's time to listen to a sermon, they just want to sleep or engage in idle talk. There are a good number of people like this. They only believe in God in order to be blessed, not in order to accept the truth, gain the truth, shed their corruption, live out a human likeness, or attain salvation from God. The root of the problem is primarily that they do not love the truth and are not interested in the truth. They believe in God only to gain blessings. This is the sole focus of their yearning. For the sake of obtaining blessings, they can render service and give things up, but they cannot accept the truth and are not interested in the truth. They think it is enough to understand doctrines, that doing fewer evil deeds means they have changed, and that

rendering service, giving things up, and suffering on top of that qualifies them to be blessed. This is their view of belief in God. Therefore, no matter how many years they believe, no matter how much doctrine they understand and can preach, and no matter how many words that align with the truth come out of their mouths, they are never able to practice the truth, the dispositions they reveal remain willful, indulgent, and unbridled, they protect their own pride and interests at every turn, they are especially selfish and base, and even when they are reprimanded, pruned, or dealt with, they cannot accept it, and do not have an ounce of obedience. Such people do as they please; they do not confer with others before taking action, and even if they do confer with others, it's only when they have no other choice and just for the sake of formality—they speak indirectly, beating around the bush, and in the end still make others do as they say. What disposition is revealed in this way of doing things? (Deceitfulness.) This is not just deceitfulness; there is something even more severe. No matter how pleasing their words sound when advising others, explaining that these are the arrangements of God's house and making other people submit, when it comes to themselves, this is not how they perform. Instead, they are intransigent and rebellious, do not obey, and are incapable of submitting to God's orchestrations and arrangements. Apart from this, how do they manifest themselves when interacting with others? They act in accordance with philosophies for dealing with the world, looking for an advantage at every turn and protecting their personal relationships. People of this type have a disposition which is particularly treacherous. What does this treachery boil down to? It boils down to evil. It usually isn't easy for people to recognize evil dispositions. When people with evil dispositions speak with others, there is always an element of temptation and probing for information. They do not say things straight out, and even if they open themselves up, their aim is just to make you speak your heart—they never disclose anything real about themselves. Some people say, "How can You say they never disclose anything real about themselves? They are always fellowshiping with people regarding the corrupt disposition they reveal." What does that bit of fellowshiping count for? They do not tell anyone what they truly think inside. Also, they use all sorts of tactics and methods, or all sorts of turns of phrase to vigorously cover up and disguise who they are, presenting a false image to people. If some people get to know what they are really like, and know the bad things they did, they just pretend and say a few words of remorse, adopting misleading methods to make people believe they have repented and changed. If they do something bad again and expose their bad deeds, letting people see that they are actually an evil person, they will rack their brain and think of every way they can to cover this fact up and make people still treat them as a brother or sister. What disposition is this? It is an evil one. Not only do people who have this sort of evil disposition not accept the truth in any way, but they are skilled at pretending, and always come up with a clever defense or justification for themselves. They are hypocritical Pharisees. What this type of person fears most is people fellowshiping on the truth, people opening their hearts up to know and dissect themselves, or people exposing the true facts of a matter and thereby exposing them. Whenever someone is fellowshiping on the truth, they get particularly annoyed and do not want to listen; their hearts resist it and are put off by it. This completely exposes their ugly aspect of being fed up with the truth. Besides understanding the truth but not practicing it, this type of person has another problem, which is that they have an attitude of resistance and disdain toward positive things and correct views, especially toward words which are aligned with the truth. When it comes to any positive thing or any words that are aligned with the truth, so long as it's not what they consider good or not spoken by them but by someone else, they will not accept it. What disposition is this? Foolishness, intransigence, and stupidity. How should you evaluate whether a person pursues the truth? The primary thing to look at is what they reveal and manifest in their ordinary performance of their duties and their actions. From this, you can see a person's disposition. From their disposition, you can see whether they have achieved any change or gained any life entry. If someone reveals nothing but corrupt dispositions when they act and has none of the truth realities at all, they are definitely not someone who pursues the truth. Do those who do not pursue the truth have life entry? No, they certainly do not. The things they do every day, their running around, expending, suffering, the price they pay—no matter what it is they do, it is all just rendering service, and they are service-doers. No matter how many years a person has believed in God, what matters most is whether they love the truth. What a person loves and pursues can be seen from what they like to do the most. If most of the things a person does conform to the truth principles and God's requirements, then they are one who loves and pursues the truth. If they can practice the truth, and the things they do every day are in the performance of their duty, then they have life entry, and possess the truth realities. Their actions may be inappropriate in certain matters, or they may not grasp the truth principles accurately or they may have stubborn biases in this regard, or sometimes they may be arrogant and self-righteous, insist on their own ways, and fail to accept the truth, but if later they are able to repent and practice the truth, this proves without a doubt that they have life entry and pursue the truth. If what someone reveals in the course of performing their duty is nothing but corrupt dispositions, a mouth full of lies, pridefulness, indulgence, overwhelming haughtiness, that they are a law unto themselves, and that they do whatever they like, and so on, and if, no matter how many years they have believed in God or how many sermons they have heard, there isn't the slightest change in these corrupt dispositions in the end, then this is certainly not someone who pursues the truth. There are many people who have believed in God for many years, who are not outwardly evildoers and even have some good behaviors. They believe in God quite passionately, but their life dispositions do not change at all, and they don't have even a little experiential testimony to share. Aren't such people pitiful? After so many years of belief in God, they can't speak of even the slightest experiential testimony. This is purely a service-doer. They truly are pitiful! In short, to evaluate whether a person pursues the truth and has life entry, you must look at their disposition and essence as revealed and expressed by them, and see if there is any change in their disposition. Always speaking words and doctrines, and engaging in disguise and deception, cannot be sustained for long. They only harm themselves, without deceiving others. Those who do not accept the truth and do not pursue the truth will sooner or later be exposed and cast out. Only those who accept and practice the truth can gain life entry and have a change in disposition.

I have finished fellowshiping on what life entry is, what pursuing the truth is, and all the different manifestations of people who pursue the truth. People should hold these things up for comparison against themselves, and when they understand the truth, they need to put it into practice. What is the biggest difficulty for the majority of people who believe in God? It is that they understand the truth, but don't practice it. Although they can compare themselves to God's words after reading them, and are able to gain some knowledge of themselves, why can't they put the truth into practice? The majority of people cannot find the reason. For example, all people have arrogant dispositions—they are all particularly arrogant and self-righteous. The majority of people are capable of recognizing this, but can they avoid revealing their arrogance? This isn't easy to achieve. Although they are able to compare themselves to God's words when they read them, they acknowledge they have an arrogant disposition, and they have a path to practice, the difficult thing is that whenever they do something they frequently have their own preferences, intents, and goals, and they cannot see that these are all connected to their corrupt disposition. They need to learn to be discerning about these things, and must understand the truth, fix what should be fixed, and let go of what should be let go. That is, they should no longer do things for the sake of their intents, desires, pride, status, and interests. They should halt the course of their evildoing, and refrain from saying another sentence or performing another deed for their own interests. If you do this, you will already have gained a heart of repentance, and will have started to transform on your negative side. If you take even more initiative, and apart from not speaking for your own sake, you are also able to dissect yourself, letting the brothers and sisters see the manifestation of your arrogant disposition so they can learn from it, gain some lessons, benefit from it, and find a path of practice, that would be even better. What is the difficult thing? The difficult thing is to let go of all your intents, aims, ambitions, desires, and interests, to not do things for your own sake, and to not busy yourself or rush about for your own sake. Paul said he had finished his course. For whom was he running this course? (He ran it so he could be blessed and obtain a crown.) But Paul lacked this understanding. He likely still thought he was running the course for God and to complete God's commission, certainly not for his own sake. That's why he dared to show off and testify for himself in such a boastful and unabashed way. He was obviously defending and explaining himself. At the same time, this is also the best proof that he was testifying that for him to live was Christ. He was blatantly testifying for himself and resisting the truth; he was blaspheming the truth. There are many people now who revere Paul, whose hearts are filled with ambitions and desires, who all want to testify for themselves: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: From now on there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness" (2 Timothy 4:7-8). By doing this, are they not giving free rein to their desires and ambitions, letting them continuously inflate, revealing them in every situation for them to be realized? If you cannot overcome your desires, then it is completely over for you; you will be unable to enter the truth realities. What is the crux of this issue? (We must rebel against our intents.) Rebelling against your intents is a passive way of practice. You must also be able to actively expose them, just like exposing other people. If you said something like, "I will tell you the truth about myself: I have very excessive ambitions, and I desire to win you over. Right now I am opening myself up to all of you. I am willing to rebel against the flesh; I will not be Satan's accomplice. My aim in exposing myself this way is to let you see my true face clearly, so you will not revere me"—what effect would this way of practicing have? Everyone would certainly admire you. Wouldn't this be much better than the reverence and high esteem you would get in exchange for using all sorts of base tactics? (Yes.) At least this is positive. Although everyone would have some admiration for you, would they look up to you? Perhaps some might, but you must find ways to make them abandon this behavior. Always expose yourself, saying, "I am also rebellious, and my rebelliousness is more severe than yours. I am also deceitful and wicked. When I spoke that time, I had an aim in mind, which was to make you look up to me and not look down on me." After everyone hears this, not only will they not look down on you in their hearts, but they will respect you all the more. This is an aboveboard way of practicing. Only people who love the truth will do this; people who do not love the truth are incapable of doing this no matter what. If, in your heart, you think that doing this is really good and a great privilege, that it pleases God, and you aspire to act this way; if you have a strong desire in your heart, believing that you should do so and that this is the sort of person you should be—a person who is aboveboard, honest, and where no lie can be found in what they say, a person who thoroughly forsakes their corrupt disposition and Satan—only then will you be the sort of person who truly lives in the light. And if you are drawn toward and love being this sort of person, then you will be able to love the truth, enter the truth, and let go of those things which are of Satan. But if you are still interested in your intents, aims, ambitions, desires, and interests, and still have a lingering fondness for pursuing knowledge, reputation, interest, and status, then these things still have a place in your heart. You say, "Let me take it easy until I have the appropriate stature, then we'll see." This is called indulging yourself, and being unable to completely forsake yourself. By indulging yourself like this, your life entry is slowed, and not only have your issues of craving fleshly pleasures and craving the benefits of status not been resolved, but they have become increasingly stubborn. So, can the things in your heart that belong to Satan be thoroughly cleansed? Can your life experience still deepen, and your life continue to grow? Can you still achieve being perfected by God? You have already fallen into fleshly pleasures, and the benefits of status have bound you tight—can you still break free of them? You do not want to break free; slowly, you become someone who misleads people. That will be troublesome, and your sin will be severe. Why did things end the way they did for Paul? It is because he didn't pursue the truth at all. He always pursued his ideals and yearnings, and wanted to control God's chosen people so that they all followed him, and did as he did. He also wanted to use hard work and paying a price as leverage to make a deal with God, and obtain rewards and a crown. Ultimately, he was punished by God. If the path someone follows is exactly the same as Paul's path, then they are beyond help and are completely finished. Anyone who is the same type of person as Paul is an antichrist who will not repent no matter what. If you only have some of the states Paul had, but the goal you pursue is slightly different than Paul's, then you must immediately repent, and perhaps you will make it in time. If you do as Paul did, revere Paul, and are exactly the same as Paul, then not only are you a nonbeliever, but you want to be God and be Christ. Isn't this wanting to be on equal footing with God? In your heart, you worship a vague God in heaven; you want to be on equal footing with Christ, and even treat your gifts and knowledge as life, and treat improper pursuits as proper ones. The goals you pursue, and the manner of your pursuit are getting closer and closer to what Paul's were, and match Paul's pursuits more and more perfectly. This spells trouble for you; you are completely hopeless, and you cannot be saved. You must do as Peter did and follow the path of pursuing the truth, thoroughly rebel against the flesh, and rebel against those things which are of Satan, and only then will you have hope of being saved. Do you have a path to receiving salvation now? (Constantly exposing ourselves and letting go of ourselves.) First, you must let go of your personal intents, aims, ambitions, and desires. Regardless of whether you pursue actively, or you pursue in a negative and passive way, you must let go of these things and learn to submit. This is of the utmost importance. If you decide to act in a certain way when something befalls you, you must first evaluate what you are acting this way for. If it is for pride and status, then stop right there, and slow the steps you are taking toward action. You must pray: "God, I am not willing to do this. I want to rebel against it, but I lack the strength. Please grant me the strength, protect me, and stop my evildoing in its tracks." Then, without realizing it, you will have the strength. Sometimes people's ability to overcome sin, rebel against the flesh, and rebel against their corrupt disposition comes from their wish and will, and their aspiration to love the truth. At times, it requires God's work, and requires relying on God-people cannot leave God. Sometimes you understand the truth, you have a path to follow, and you think you can live independently, but when you are faced with new circumstances, you don't know how to practice—you must pray to God and rely on Him. People's lives are full of ups and downs. It can be said that people can never be without God. No matter how many truths they understand, they cannot leave Him. No matter how many moments of negativity they have, or how many moments of passivity, they ultimately cannot leave God's leadership and guidance. The more times you obey God, the more your truth realities will increase. As your truth realities increase, this implies that your life entry becomes deeper and deeper. As your life entry becomes deeper, this means that your disposition is changing more and more. When your disposition has transformed a lot, it means you have gained stature. Your stature is representative of your life entry. When you have stature, you can overcome the control and bondage that your corrupt disposition has over you, your ability to overcome sin will grow stronger, and your heart will have strength. You will not just have an affective wish, hope, and aspiration; you will not linger at this level. Rather, you will ascend, and grow into an adult, becoming someone who has the truth and humanity. This is the path of pursuing the truth, and it is also the result of pursuing the truth. Can you see the direction? Can you see hope? (Yes.) That is a good thing.

Life entry is a process that never ends. You must experience a lifetime in order to gain from it and undergo change. Even if you walk the path of pursuing the truth, if you still crave fleshly pleasures and the benefits of status, you will stumble and fail all the same. Now your path is correct, and you have found your direction. You've already clearly discerned those things that are incorrect, passive, contrary, and negative. There is a boundary between you and these things. As far as positive things, you have also understood and gained guite a lot from them, and can already comprehend and accept quite a lot of them. What remains after gaining discernment over these wrong, evil, and negative things and actions, is to thoroughly banish these things from your heart, thoroughly abandon them and forsake them, and then practice according to the principles of the truth. This way, you will have life entry. Life entry is actually not hard; it just depends on whether you truly love the truth. If you truly love the truth, these negative things will not be able to defeat you. You may be passive and weak for a time, but will still be able to continue moving forward. If you do not love the truth, or you do not love the truth that strongly, just focusing on outward formalities, expending a little of yourself and giving a bit of yourself, being able to rise early and sleep late to perform your duty; if you just linger at the stage of rendering service, not wanting to attain an understanding of the truth or enter reality, merely content to expend yourself for God and commit no more major transgressions, and you stagnate and do not move forward, what will the consequences of all this be? You absolutely will not receive God's approval. If you want your pursuit of the truth to be successful, and truly want to gain life, it is no simple matter. You must let go of your own interests and abandon all improper pursuits, like pursuing reputation, interest, and status, pursuing blessings, or pursuing a crown or rewards. All of these must be let go of. If you truly love the truth and enjoy pondering God's words, then life entry will not be a difficult matter for you. So long as you understand the truth, you naturally will have a path, and will not have much difficulty.

You have believed in God for all these years, and though you understand some truths, inside each of your hearts there are your own interpretations, beliefs, and imaginings—and they all completely contravene and contradict the truth and God's will. What are these things? These things are people's notions. Even though man has no truth at all, their minds are capable of producing many notions and imaginings, all of which are incompatible with the truth. Everything that is at odds with the truth pertains to the notions and imaginings of man. So how do the notions of man come about? There are many different causes. Partly it is the conditioning of traditional culture, as well as the dissemination and inculcation of knowledge, the impact of social trends and family teachings, and so on. In China—a country that has been ruled by atheism for thousands of years—what understanding and definition of God do people have? Although God is invisible and intangible, He really exists, He can fly here and there through the air, coming and going without a trace, appearing and disappearing suddenly, able to walk through walls, unhindered by any material or space, and with tremendous abilities, totally omnipotent—these are the notions and imaginings people have about God. So, how do people's imaginings and notions come about? They are predominantly related to the education and conditioning of traditional culture. The teaching of atheism has been around in China for millennia and long ago planted its atheistic seeds in people's innermost hearts. During this time, Satan and all kinds of evil spirits have performed many signs and wonders among the people in order to deceive and control them. These things spread far and wide among the people, and they have a terrible impact. These evil spirits act recklessly to deceive, fool, and harm people, and so people have developed many notions and imaginings about God. In conclusion, people's notions and imaginings come entirely from the evil social conditioning and indoctrination of Satan. From ancient times up till today, generation after generation of people have received Satan's teaching and have received the dissemination and indoctrination of traditional culture and knowledge, and thus have produced all manner of notions and imaginings. Even though these things have not directly impacted people's work, studies, and normal lives, it is these notions and imaginings which have been a tremendous obstacle to people accepting and submitting to God's work. Even if people have accepted God's work, these things still present a great hindrance to their knowing and obeying God, causing them to have very little faith, to often feel negative and weak, and to find it very difficult to stand firm in trials, even after many years spent believing in God. These are the consequences of having notions and imaginings.

Most people believe that belief in God means doing good things and being a good person. For example, they believe that someone is only a believer in God if they give alms to the poor. If someone does lots of good things and is praised by others, they

thank God from their heart and say to people, "Don't thank me. You should thank the God in heaven, for it was He who taught me to do this." After being complimented by people, they feel so satisfied and soothed, and they believe that faith in God is good, that they are approved of by people and will certainly be approved of by God as well. Where does this feeling of being soothed come from? (Their notions and imaginings.) Is their feeling of being soothed real or false? (False.) But to them it is real, and they feel very grounded, practical, and real, because what they have pursued is this feeling of being soothed. How does this feeling of being soothed come about? This false impression has come about because of their notions, and it is their notions that have caused them to think that this is how belief in God should be, that they should be this kind of person, that they should act in this way, that God will certainly be pleased with them for having done these things, and that they will certainly attain salvation and enter the kingdom of heaven in the end. Where does this "certainly" come from? (From people's notions.) It's their notions and imaginings which give them this certainty and this false impression, and which make them feel so comfortable. And how does God actually measure and determine this matter? It is only a kind of good behavior, done in accordance with people's notions and people's human goodness. One day, this person does something which goes against principles and they get dealt with, and they then discover that God's criteria for measuring good people are not as they thought and that God's words do not say any such thing, and so they feel resistant and think, "Am I not a good person? I've been a good person all these years and no one has ever said I wasn't a good person. Only God says I'm not a good person!" Isn't there a problem here? How has this problem come about? It has come about because of their notions. What is the main culprit here? (Notions.) The main culprit is people's notions. People's notions often cause them to misunderstand God and often make all kinds of demands and judgments about God and have all kinds of criteria for measuring God; they cause people to often use certain incorrect thoughts and views to measure whether things are right or wrong, whether someone is good or bad, and to measure whether someone is loyal to God and has faith in God. What is the root cause of these mistakes? It is people's notions. People's notions may have no effect on what they eat or how they sleep, and they may not impact their normal lives, but they do exist in people's minds and in their thoughts, they cling to people like a shadow, following them around all the time. If you aren't able to resolve them in time, they will constantly control your thinking, your judgment, your behavior, your knowledge of God, and your relationship with God. Do you see this clearly now? Notions are a major problem. People having notions about God is like a wall standing between them and God, one that stops them from seeing the true face of God, that stops them from seeing the true disposition and true essence of God. Why is this? It's because people live among their notions, and among their imaginings, and they use their notions to determine whether God is right or wrong, and to measure, judge, and condemn all that God does. What kind of state are people often plunged into by doing this? Can people truly submit to God when they live among their notions? Can they have true faith in God? (No, they cannot.) Even when people do submit to God a little, they do so according to their own notions and imaginings. When one relies on their notions and imaginings, it becomes tainted with personal things that are of Satan and the world, and it is at odds with the truth. The problem of people's notions about God is a serious one; it is a major issue between man and God that urgently needs to be resolved. Everyone who comes before God brings notions, they bring all manner of suspicions about God. Or, it can be said that they bring myriad misunderstandings about God in the face of all that God bestows upon them, in the face of His arrangements and orchestrations. And what will become of their relationship with God? People constantly misunderstand God, they are constantly suspicious of God, and they constantly use their own standards to measure whether God is right or wrong, to measure each of His words and work. What is this kind of behavior? (It's rebelliousness and defiance.) That's right, it's people rebelling against, defying, and condemning God, and it's people judging God, blaspheming against God, and competing with Him, and in severe cases people want to take God to court and engage in a "decisive struggle" against Him. What is the most severe level that people's notions can reach? It is denying the true God Himself, denying that His words are the truth, and condemning the work of God. When people's notions reach this level, they naturally deny God, condemn God, blaspheme against God and betray God. They not only deny God's existence, but they refuse to accept the truth and follow God—isn't this frightening? (Yes.) This is a frightening problem. Notions can be said to be entirely harmful to people, without a single benefit. That's why today we fellowship on and dissect what notions are and what notions people harbor—this is so very necessary. What notions will arise in you ordinarily? Which of your thoughts, understandings, judgments, and views pertain to your notions? Isn't this worth considering? People's behavior does not pertain to their notions, but the thoughts and views behind that behavior are directly related to their notions. People's notions do not fall outside the scope of God's work. One: The various notions people have regarding belief in God. That is, people have different imaginings and definitions of belief in God, what they should gain from their belief in God, and what path they should walk in their belief in God, and so they come to have all manner of notions. Two: People's notions about the incarnation of God. People have even more imaginings and definitions of the incarnation, and so naturally they come to have many notions—these are interrelated. Three: The notions people have about God's work. People have various different imaginings and definitions about the truth God expresses, the disposition God reveals, and the way God works, and so they come to have many notions. We can divide these three points up into even more detail, however these three points basically cover all of people's notions, so let's fellowship on them one by one.

Now let's talk about the first point, the various notions people have regarding belief in God. These kinds of notions are somewhat broad in scope. Regardless of whether people are strangers to belief in God or whether they've believed in God before, they have lots of notions and imaginings when they first start to believe in God. When they first start reading the Bible, people feel a surge in their hearts, and think, "I'm going to be a good person; I'm going to get into heaven." Afterward, they come to have all kinds of imaginings and definitions or fixed ideas about belief in God, and they will certainly come to have different notions. For example, people imagine all kinds of things about the kind of person they should be after they start believing in God. Someone says, "After I start believing in God, I'm not going to smoke cigarettes, drink alcohol, or gamble anymore. I won't go to those wicked places. I'm going to speak politely to people and wear a smile on my face." What is this? Is this a notion, or is it the way people should behave? (It's the way people should behave.) This is an expression of normal humanity, and people should act this way. This is not a notion, nor is it an imagining—this way of thinking is perfectly rational and reasonable. Some elderly brother says, "I'm old and I've believed in God all these years. I should set an example to young people in the way I speak and do things. I should not be giggling or acting improperly for my age. I should look dignified and cultured and have the demeanor of a refined gentleman." So, when he speaks to young people, he's serious-faced and overflowing with literary words and phrases, and when young people see him they feel uncomfortable and don't want to go near him. Brothers and sisters dance and praise God at gatherings, and the old brother believes he needs to control the lust in his eyes and looks only at what is appropriate, so he restrains himself from watching but still mutters in his heart, "These young people live so freely; why do I live feeling so aggrieved? Still, it is necessary to feel a little aggrieved when one believes in God, for who has caused me to get so old!" He says he mustn't watch the dancers, but still he steals glances, clearly keeping up a pretense. How does this pretense come about? How is it he comes to be in this state of embarrassment? It's because he has an imagining about the behavior and expressions he should have in his belief in God and, dominated by this imagining, his speech and actions become furtive and feigned. For example, when they sing at gatherings, some people clap their hands as they sing, letting themselves go, but this old brother is as numb and dull-witted as a dead person, without any vitality or human likeness at all. He believes that because he is old, he needs to appear as an old man and not act like a child, naïve and making people laugh at him. In short, everything he expresses is just pretense and he just forces himself to pretend like a big shot. Are other people edified when they witness such feigned behavior? (No.) How do you feel when you see this? First, you feel that he's hypocritical and it makes you feel uncomfortable; second, you feel that he's false, there is also a feeling of nausea and disgust, and when talking to him, you feel suffocated and constrained, unable to speak freely. If you're not careful, you get a lecture off of him, saying, "See what you young people have become, you're so deeply corrupted! You eat well and wear good clothes, eating like we used to do at New Year and other festivals, and you're still picky and dissatisfied. When we were little, all we had to eat was grain chaff and wild herbs." He flaunts his seniority and lectures others, and young people avoid him. He doesn't understand this and even criticizes the young people for not respecting their elders and behaving badly. Aren't these things he says laden with notions and human will, not in accord with the truth and unable to edify others? All this is small fry, however. What is key is this: Can he understand the truth by acting in this way? (No.) Is this helpful and beneficial to entering the truth reality? (No.) By practicing and conducting himself in this way, living like this day after day, can it allow him to live before God? Has he ever pondered, "Is my understanding of belief in God in line with the truth and with God's requirements? What is it God requires? What kind of person does God love? Is there any discrepancy between my understanding and what God requires?" He's certainly never thought about these questions before. If he had then, even if he hadn't figured out the answers, he wouldn't be behaving in such a foolish way. What then is the root cause of him acting in this way? (Notions.) And what is the root cause of his coming to have notions? It's that he has an erroneous understanding of how people who believe in God should behave and express themselves. And how has this erroneous understanding come about? What is its source? There is the conditioning of traditional culture and the teachings given by schoolteachers. For example, young people should respect the old and love children, while elderly people should act their age, and so on. He therefore develops various strange behaviors, sometimes acting strangely and sometimes wearing strange expressions, but in any case, he doesn't look entirely normal. Whether he acts strangely or wears strange expressions, as long as he doesn't understand the truth or God's requirements, and he doesn't seek the truth, then how he acts will certainly be estranged from the truth. In such a simple matter—just some external behavior—it's because people have notions rooted inside their hearts that they do these absurd things. When people don't understand the truth, don't understand God's words, and don't understand God's will, then they won't understand what the standards God requires of people are. When elderly people don't understand the standards God requires of people, they engage in strange behaviors and expressions, and absurd actions; when young people don't understand the standards required by God, and their belief in God is based on their imaginings and notions, then they too will engage in certain incorrect expressions and behaviors. What incorrect behaviors and expressions do they engage in? For example, some young people see in God's words that He requires people to live pure and open, fresh and lively, like children, and they think, "We'll always be infants before God and we'll never grow up, so we have to walk and talk like children. I now know how to be one of God's chosen people and a follower of God, and I now understand what it is to be like a child. I used to be deceitful, appearing so sophisticated, numb and dull-witted, but in the future, I have to act fresher and livelier." Afterward, they observe how young people act in society nowadays and, once they've concluded how to act, they begin practicing it among the brothers and sisters, speaking to everyone in a child's voice, putting pressure on their throats when they speak and speaking in a sweet, childish tone. In their minds, they think that only this kind of voice is a child's voice, while at the same time they make certain strange gestures which make people feel incredibly awkward and uncomfortable. They haven't understood what God means by being pure and open, fresh and lively like a child, and all they do is just external behavior—pretense, mimicry, and affectation. The understanding of people like this is deviant and mistaken. What is the biggest issue here? Not only are they incapable of purely understanding the meaning of God's words, but on the contrary, they mix God's words up with the behavior, actions, and trends of the unbelievers. Isn't this a mistake? They don't come seek before God, they don't read God's words, and they don't seek the truth; instead, they analyze and study things using their own brains, or else they look for a theoretical basis among the unbelievers, in traditional culture, or in scientific knowledge. Isn't this a mistake? (Yes, it is.) This is the biggest mistake. Where is there any truth in the knowledge of the unbelievers? If you're looking for a basis for how to conduct yourself, you can only seek the truth in God's words. In any case, regardless of what level of understanding people can reach, every one of God's words and every one of His requirements of man are practical and detailed and are absolutely not as simple as they appear in man's notions and imaginings. God's requirements of man are not a decoration for their external appearance, they are not simple behaviors, much less are they just a way of doing things, but rather they are the standards God requires of people; they are the principles and standards by which man should conduct themselves and act, and these principles are what people ought to master and possess. If I don't fellowship clearly on these detailed problems, then people will only understand some doctrine and will find it difficult to enter into the truth reality.

What we just fellowshiped on was the notions and imaginings people have concerning belief in God in terms of their external behavior. What others do you know in terms of external behavior? Speaking of notions, are notions right or wrong? (Wrong.) Are they positive or are they negative? (Negative.) They definitely run contrary to God's requirements and the truth; they do not accord with the truth. Regardless of whether people imagine them out of thin air or they have some basis, in any case, none of them have anything to do with the truth. So, what is the purpose of fellowshiping on and dissecting these notions? It's to first make people aware of what notions are and, at the same time as knowing that these are notions, to also allow people to understand what the truth is, before then entering the truth. The purpose of this is to allow people to understand the essence of the truth, which is to genuinely come before God. No matter how reasonable your notions are or how much of a basis they have, they are still notions; they are not the truth, and neither can they replace the truth. If you regard notions as the truth, then the truth will have nothing to do with you, you'll have nothing to do with belief in God, and your faith will be worthless. No matter how much you work or run about for God, or how great a price you pay for God, what will the final result be if you do all this based on your notions and imaginings? Nothing you do will have anything to do with the truth or with God; God will condemn it and not commend it—these are the beneficial and harmful outcomes. You should now understand just how important resolving one's notions and imaginings is.

What is the first step in resolving your notions? It is to discern and recognize what a notion is. When God's house first began to shoot movies, something repugnant happened in the Film Production Team, which is related to people's notions. I take this matter to dissect it now not to condemn anyone, but to allow you to grow in discernment, so that you remember this matter, and so that you deepen your understanding of notions through this matter and know just how harmful notions are to people. If I don't talk about this matter then you may think it's not a big deal. However, after I've dissected it, you'll surely be nodding your heads and agreeing that this is a big deal. When it comes to making movies, there is the question of what color and style of clothing to choose. Some people were particularly conservative, specifically using dull gray and khaki. I was puzzled by this and wondered what it was all about. Why were they choosing these colors of clothing? The all dull gray and khaki colors made the entire scene particularly dark, and when I saw it I felt very uncomfortable. Why didn't they choose something more colorful? I'd already said that the clothing could be colorful and that the style had to be appropriate and elegant. So why were people placing God's words and the requirements of God's house to the backs of their minds and not paying any attention to them, instead choosing dull gray and khaki fabrics to make the clothes? Why were they behaving in this way? Isn't this worth reflecting on? What was the root cause of this? People didn't understand the truth, they weren't listening to what was said, and they weren't being obedient—the root cause was that people have a nature within them that betrays God. What is this nature? What is this disposition? Most crucially, people don't love the truth and can refuse to accept the truth, and their hearts are hardened. People say they're willing to submit to God's arrangements and willing to seek the truth, but when they do things, they just do them depending on their own preferences to attain their own aims. If it were a matter of your own personal life, then doing everything as you wish wouldn't be a big deal, as that relates only to your own life entry. However, you're now performing your duty in the church, and the consequences of acting in that way concern God's work and the glory of God, and it concerns the reputation of the church; if people act recklessly according to their own will, they will be liable to dishonor God. God's house doesn't interfere with how individuals dress—the principle is to look decent and proper, so that others are edified when they see you. However, is it appropriate for someone to propose wearing all dull gray and khaki when shooting a movie? What was the essence of this problem? This was people doing things in reliance on their notions and regarding dull gray and khaki as a sign and a symbol of someone who believes in and follows God. It may be said that they defined these colors as colors that accorded with the truth, with God's will, and with God's requirements. This was a mistake. There's nothing wrong with these colors in themselves, but if people do things based on their notions and make these colors into a kind of symbol, then that's a problem. This consequence was brought about by people's notions, and these ideas and practices came about because these notions were in people's hearts. People treat these notions and imaginings like they were the truth, regarding dull gray and khaki as a symbol for wearing clothes for believers in God, while putting the truth, God's words, and God's requirements to one side and excluding them, replacing them with people's notions and standards—this was the root cause of the problem. Actually, choosing colors and styles of clothing are external things which have nothing to do with the truth, but these absurd things happened because of people's notions, and they created a certain negative impact, and so the truth was needed to resolve the matter.

In people's belief in God, no matter what issue they encounter or what problem they come across, their notions constantly arise and they continue to use them. They always live among their notions and are constrained, dominated, and controlled by their notions. This causes people's thoughts, behavior, ways of living, principles of conduct, life direction and goals, as well as how they treat God's words and work to all be colored by their notions, and they are not freed and liberated with the truth at all. By believing in God in this way and always clinging to notions, after 10 years or 20 years, all the way up to today, the notions people had in the beginning remain untouched. No one has dissected them, people themselves have never examined them, much less have they ever accepted being pruned and dealt with. People have never handled them in earnest, and so regardless of how long they have believed in God, do they reap results or not? They definitely reap no results. The relationship between man and God is gradually improved through the process of constantly dissecting and understanding notions, and then resolving them—isn't there a practical side to this? (Yes.) However, if your notions remain constantly at the stage they were when you first started believing in God, then your relationship with God can be said to not have improved at all. When it comes to believing in God, what other notions you rely on to live have you not resolved? Which notions do you always believe to be right, to be things which accord with the truth, and which you believe are not a problem? Which notions can affect your behavior, your pursuit, and your views on belief in God, causing your relationship with God to always be lukewarm and neither close nor distant? You mistakenly believe that you love God very much, that your faith in and loyalty to God have grown, that your determination to suffer has grown, when in fact, to God, you haven't the slightest truth reality at all. You should all dissect this matter, and each of you will certainly have many notions which you rely on to live that are still present and which you haven't resolved. This is a very serious problem.

I've given three examples of the notions people have concerning belief in God, so are you now more aware of which notions you have concerning belief in God? (Yes.) So then tell Me, what other notions and imaginings can obstruct people from practicing the truth and influence the performance of their duty and their normal relationship with God, that is, notions that can obstruct people from coming before God and that have a direct impact on them knowing God? (Quite a strong notion I have is that I believe if I can perform my duty normally every day, then by believing in God in this way, I can attain salvation.) Believing that you can attain salvation by performing your duty is a notion and an imagining. So, is it important to perform your duty up to standard? Can people who don't perform their duty up to standard attain salvation? If someone performs their duty recklessly, then this pertains to disrupting and disturbing God's work. Not only can someone who does this not attain salvation, but they will also be punished. You aren't able to think of these things, you don't understand them, and you can't see them clearly, and yet you still say such things as "As long as I perform my duty, then I can attain salvation and enter the kingdom of heaven." Is this in line with God's words? This idea is just wishful thinking; how could you achieve that so easily? Can not accepting the truth be considered as having faith in God? Can someone attain salvation without casting off their corrupt disposition? You have so many things pertaining to notions and imaginings inside you. All manner of imaginings, understandings, and definitions that don't accord with the truth all pertain to notions. What other notions do you have? (I think the more important the duty I perform and the more achievements which bear witness to God I make, then the more merit I will earn, the more God will commend me, and the greater my blessings will be in the future.) This is also a notion. In short, notions are all imagined and inferred by people out of thin air. Even though they may have some basis, they are not derived from any basis in God's words or the truth, but rather are ideas based on people's wishful thinking and produced by the desire to be blessed. When people do things dominated by such a thought, they do all kinds of things, and they pay a great price before finally discovering that they've made a mistake and gone against the principles, that things aren't as they imagined they were, and so they become negative. One day, when they look back and realize that they've been following a path relying on their notions and imaginings, so much time has already been wasted, and they want to go back but it's not possible. What other notions do you have that you haven't resolved yet? (I think that, since I believe in God and expend myself for God, then God should bless me and give me advantages. When I have an issue and I call on God, I feel like God should open a way for me, and because I believe in God, everything should be smooth sailing. That's why when I'm performing my duty and I encounter a difficult situation, I misunderstand and resent God, and feel like God shouldn't let those things happen to me.) Most people have this notion; it is a kind of understanding people have concerning belief in God. People think that one believes in God to gain advantages, and if they don't gain advantages then this path must be wrong. So, has this notion now been resolved? Have you started to rectify it? When this notion controls your behavior or affects your forward direction, have you sought the truth to resolve it? People often delimit belief in God in their hearts, believing that since they believe in God then everything should be peaceful, or else they think, "I expend myself and perform my duty for God, so God should bless my family, bless my whole family with peace, make it so that I don't get sick, and so that all my family may be happy. And although I perform my duty, this is God's work, so God should shoulder all the responsibility for it and arrange everything well and make it so that I don't encounter any difficulty, danger, or temptation when I'm performing my duty. If anything like this happens, then it's perhaps not God's doing." These are all people's notions; people are liable to have such notions when they don't understand God's work. Do these notions often appear while you're performing your duty? (Yes.) If you always believe that your notions and imaginings are simply normal and reasonable and that this is how things should be, and you don't seek the truth to resolve them, then you won't be able to gain the truth and will have no life entry. To you, the truth will have no value or meaning, and your faith in God will also be meaningless. In their belief in God, if people often eat and drink God's words, attend gatherings, listen to sermons, and live an especially normal spiritual life, yet they act, conduct themselves, and perform their duties in reliance on their notions, basing everything on their notions, and using their notions to measure the right or wrong of all manner of things, then aren't people like this living within their notions? No matter how many sermons they listen to or how much they eat and drink God's words, can people who live within their notions ever change at all? Can their relationship with God ever improve? (No.) So, does God commend this kind of faith? (No.) He certainly doesn't. That's why it's so important to dissect the notions within people.

Most people have no notions when they've eaten and drank their fill and everything is well, or when observing traditional religious ceremonies, but when God performs His work and expresses the truth, any number of notions arise. People have no notions when they have yet to perform their duty and only normally attend gatherings, but when God requires them to perform their duty or they encounter difficulties in their duty, then many notions arise. People have no notions when they're physically comfortable and enjoying life, but when they get sick or encounter adversity, notions naturally arise. For example, before they believe in God, someone's work and family life are all going smoothly, but after they start believing in God some things happen which they don't like. Sometimes they're judged, discriminated against, bullied, and even arrested, tortured, and left with lasting ailments, which makes them feel uneasy and they think, "Why haven't things gone well during my years of believing in God? I believe in the true God, so why doesn't God protect me? How can God see me getting beaten by wicked people and trampled upon by devils and not care?" Don't people form these notions? What's the reason behind them forming these notions? People believe, "Since I now believe in God, then I belong to Him, and God should take care of me, take care of my food and accommodation, take care of my future and my fate, as well as my personal safety, including my family's safety, and guarantee that everything will go well for me, that everything will go peacefully and without incident." And if the facts aren't as people require and imagine, they think, "Believing in God isn't as good or as easy as I imagined

it was going to be. Turns out that I still have to suffer all this persecution and tribulation and go through many trials in my belief in God—why doesn't God protect me?" Is this thinking right or wrong? Does it accord with the truth? (No.) So then, doesn't this thinking show that they're making unreasonable demands of God? Why don't people who have such thinking pray to God or seek the truth? God's good will is naturally behind Him causing people to encounter such things; why don't people understand God's will? Why can't they cooperate with God's work? God intentionally causes people to encounter such things so that they may seek the truth and gain the truth, and so that they will live in reliance on the truth. However, people don't seek the truth, instead always taking God's measure using their own notions and imaginings—this is their problem. This is how you must understand these unpleasant things: No one goes their whole life without suffering. For some people, it has to do with family, for some, with work, for some, with marriage, and for some, with physical illness. Everyone must suffer. Some say, "Why must people suffer? How great it would be to live our whole lives peacefully and happily. Can't we not suffer?" No-everyone must suffer. Suffering causes every person to experience the myriad sensations of physical life, whether these sensations be positive, negative, active or passive; suffering gives you different feelings and appreciations, which, for you, are all your experiences in life. That is one aspect, and it is in order to make people more experienced. If you can seek the truth and understand God's will from this, then you will draw ever closer to the standard God requires of you. Another aspect is that it is the responsibility that God gives to man. What responsibility? This is the suffering you should undergo. If you can take on this suffering and bear it, then this is testimony, and not something shameful. When they get sick, some people are afraid that other people will come to know about it; they think that getting sick is something shameful, when in fact it is nothing to be ashamed about. As a normal person, if, amid illness, you are able to submit to God's arrangements, endure all kinds of suffering, and are still able to perform your duty normally, are able to complete the commissions that God gives you, then is this a good thing or a bad thing? This is a good thing, this is testimony to your obedience to God, this is testimony to you faithfully performing your duty, and it is testimony which shames and triumphs over Satan. And so, any suffering should be accepted and submitted to by every created being and every one of God's chosen people. This is how you must understand it, and you must learn this lesson and achieve true obedience to God. This is in line with the will of God, and it is God's intention. This is what God arranges for every created being. God's putting you in these situations and conditions is equivalent to giving you a responsibility, obligation, and commission, and so you should accept them. Is this not the truth? (It is.) As long as it comes from God, as long as God makes such a demand of you and has this intention for you, then it is the truth. Why is it said to be the truth? This is because if you accept these words as the truth, then you'll be able to solve your corrupt disposition, your notions and your rebelliousness, so that when you encounter difficulties again you will not go against the will of God or rebel against God, that is, you will be able to practice the truth and submit to God. In this way, you'll be able to bear testimony which brings shame upon Satan, and you'll be able to gain the truth and attain salvation. If you go by your own notions and ideas, thinking, "I now believe in God so God should bless me. I should be someone who is blessed," then how is it that you understand this blessing? The blessing you understand is a lifetime of splendor and prosperity, to have everything you want to eat and drink, to have no illnesses, to be born with everything, to have everything ready for the taking, and to enjoy a rich material life without having to work for it. Moreover, it is to live a peaceful life where everything goes smoothly, living in exceptional comfort without any pain—this is what you think blessing is. But, looking at it now, is that a blessing? That's not a blessing, that's a calamity. Walking the path of coveting fleshly comforts will cause you to drift further and further away from God, as well as causing you to sink deeper and deeper into this wicked world, unable to pull yourself free. When the Creator calls upon you, there are many things you're not willing to give up, and you can't let go of these fleshly comforts. Even if God gives you a commission and asks you to perform a duty, you treat yourself too preciously: Today you don't feel well, tomorrow you're not in a good mood, you miss your parents, you miss your partner, thinking only of fleshly things every day, not performing any duty well but wanting to have more enjoyment than others. You live like a parasite—can you put the truth into practice? Can you bear testimony? No, you can't. People have so many imaginings concerning belief in God. They imagine that after they come to believe in God, they'll have wealth and peace all their lives, that their relatives will all benefit along with them, eyes all shining with envy, that they will never be poor, and that they'll never get sick or encounter any kind of disaster. Such imaginings cause people to have many unreasonable requirements of God. When you come to have unreasonable requirements of God, is your relationship with God normal or abnormal? It's certainly abnormal. So, do these notions and imaginings cause you to stand on the side of God or in opposition to God? They can only cause you to stand in opposition to God, to contest with and resist God, and even betray and abandon God, and these behaviors become increasingly serious. That is to say, once people have these notions, they are no longer able to maintain a normal relationship with God. When people come to have notions about God, their hearts then produce feelings of rebelliousness and negativity. At times like these, they should seek the truth to resolve these notions. When they understand the truth, when they understand the commission God gives them and the many requirements God has for their belief in Him, once they have understood these things, and can behave and act in accordance with God's requirements, then in this way, their notions and imaginings will be resolved. Once they come to understand the truth, they will naturally give up their notions, and at that point their relationship with God will become more normal. Resolving notions is equivalent to resolving misunderstandings about God. To say it another way, only when they let go of and resolve their notions will they understand what the truth is and what God's requirements are.

What other notions are there within your hearts that can influence the performance of your duties? What notions often influence and govern you in your lives? When certain things happen to you that are not to your liking, your notions naturally appear, and then you complain to God, argue and compete with God, and they bring about a rapid transformation in your relationship with God: You go from how you were at the beginning, feeling that you love God so much and that you are very faithful to Him, and wanting to devote your whole life to Him, to suddenly having a change of heart, to not wanting to perform your duty or be faithful to God anymore, and you regret your belief in God, you regret having chosen this path, and even complain about being chosen by God. What other notions are able to suddenly cause a change in your relationship with God? (When God arranges a situation to test me and exposes me, and I feel that I won't have a good outcome, I form notions about God. I feel that I believe in God and follow God, and that I've always done my duty, so as long as I do not forsake God, then He shouldn't abandon me.) That is one kind of notion. Do you often have such notions? What is your understanding of being abandoned by God? Do you think that if God leaves you, then that means God does not want you and will not save you? This is another kind of notion. So how does such a notion come about? Does it come from your imagination, or does it have a basis? How do you know that God won't give you a good outcome? Did God tell you personally? Such thoughts are entirely delineated by you. Now you know that this is a notion; the key question is how to solve it. People actually have many notions about faith in God. If you can realize that you have a notion, then you should know that it's wrong. So, how should these notions be resolved? First, you need to see clearly whether these notions come from knowledge or satanic philosophies, where the fault lies, where the harm lies and, once you've seen this clearly, you'll naturally be able to let the notion go. However, this is not the same as you thoroughly resolving it; you must still seek the truth, see what God's requirements are and then dissect the notion according to God's words. When you can clearly discern that the notion is wrong, that it is something absurd, and that it is totally out of line with the truth, that means that you have basically resolved the notion. If you don't seek the truth, if you don't compare the notion with God's words, you won't be able to clearly discern how the notion is wrong, and so you won't be able to thoroughly give the notion up; even if you know it is a notion, you still won't necessarily be able to let it go completely. In such circumstances, when your notions conflict with God's requirements, and even though you may realize that your notions are wrong, yet your heart still clings to your notions, and you know for sure that your notions are at odds with the truth, yet in your heart you still believe that your notions are tenable, you will then not be someone who understands the truth, and people like you have no life entry and are too lacking in stature. For instance, people are especially sensitive toward their own end and destination, and toward adjustments of their duty and being replaced in their duty. Some people frequently jump to an erroneous conclusion about such things, thinking that as soon as they are replaced in their duty and they have no status anymore, or God says He does not like or want them anymore, then it is over for them. This is the conclusion they come to. They believe, "There's no point in believing in God, God doesn't want me, and my outcome is already set, so what's the point in living anymore?" Others, hearing such thoughts, think them reasonable and dignified—but what kind of thinking is this, actually? It is rebelliousness against God, it is abandoning themselves to despair. Why do they abandon themselves to despair? It is because they don't understand God's will, they can't clearly see how God saves people, and they don't have true faith in God. Does God know when people abandon themselves to despair? (Yes.) God knows, and so how does He treat such people? People form a kind of notion and say, "God has paid such a painstaking price for man, He has done much work in every person, and exerted much effort; it is not easy for God to choose and save a person. God will be so hurt if a person abandons themselves to despair, and will hope each day that they can pick themselves up." This is the meaning on a superficial level, but in fact, it is also a notion of man. God takes a certain attitude toward such people: If you abandon yourself to despair and do not try to move forward, He will allow you to choose for yourself; He will not force you to do anything against your will. If you say, "I still wish to perform the duty of a created being, to do all I can to practice as God asks, and to satisfy the will of God. I will use all my gifts and talents, and if I'm not capable of anything, then I'll learn to submit and be obedient; I will not abandon my duty," God says, "If you are willing to live in this way, then continue following, but you must do as God asks; the standards required by God and His principles do not change." What do these words mean? They mean that only people can abandon themselves; God would never abandon someone. For anyone who is able to ultimately attain salvation and behold God, who establishes a normal relationship with God, and who can come before God, this is not something that can be achieved after failing or being pruned and dealt with a single time, or after being judged and chastised a single time. Before Peter was made perfect, he was refined hundreds of times. Of those who remain after rendering service to the very end, there will not be one who has only experienced trials and refinement eight or ten times before making it to the end. Regardless of how many times someone is tested and refined, is this not the love of God? (Yes, it is.) When you can behold the love of God, you can then understand God's attitude toward man.

When some people read God's words and see God condemning people in His words, they form notions and feel conflicted. For example, God's words say that you don't accept the truth, so God doesn't like you or accept you, that you are an evildoer, an antichrist, that He gets upset just looking at you and that He doesn't want you. People read these words and think, "These words are aimed at me. God has determined that He doesn't want me, and since God has abandoned me, I won't believe in God anymore either." There are those who, when reading God's words, often develop notions and misunderstandings because God reveals people's corrupt states and says some things condemning people. They become negative and weak, thinking that God's words were directed at them, that God is giving up on them and won't save them. They become negative to the point of tears and don't want to follow God anymore. This is actually a misunderstanding of God. When you do not understand the meaning of God's words, you should not try to delineate God. You don't know what kind of person God abandons, or under what circumstances He gives up on people, or under what circumstances He puts people aside; there are principles and contexts to all of this. If you don't have full insight into these detailed matters, you'll be very prone to hypersensitivity and you'll delimit yourself based on one word from God. Isn't that problematic? When God judges people, what is the chief aspect of them that He condemns? What God judges and reveals are people's corrupt dispositions and corrupt essences. He condemns their satanic dispositions and satanic natures. He condemns the various manifestations and behaviors of their rebellion and opposition to God, He condemns them for being unable to obey God, for always opposing God, and for always having their own motivations and aims—but such condemnation does not mean that God has abandoned people with satanic dispositions. If this is not clear to you, then you lack comprehension ability, which makes you a bit like people who are mentally ill, always suspicious of everything and misinterpreting God. Such people are devoid of true faith, so how could they follow God to the very end? Hearing a single statement of condemnation from God, you think that, having been condemned by God, people have been abandoned by God, and will no longer be saved, and because of this you become negative, and abandon yourself to despair. This is misinterpreting God. In fact, God has not abandoned people. They have misinterpreted God and abandoned themselves. Nothing is more critical than when people abandon themselves, as fulfilled in the words of the Old Testament: "Fools die for want of wisdom" (Proverbs 10:21). No behavior is more stupid than when people abandon themselves to despair. Sometimes you read God's words that seem to delineate people; in fact, they are not delineating anyone, but are the expression of God's will and opinion. These are words of truth and principle, they are not delineating anyone. The words uttered by God during times of anger or rage also represent God's disposition, these words are the truth, and, moreover, belong to principle. People must understand this. God's purpose in saying this is to allow people to understand the truth, and to understand the principles; it is absolutely not to delimit anyone. This has nothing to do with people's ultimate destination and reward, much less are they people's ultimate punishment. These are merely words spoken to judge and deal with people, they are the result of anger at people not living up to His expectations, and they are spoken in order to wake people up, to prompt them, and they are words from God's heart. And yet, some people fall down and forsake God because of a single statement of judgment from God. People like this don't know what's good for them, they are impervious to reason, they do not accept the truth at all. Some people feel weak for a time and then come before God again, thinking, "This isn't right, I must continue to follow God and do as God requires. If I don't follow God or perform my duty well, then my life will be worthless. For the sake of living out a meaningful life, I must follow God." So, how do they follow God? They must experience God's work. Only saying one believes in God and not experiencing God's work is not following God. Previously not faithfully performing one's duty and being unwilling to accept a little pruning and being dealt with—is this the attitude one should have when accepting God's work? Not accepting being pruned and dealt with and constantly complaining when one suffers a little—what kind of disposition is this? One should reflect on oneself and see what God requires, and one must do as God requires. If God says you're not good enough, then you're not good enough, and you shouldn't use your notions and imaginings to delimit things or oppose God; you should submit and acknowledge that you are not good enough. Don't you then have a path of practice? Can someone still leave God when they're able to practice the truth and obey God? No, they can't. There are times when you believe God has given up on you—but in fact, God has not given up on you, He just puts you to one side so that you can reflect on yourself. God may find you detestable, and does not wish to heed you, but He has not truly forsaken you. There are those who make an effort to perform their duty in the house of God, but because of their essence and the various things that are manifested in them, God sees that they do not love the truth and do not accept the truth at all, and so God actually forsakes them; they were not truly chosen, but merely gave service for a time. There are some, meanwhile, whom God does His utmost to discipline, chasten, and judge, and even condemn and curse, employing various ways of treating them that are at odds with the notions of man. Some people do not understand God's will, and think that God is picking on them and being hurtful. They think that there is no dignity to living before God, they do not wish to hurt God any longer and leave the church. They even think there is sense to doing this, and in this way they turn their backs on God-but in fact, God had not forsaken them. Such people have no inkling of the will of God. They are somewhat oversensitive, going so far as to give up on God's salvation. Do they really have conscience? There are times when God shuns people, and times when He places them to one side for a time so that they may reflect upon themselves, but God has not forsaken them; He is giving them the opportunity to repent. God only truly forsakes the wicked who commit many evil acts, nonbelievers, and antichrists. Some people say, "I feel devoid of the work of the Holy Spirit and long have I been without the enlightenment of the Holy Spirit. Has God forsaken me?" This is a misconception. There is also a problem of disposition here: People are overemotional, they always follow their own reasoning, are always willful, and are devoid of rationality—isn't this a problem of disposition? You say that God has forsaken you, that He will not save you, so has He set your end? God has merely said a few angry words to you. How could you say that He's given up on you, that He doesn't want you anymore? There are occasions when you cannot feel the work of the Holy Spirit, but God has not deprived you of the right to read His words, nor has He determined your end, or cut off your path to salvation—so what are you so upset about? You are in a bad state, there is a problem with your motives, there are issues with your thought and viewpoint, your state of mind is twisted—and yet you do not try to fix these things by seeking the truth, instead constantly misinterpreting and blaming God, and pushing the responsibility onto God, and even saying, "God doesn't want me, so I don't believe in Him anymore." Are you not being irrational? Are you not being unreasonable? This kind of person is too overemotional, without any sense at all, impervious to all reason. They are the least likely to accept the truth and will find it very difficult to attain salvation.

Remember these words: Peter was made perfect by being refined hundreds of times. In your notions and imaginings, being refined hundreds of times is to live a spectacular life of untold hardships to follow God, and in the end to be crucified upside down. This isn't the case; this is just man's notion. Why do I say this is man's notion? It's because people don't understand what God's trials are and that every trial is arranged and done by the hand of God; people don't understand this "hundreds of times," or why God refined Peter hundreds of times, or how this "hundreds of times" was reached, or what the root cause was—people don't know these things, instead always relying on their notions and imaginings to understand things, and as a result they misunderstand God. People are unable to understand certain words of God which they have not experienced. In real life, if what God does with every person is to bless them, guide them, and speak calmly to them, then trials would forever be just empty words for people, and nothing more than a word, a definition, a concept. However, God often performs this work on you: now causing you to become sick, now causing you to encounter something unpleasant and become discouraged and weak, now causing you to encounter a difficult situation that you find hard to cope with and you don't know the right thing to do—what are these things to you? When it comes to all these unpleasant things, all these sicknesses or difficulties or hardships, and even the temptations of Satan, if you can always regard them as trials given to you by God, each one being one trial among hundreds, and you can accept them and seek the truth within them, then your state will undergo a transformation and your relationship with God will improve. However, if when you encounter trials you reject them, constantly try to hide from them, resist them, and oppose them, then this "hundreds of trials" will forever be just empty words to you which will never be fulfilled. For example, someone harbors a bad attitude toward you and, not knowing the reason for this, you feel unhappy. If you live within hotheadedness and within your flesh, then you have an excuse to be unpleasant to them as well—a tooth for a tooth, an eye for an eye. But if you live before God and you wish to accept being perfected and saved by God, then you should regard all this you encounter as a trial from God and accept it; in truth, this is one of the different ways in which God tests you. By fellowshiping in this way, do you now feel much more liberated and much more relieved in your hearts? If you can practice in accordance with these words, compare your behavior and views with these words, then this will assist you greatly when it comes to submitting to God's orchestrations and arrangements in your daily lives.

What are the main aspects involved in today's discussion of people's notions concerning belief in God? One is the aspect of people's external behavior, acting as falsely as the Pharisees, acting so refined and genteel; another aspect is that of food, clothing, housing, and travel; another is the aspect of people's understanding of belief in God, thinking that by believing in God, they must be blessed and given advantages. What was Job's experience of this aspect? When trials befell Job, he was able to ascertain that they came from God, that he hadn't done anything wrong and that this was not a punishment from God, but rather this was God testing him and it was Satan tempting him—this was how he understood it. And how did Job's friends understand it? They believed that this calamity must have befallen Job because he'd done something wrong and offended God. That they could think this way shows that they harbored notions about belief in God. Why was Job's understanding different from the others? It was because Job had clearly seen what was happening, and so he harbored no notions about it. While God performed His work on Job, Job gained in experience and came to know God's work, and these notions and ideas of man were no longer to be found in Job. And so, when the hand of God fell upon Job, did he misunderstand? (No.) He didn't misunderstand and so he didn't complain; he didn't misunderstand and so he didn't rebel; he didn't misunderstand, and so he was able to truly submit. Isn't that right? (Yes.) Why is it right? If people say "Amen" to God's words in their hearts, take God's words as the reality of positive things, as that which is right, as the standard, as the supreme, and as the principles they should put into practice, then they will submit and not misunderstand. There is always an expression when people form misunderstandings about the words God utters or the deeds God does—what expression is that? (They're unwilling to accept them.) And what lies behind this unwillingness to accept God's words and deeds? It is that they have their own ideas, and these ideas contradict and clash with God's words, and then people form misunderstandings and notions about God, believing that the things God says aren't necessarily correct. Sometimes, even if people appear to accept them, it's still just a pretense and is not true acceptance. One must, by seeking the truth, think completely in accordance with God's words and requirements, and agree with God's words in one's heart, and only then can one be compatible with God. If you don't accept these things in your heart, and you misunderstand and even oppose and resist them, then this shows that there is something inside you. If you can dissect this thing inside you and seek the truth, then your notions can be resolved; if you have a deviant and absurd understanding, if you have no spiritual understanding, or you have no comprehension ability, you simply aren't capable of comparing your notions to God's words, are unable to know and dissect them, and you're not aware when notions arise in you, then your notions will be unresolvable. Some people know perfectly well that they harbor notions about God in their hearts, yet they still say they have none, afraid that if they speak up then they'll lose face and be looked down on. If someone asks them, "If you haven't misunderstood God, how come you can't obey Him?" then they reply, "I don't know how to practice." What kind of manifestation is this? If you have no spiritual understanding, if you're not capable of discernment, and don't know how to reflect on yourself when you have a problem, then you won't be able to resolve your notions or your misunderstandings about God. When things happen which aren't related to your notions, you feel very calm, and it can't be seen that you have any problem. The moment something happens that touches upon your notions, however, feelings of conflict to God arise in you. How is this conflict manifested? Sometimes you may feel resentful, and as time goes by and this feeling is not resolved, then your misunderstandings about God become even more entrenched and your corrupt disposition swells, and you will begin to vent your notions and judge God. The moment you judge God, then it is no longer a problem of thinking or behavior, but rather is an expression of a satanic disposition. If someone shows a little conflict or disobedience in their behavior out of sheer ignorance, then God does not condemn this; if someone directly conflicts with God from their disposition and conflicts with Him on purpose, then this will cause trouble for them, and they are defying God. When someone defies God on purpose, then this is an offense against God's disposition. Therefore, when people have notions, they should resolve them; only when they've resolved their notions can they resolve the misunderstandings between themselves and God; and only when the misunderstandings between themselves and God are resolved can they truly obey God. Some people say, "I have no notions and the misunderstandings between myself and God have been resolved. I don't think of anything anymore." Is this enough? The purpose of resolving notions is not only to resolve notions, but rather it is to practice in accordance with God's requirements and the truth, to achieve obedience to God and satisfy God. Some people say, "So long as I have no misunderstandings about God, then that's enough, everything will be fine, and I'll be safe." This is not truly putting the truth into practice, nor is it true obedience—the problem has still not been resolved. If the problem really was resolved, then not only would people have no misunderstandings about God, but they would also know what God requires and what His will is in the things that happen to them. They would not only be able to dissect their own notions but would also be able to help those with notions to learn how to seek the truth, to be able to practice the truth and to meet God's requirements. Wouldn't they then be in accord with God's will? The ultimate goal in resolving notions is to understand God's will and to enter the truth reality—this is key. You say you have not formed any misunderstandings about God, so do you understand the truth? If you do not understand the truth, then even if you have no notions or misunderstandings about God, you're still not someone who submits to God. Having no misunderstandings does not mean that you understand God, much less does it mean that you are capable of submitting to Him. People have no notions or misunderstandings about God when all is well, but this doesn't mean that they have no notions or misunderstandings about God at all. When something happens to them which touches upon their personal interests, their notions then naturally arise and they will form misunderstandings about God and even voice complaints. Can people submit to God when they regard their personal interests as so very important? Why is it that when something happens that affects someone's personal interests, their notions and misunderstandings arise in its wake and they rebel against and defy God? This is how it is with people who have a satanic nature and satanic disposition. When something happens that affects their personal interests, they aren't able to submit to God anymore, and neither can they submit to God when something happens that is at odds with their own notions and imaginings. People's notions and misunderstandings about God arise with their situation. If they're not able to seek and accept the truth, then their notions will never be resolved and their relationship with God will never return to normal. Those who harbor notions but do not seek the truth to resolve them will not be saved by God no matter how many years they have believed in Him.

God's salvation of man is not just empty words. He expresses all these truths in order to address the various things of corrupt mankind that are at odds with the truth—their notions, imaginings, knowledge, philosophies, traditional culture, etc. By dissecting these things, He allows man to understand what constitutes positive things, what constitutes negative things, which things come from God, which things come from Satan, what the truth is, and what the philosophies and logic of Satan are. When people are able to see these things for what they really are, they will naturally choose to pursue the correct path of life, and they are able to practice the truth, to do as God asks, and discern negative things. This is what God asks of man, and so, too, is it the standard by which He perfects and saves people. Some people say, "God dissects man's notions, but I have no notions. People who have notions are usually wily old foxes, or else theologians and Pharisees. I'm not like that." What is the problem in being able to say such a thing? They do not know themselves. No matter how the truth is fellowshiped, they don't apply it to themselves, thinking that they are not like that. This is ignorance, and they have no spiritual understanding. Could you think in this way? Today, most people do not think like that. When one has eaten and drunk many of God's words and can understand some truths, one is then able to see clearly that everyone possesses the things of notions and imaginings and that everyone possesses corrupt dispositions. There is nothing shameful in dissecting these things; after dissecting them, furthermore, they believe that it will help others develop discernment, and they themselves will grow, and be able to understand the truth more quickly. For this reason they are all able to openly dissect themselves. What is the aim of dissecting notions? It is to put aside these notions, to address misunderstandings between man and God, and then enable people to focus on what God asks of man, to know how to enter onto the path of salvation, and to know what to do to practice the truth. By often practicing in this way, the intended effect is achieved in the end: One aspect is that people will come to understand the will of God and become able to submit to God, while another aspect is that they will have the immunity to reject and resist many negative things, such as wicked notions and imaginings, and things that arise from knowledge. When faced with a religious intellectual, a theologian, or a religious pastor or elder, you can see through them by talking with them, and are able to use the truth to refute their myriad notions, imaginings, heresies, and fallacies. This shows that you are able to identify negative things, that you have understood some truths, that you are possessed of a certain stature, and so are not intimidated when faced with these religious leaders and figures. The knowledge, the learning, and the philosophies they talk about—even all of their ideologies and theories—are untenable, for you have seen through the words and doctrines, the notions and imaginings, of religion, and those things can deceive you no longer. But you are not there yet. When you encounter these religious fraudsters and Pharisees, or anyone with a little status, you are intimidated; you know what they are saying is wrong, that it consists of notions and imaginings, born of knowledge, but you do not know how to repudiate it, you do not know from where to start dissecting it, or which words to expose these people with. Does this not show that you still have not understood the truth? (It does.) So, you must equip yourselves with the truth and, once you have understood the truth, you can then dissect yourselves and you will know how to have discernment of people. When you have understood the truth, you will be able to see other people clearly, but if you do not understand the truth, you will never be able to see them clearly. To see through people and things, you must understand the truth; without the truth as your foundation, as your life, you will not be able to deeply penetrate anything.

When people have resolved various notions and imaginings, they have knowledge and experience of God's words, and at the same time they have also entered the reality of God's words. In the process of entering the reality of God's words, the various notions and imaginings that arise in people are resolved one by one, and there is a change in people's knowledge of God's work, God's essence, and the various attitudes God has toward people. How is this change brought about? It is brought about when people put aside their various notions and the imaginings of man, when they put aside the various ideas and perspectives that come from knowledge, philosophy, traditional culture or the world, and instead accept the various points of view that come from God and that are connected to the truth. When people accept the words of God as their life, they also enter into the reality of God's words, and are able to regard and think about questions using the truth, and resolve issues using the truth. Once people have resolved their various notions and misunderstandings about God, they can then immediately improve their relationship with God while at the same time pave their road toward life entry. When people achieve such changes, what becomes of their relationship with God? It becomes one of created beings and Creator. In relationships at this level, there is no competition, no temptation, and very little rebellion; people are much more obedient, understanding, worshipful, faithful, and honest toward God, and they truly fear God. This is the change brought to people's lives when they have resolved their notions. If you are able to achieve this kind of change, are you then willing to resolve your notions? (Yes.) But resolving people's notions is a very painful process. People must deny themselves, they must put aside their notions, put aside the things they believe to be right, put aside the things that they persistently seek, put aside the things they have believed to be correct and which they have pursued and longed for their whole lives. This means that people must forsake themselves, must put aside the knowledge, philosophies—even their way of existence—that were learned from the world of Satan, and replace them with another way of living, the foundation and the root of which is the truth. As such, people must endure great suffering. Such suffering may not be physical illness or the hardship and difficulties of daily life, but it may come from a change in all types of views of different things and of mankind in your heart, or it may even come from a change in the various aspects of the knowledge you have of God, which turns upside down your knowledge and view of the world, human life, mankind, and even God.

We just now fellowshiped on people's notions concerning belief in God and gave several examples so that you could have a basic concept of this aspect of the truth. Afterward, you may contemplate it again and fellowship on it together, draw inferences, and gradually reflect, understand, and dissect the various notions concerning belief in God, before then resolving them step by step. In short, people have many imaginings and notions about belief in God. For example, whether in terms of people's lives, marriage, family, or work, the moment some difficulty arises, people form notions about God and then they blame and judge Him, always thinking in their hearts, "Why doesn't God protect me or bless me?" It's just like what the unbelievers always say: "Heaven is unfair," and "Heaven is blind"; but these things do not happen by accident. When life is comfortable and happy, people never say one word of thanks to God and can even deny God and doubt His existence. When disaster comes calling, however, they make God responsible for it, and they begin to judge and blaspheme against God. Some people even think that they no longer need to learn anything or work once they believe in God, that God will prepare everything for them when the time comes, and that if they have any difficulty they can pray to God and entrust the matter to Him and He'll solve it for them. They believe that if they get sick, God will heal them, that if disaster befalls, God will protect them, that when the day of God arrives, they'll all change form, and that if God performs signs and wonders, everything will be alright—these are imaginings and notions people have. As for the professional knowledge related to duties people should learn, people should learn it in accordance with what is needed for their duty; this is called pragmatism and dedication to one's proper task, and one should not just dream and rely on one's imagination. What God requires people to do is that which people must do, that is the duties people should perform. This absolutely cannot be changed and must be approached conscientiously—this is in accord with the truth and it is the perspective people should have toward their duty. This is not a notion, it is the truth and it is what God requires. There are many times when the things God does are at odds with people's imaginings. If people can set aside their notions, seek God's will and seek the truth principles, then they will be able to pass through these things. If you are stubborn and you cling obstinately to your notions, then that is tantamount to you not accepting the truth, not accepting things that are right, and not accepting God's requirements. If you don't accept the truth or the things that are right, could you not then be said to be in opposition to God? The truth and positive things come from God. If you don't accept them and instead cling to your notions, then clearly you are opposed to the truth. We'll end our fellowship on people's notions concerning belief in God here. What is left is for you to apply it to yourselves on the basis of these principles and the words we've fellowshiped here today. Notions concerning people's belief in God are the most common and most basic of the three types of notions. The truths related to these notions are not really that profound, and so these notions should be easy to resolve.

Now we'll fellowship on people's notions about the incarnation; people have many notions about the incarnation, too. People have lots of imaginings, don't they, when they haven't seen God incarnate? For example, they believe the incarnation should understand everything and see everything clearly. In short, they think that God's incarnate flesh should be exceptionally perfect, that He is too good for the likes of them and unapproachable. When people haven't met God, these imaginings people have are notions, and they arise according to certain judgments, or the knowledge, religious beliefs, and traditional cultural education people have. Once they have met God, people then form new notions: "So, this is what Christ looks like. This is how He speaks and this is what His personality is like. How can He be different from what I thought? My God isn't supposed to be like this." In fact, people have no idea and cannot explain what God is supposed to be like. While people are constantly forming these notions, they are also constantly denying and dealing with themselves, believing that it's wrong to harbor notions and imaginings, that the things God does are right, but they still can't understand them. Their notions continually pour out and a battle is waged in their hearts, as they think, "What God does is right; I shouldn't harbor any notions." But they're not able to entirely put aside their notions and they're still not convinced, and so there is no peace in their hearts. They think, "Is He a human being or God? If He's God, then He doesn't look like it, and if He's a human being, then it wouldn't be possible for Him to express so many truths." They get stuck here. They want to find someone else to fellowship with but find it hard to talk about, afraid of being laughed at or that others will say they're so foolish, devoid of faith, or that their understanding is deviant and absurd, and so all they can do is suppress how they feel. In any case, whether someone has seen God or not, as long as notions and misunderstandings about God form in their hearts, then there is a problem with their understanding. God expresses so many truths and fellowships on these issues very clearly and lucidly so that people can be convinced in heart and by word. When people are still capable of forming notions and misunderstandings in such a situation, then this is not such a simple problem anymore. Some people have notions because they don't have spiritual understanding; some people have notions because of their deviant and absurd understanding; and some people form notions because they don't love the truth and don't understand the truth at all. Whatever the case, as long as people's beliefs and ideas do not conform with God's words, God's work, and God's essence, and they obstruct people from believing in God, knowing God and submitting to God's work, or else they cause people to have ideas and perspectives which question, misunderstand, deny, and resist God, then these are all notions, and they all go against the truth.

Next, I'll use some concrete examples to fellowship to you. There may be many of you who have heard stories about Me. When you first started to believe in God or you found yourself in a certain situation, someone might have told you some tales that made your heart fill with emotion or moved you to tears. For example, someone said that, at New Year one year, everyone else went home to spend New Year there while Christ was walking the streets alone, facing the wind and snow, with no home to go to. After hearing this story, some people became extremely moved and said, "It's really difficult for God to come and live in the world! Mankind is so corrupt and they all reject God, and that's why God suffers like this. It seems that what God said is true, that 'The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man has nowhere to lay His head.' These words have come true. God is so great!" They believe that the greatness of God has arisen from this story, and this is the conclusion they come up with from this story. While you're being moved to tears after listening to this story, have you ever wondered why people want to listen to stories like this? Why are they moved by such stories? People have a kind of notion about God's flesh, they have a kind of requirement of His flesh, and they have a kind of standard for measuring His flesh. What is this notion? It's that if God comes in incarnate flesh, then He should suffer. God said, "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man has nowhere to lay His head." If these words had not come true, if the Son of man's life conditions were not like this, and He'd not suffered in this way, but instead enjoyed happiness, then people wouldn't admire Him and wouldn't feel motivated, and then they wouldn't want to perform their duty and they'd be unwilling to suffer even a little. People believe that God should suffer, and only by suffering can He serve as an example and a model for mankind. They believe that, when God comes into the world, He cannot enjoy great wealth and rank—those things belong to the world. God came into the world specifically to suffer, and only after He's suffered can He cause mankind to become speechless, and to feel moved by His suffering and admire Him, before then following Him. People harbor this kind of notion about God, which is why they identify with stories like this and find them easy to accept. So, would you like to know whether this story is true? Do you hope that it is true or that it isn't? Do you find this difficult to answer? If it were true, then people would find it very much in line with their own notions; if it were not true, would that destroy the heroic example in your innermost hearts? Would this have an impact on you? Would it be a blow to you? Actually, it's not important whether this is true or not.

What is important? Dissecting people's notions. Everyone has a notion and a standard by which to measure God incarnate, His life, His living environment, His quality of life, and His food, clothing, housing, and transportation, and this notion they have is that, now that God has come, He must suffer. In people's hearts, moreover, Christ must certainly be influential and worthy of worship, admiration, and adoration: He must be able to read extremely fast and never forget anything He's ever laid eyes on, He must have some exceptional abilities that are beyond the reach of normal people, and He must even be able to perform signs and wonders, which then makes Him worthy of being followed and worthy of the title of "the mighty God." If people's notions and imaginings were fulfilled in real life, they would be so energetic and confident in their faith. If the things that really happen are at odds with their notions and imaginings, such as seeing Christ still being pursued by the ruling authorities, people then think, "God still suffers the pain of being pursued—this isn't the hero and the Savior I imagined!" And they then think that God is not worth believing in. Isn't this caused by their notions? How do these notions come about? One aspect is that they arise from people's imaginations, while another aspect is that people are influenced by the images of famous and great people, which causes them to form incorrect definitions of God. People believe that the lives of famous and great people are simple, that for them a toothbrush can last for 20 to 30 years, and a single piece of clothing can be repaired and even worn for a lifetime. Some famous and great people eat without wasting anything, even licking their bowl clean after finishing their meal, and picking up and eating any bits of fallen food, and so people form an extraordinary impression of these great people in their hearts, and they use such impressions to measure God incarnate. If God incarnate does not match their impressions, then they form notions, but if God incarnate exactly matches their impressions, then they don't form notions. Does it accord with the truth for people to compare Christ to these things? Do the things that famous and great people do accord with the truth? Are their nature essences those of the saints? In fact, these famous and great people are all demons and devil kings, and not one of them has the essence of normal humanity. Even though they may seem to have some merits when using human notions to measure them, in terms of their nature essences and actions, they are all devils and Satan in essence. By taking the image of devils and of Satan to compare with God incarnate, is this not blasphemy against God? Satan and devils are always the best at disguising themselves. Everything they say and do on the outside accords with people's notions and imaginings, and they only ever say pleasant-sounding things. However, what they plan in their hearts and what they do behind the scenes are all shameful devilish things, and if no one exposes them, then no one can fathom them. Everything that is spoken by Satan and devil kings is hypocrisy and deceit, and some people who understand the truth will be able to see this clearly. Some people are always comparing the image of devils and great people with God incarnate, and when there is no match, they feel uncomfortable, they form notions and they never let them go. Are there many people like this? There are surely many of them. Some people are still concerned about whether the story I recounted just now was true or not. When I first heard about this, I was puzzled that I, the person involved, didn't know what had supposedly happened to Me. It was a big joke and a big lie. It wasn't true. In that situation, even though there weren't many brothers and sisters who had accepted this stage of new work, there were still some people who accepted it when God first began to utter His words. What's more, they were all believers in Jesus who had come to accept this stage of work. They were all willing to show love and absolutely could never have shut the door in Christ's face; they certainly could never have done that. At New Year, some people invited Me to their homes. Besides, with that many brothers and sisters, whose home could I have gone to and not been hosted? By saying that, it seemed as if the brothers and sisters were being rebellious and that no one would host Me anywhere. This was an attempt to frame brothers and sisters and spread rumors about them! It was all totally unfounded and was clearly fabricated by certain people with ulterior motives, and yet you still really believed it. How could you still believe this? It was because people have certain notions about the incarnation, and they have these requirements in terms of their feelings, desires, and psychological makeup, and so they're willing to listen to such stories. Some people took advantage of this chance to fabricate these stories and then did all they could to spread and disseminate them, embellish them, and then make inferences and concoct things. Finally, more and more people came to hear their fabrications and regard these things as true. If I hadn't clarified this matter, you'd never have been able to distinguish true from false in your lifetime. Do you understand now? This simply never happened.

I'll tell you some things now so that, through these things, you can understand what notions there are about the incarnation and Christ. When this stage of God's new work had not long been started, the church needed to write some hymns, and I wrote one too. At that time, God incarnate had already been borne witness to. After they'd read My hymn, some people thought it was great, but there was one person who said something very odd: "How have You written this hymn so quickly? How have You come up with so many words?" Hearing this, I felt very puzzled, and thought, "Does one need words to write a song? Does one have to be knowledgeable? What then does he think all those words I've expressed are?" He had a notion, an idea, believing that these words the incarnation was expressing were just words and articles—he didn't think, nor did he understand, that these words were the truth. He found everything the incarnation did very obscure. Because he didn't understand the truth, he used the words of the unbelievers to explain them, and people felt uncomfortable and disgusted when they heard this. This person did not have spiritual understanding and there are people like this even now. So, what kind of notions does this matter relate to? This person didn't deny the incarnation or deny Christ; he used a notion to measure what had happened. He believed that Christ must be knowledgeable and educated and that, when among other people, He must be able to convince them utterly. Even if Christ wasn't very educated, yet His caliber, talents, and abilities must be better than others, that is, He must be better than other people at certain things or be different from other people in certain ways in order to be worthy of being God and Christ. He believed that Christ could be Christ if He was qualified to be so. He didn't believe that Christ could be Christ only if He possessed the essence of Christ, and that's why he said such a thing. What obstacles does this kind of notion pose to people's belief in God and their life entry? People will use their brains to analyze God's words and to analyze and study God's flesh, and they're always studying Him and thinking, "Is what this person says logical? Does it accord with normal thinking? Is it in line with grammatical rules? Where did He learn this from?" They don't seek the truth in God's words, they don't understand God's words from the perspective of accepting the truth, and they don't accept God's words as the truth. Instead, they use their brains and knowledge to analyze, study, and question. No matter what kind of viewpoints or notions people use to take the measure of this person or approach this person, what is the final result? (They cannot gain the truth.) They certainly cannot gain the truth. There is another aspect which you haven't understood, and that is that people aren't able to ascertain whether He is the incarnation or not—isn't this crucial? (Yes.) Many people ascertain that He is indeed God, that His words are the truth and life and they come from God by listening to the sermons He gives and certain mysteries He reveals. However, if people are always studying God with their notions and never accept His words as the truth, then what is the final result? They will always question this person's identity and essence and His work, that is, they won't be able to verify whether this person is human or God, thinking that perhaps this person is a messenger sent by God, or perhaps a prophet, because humans aren't able to say the things that He says. Some people don't acknowledge that this person is God, because within them there are many restrictions and fetters and many notions which do not match this flesh. When they don't match, these people don't seek the truth but continue to cling to their notions, and so they end up stuck. When you tell such a person as this to make an effort in their faith, they harbor many notions which they can't let go, and when you tell them to leave, they become fearful that they won't be blessed. Are there people like this? Are you like this? Even though most of you have confirmed that this person is indeed God incarnate, actually you confirm it only 80 or 90 percent, and there is still 10 or 20 percent of doubt and questioning. It can be said that you have basically confirmed it, while that remaining doubt and questioning are not such urgent issues. The resolution of these notions is within reach, but it can be very troublesome if these notions and questions are not resolved in a timely manner. As far as your notions go, how should I treat you in order for you to be satisfied, for you to think that this is done by God and that this is how God is supposed to treat people? Should I speak softly and then be concerned about you and care about you in every matter? If one day I were to find that some of you have done something absurd, and I give you a good telling off, expose and judge you harshly, and hurt your self-esteem, would you feel that I'm not like

God? You believe God to be the gentlest, the most loving, and that God is filled with lovingkindness, so what then can I do in order to be the God of your notions and imaginings? If you still make such demands of God now, then you are without any reason and you really don't know God.

I'll tell you another thing about notions concerning the incarnation. Twenty years ago, when I was in China, I wasn't yet 20 years old and, at that age, people aren't very experienced and mature in their speech and actions; they speak and act like young people, and this is normal. If they spoke and acted like old people, then that wouldn't be normal. It's normal for people in any age group to be like people in that age group. God created mankind and ordained a normal growth pattern for man. Of course, God Himself in the flesh is no exception, and He also lives and experiences life in accordance with this pattern. This pattern came from God, and God will not violate it. Therefore, before God incarnate had reached the age of 20, certain of His behaviors were definitely like those of a young person. For example, when moving house one time, some brothers and sisters left behind some pens and notebooks after moving away. I thought it would be a pity to lose them, and brothers and sisters also needed to take notes, so I packed them up and shared them with a few sisters. Someone then formed a notion and said, "Whoever wants these things can come and get them themselves. You're acting like a child, sharing them out!" This is what he said. Is this an important matter or a minor matter? If someone were to judge a normal person as acting like a child, then that would be a normal thing to do, it would be a saying, and no one would pay attention or take it seriously; no one would think this saying was a notion or a perspective, either, but would just take it as it is. However, what was his approach in saying this to Me? What was the nature of it? In his notions and imaginings, even though God incarnate hadn't yet reached 20 years of age, He should still act like an old person, sit solemnly every day with His eyes staring forward, looking like a wise, experienced old person who never tells jokes or chats, and who is particularly steady and composed. The moment I behaved or did anything that ran counter to what an old person might do, such as Me sharing the pens and notebooks out to some sisters, someone would condemn My actions as being like those of a child, not like Christ, and not like the God in their mind, because God incarnate was not supposed to act in any way like a child. Wasn't that them defining God incarnate? Is this kind of definition a kind of condemnation and judgment, or is it a kind of appreciation and approval? (It's condemnation and judgment.) Why is it a kind of condemnation? Could it be that by saying God incarnate was like a child, he was denying God? What was wrong with him saying this? What was the central issue of him forming this notion? (He was denying the incarnation's normal humanity and denying the normality and practicality of God. It's like what God said just now, that the incarnation is just like created mankind, with a normal growth pattern. That person, however, regarded God as being especially supernatural and so he didn't understand the incarnation. The nature of this is denial and condemnation of God, and it is blasphemy.)

That's right, his denial was the essence of the problem. Why did he deny God incarnate in this way? It was because he harbored a notion about God incarnate in his heart, thinking, "You're God, so You cannot reveal Your normal humanity in line with normal aging. You're not yet 20 but You must be as mature and experienced as a 50-year-old. You're God, so You should live in violation of the growth pattern of normal humanity. You must be supernatural, You must be different from everyone else, and only then can You be Christ and the God that we have in our minds." This was the notion he had. And what was the consequence of this notion? Would his notion have been revealed if this thing hadn't happened? No one knows; it's just that he was exposed through this matter. If he'd had a notion about this matter, but had thought that people weren't able to thoroughly understand what God had done, and he hadn't spoken recklessly, then he would have had space to seek, and this would have been excusable. People don't understand the truth and there are many things they are not able to thoroughly understand. However, even though people don't thoroughly understand these things, some people judge and condemn, while others don't speak recklessly and instead wait and seek the truth—isn't there a difference in nature here? (Yes.) So, what was the nature of this person's failure to thoroughly understand? He went immediately to condemnation, and this was a serious problem. Once people form notions, doubt and even condemnation and denial arise in them concerning God incarnate, and this is extremely serious.

I've just given three examples of notions about the incarnation. These three examples show certain issues, and you should seek to find what the truth is in them. What's the first notion? (People delimit the incarnate God using their definitions of great people, believing that God should suffer in order to be a model for mankind.) This is a notion people have. Their notion is that God incarnate should suffer more and set an example, be a model, for mankind. What is the second notion? (People believe that Christ should be knowledgeable and educated, more so than ordinary people, and only then is He Christ.) Many people now still believe that God's utterances and work come from His knowledge and gifts, or from certain things He has mastered and understood this is a notion. And what is the third notion? (People believe that Christ is not supposed to have any expressions of normal humanity.) To be more specific, it is that God incarnate is supposed to be supernatural and must be different from everyone else and have supernatural abilities. If Christ was ordinary and normal in every way, people's faith in God would be weak, and they would doubt God and even deny Him—everyone loves the supernatural God. Is it beneficial to your understanding of the truth for Me to tell you these stories? (Yes.) It should be helpful. You would perhaps think it abstract if I were to fellowship this aspect of the truth to you without any factual basis, and you wouldn't know what it actually refers to. What I've told you, however, are some concrete examples and, upon hearing them, you think them practical and easy to understand, and through these stories you are able to understand some truths. But are you able to learn how to use the truth to measure and approach other things when you encounter them? If you can apply the truth, then that shows you have spiritual understanding and you understand the truth in these stories; if not, then you do not have spiritual understanding and you have not understood the truth in these stories. If in the circumstances of these stories you can discover the truth of them, know what God's will is, know what you should understand, dissect, and enter into, and what truths you should seek and gain, then you have spiritual understanding; if, when I've finished telling these stories, you become very interested in these things and you remember them, but you put the truth to one side, then you do not have spiritual understanding. If you can truly understand the truth of these stories, then I will not have told them in vain. As long as it helps you to understand the truth, I will give some practical examples. No matter what the issue is, I'll dissect it; as long as it helps you to have understanding and to be able to understand the truth and see things clearly, then I don't mind telling any number of stories. Actually, I don't want to tell you these things, and I really don't want to tell you stories of right and wrong, but if these things help you to enter into the truth, then I'll tell you them; as long as it helps you to understand the truth, I don't mind speaking a little more. If you dislike Me chatting on and on, however, then I'll have no choice but to speak less.

What notions should be resolved from these stories I've told you? First you must understand, when it comes to God incarnate, how does God essentially define this flesh's humanity? He is ordinary and normal and can live among corrupt mankind and engage in all the activities of normal humanity, and He is not of a different kind. He can help, guide, and lead people. Whether it is His normal humanity or His divinity or His personality—regardless of the aspect—He must certainly be able to handle the work He undertakes and the ministry He performs. This is the standard by which God measures Christ and the incarnation; it is a standard for His work, and a standard for His definition. When the Lord Jesus performed His work, His humanity, compared with the incarnation now, possessed some supernatural aspects. He could perform miracles: He could curse the fig tree, rebuke the sea, make the sea and wind calm, heal the sick and cast out demons, and feed five thousand people with five loaves and two fish, and so on. Besides this, however, His normal humanity and basic needs appeared to be so very normal and practical. He wasn't born 33 and a half years old and was then crucified. He lived to be 33 and a half years old, and He lived every day, every year, one minute and one second at a time, until finally He was crucified and thereby completed the work of redeeming mankind. It was only after living for 33 and a half years in this world that the incarnation completed this work—is this not practical? (It is.) This is practical. As for the stage of work God is performing now, everything He says to you and every truth He communicates is based on your stature, your level of growth in life, and the entire environment arranged by God, and so I contemplate which truths will be most appropriate to communicate to you and which truths I want you to understand. Externally, it appears as though this flesh is pondering these things, when in fact the Spirit of God is acting simultaneously; while this person is coordinating, the Spirit of God is guiding it all. If you look at it this way, you won't doubt the essence of this flesh or His identity you will never question these things. The things I do with you and the requirements I have of you can never conflict with the entire management plan of God's Spirit. They advance together, they move in the same direction, and they support each other. If the Spirit of God didn't wear this flesh, He wouldn't be able to speak with you face to face, you wouldn't be able to hear what He said, and you wouldn't be able to understand what He requires of you. However, if there was only this flesh and the Spirit of God were not within Him, would this flesh be able to perform any work? He certainly wouldn't. If God did not become flesh, then no human being would be able to undertake this work. Therefore, this normal flesh has to live every day, every month, and every year, living moment by moment in this way, His humanity ever maturing, His experience ever increasing, while at the same time constantly striving to be able to undertake the work required by God's management plan. In performing this stage of work, I began to work in the church when I was not yet 20 years old and I came into contact with brothers and sisters. I started to attend gatherings, give fellowships, and walk among the churches, and I came into contact with all kinds of people. From that time till now, I feel that My linguistic ability and My ability to view people and things have been constantly growing. How does this growth in My abilities differ from your circumstances? You have to experience through the words I speak and the truths I fellowship on and, as you experience, you gradually become certain that the words I speak are from God, they are truth, they are right, and they are words that can enable you to achieve dispositional change and attain salvation. As for Me, while you are making progress, I am growing ever deeper. While My understanding of you continues to grow, I am also constantly making the things I want to say be able to supply your needs step by step. Some people say, "You want to supply our needs, to make our statures gradually grow, to enable us to change and progress more and more on the path of salvation, and for our relationship with God to grow ever closer, so how are You going to do that?" You don't need to worry about this. I never ask for anything, nor do I need to fast or pray, or ask for anything as though praying for rain, so that God quickly gives Me some words to provide to you. I don't need to do that. Because this flesh is God Himself and He performs this ministry, He therefore expresses the truth to provide for people—this is the difference between God's incarnate flesh and corrupt mankind. Therefore, I don't need to make a point of understanding what you need; yet what I want to provide you with and fellowship with you is definitely what you need. You just need to move onward in the wake of My words and work, and your state will begin to improve, and your life will also progress more and more along with it. At the same time, the Spirit of God will, while I'm watering you, perform His work in tandem. In fact, it is the Spirit of God which cooperates with His humanity, and His humanity cooperates with His divinity—They all work simultaneously. I'm here watering you and the Spirit of God is among you, working, enlightening, and illuminating, and then arranging situations and creating conditions for you so that you can enter into various truths. His humanity and divinity work together in this way. So, is there any human being who can achieve this collaboration between the flesh and the Spirit? Absolutely not. Therefore, if you don't try to know God's entire management and approach this flesh from this aspect of the truth, you will forever be unable to understand exactly what the essence of this flesh is, what this flesh is all about, and how exactly He performs work. If you can't understand these things, then you'll never be certain whether He is a human being or God. If, however, you can see this level clearly or reach this level in your experience and appreciate this level, you will then know that while God's flesh— Christ—is working on earth, the Holy Spirit is working in tandem and performing the same work, and this is something no one among all of mankind can achieve. And while the Spirit is working, the flesh is working in tandem with the Spirit's work. They are complementary, consistent, and never in conflict with each other. Some people say, "Sometimes, when I encounter trials, the Holy Spirit enlightens me to learn the lessons." You, however, express other truths. What's that all about?" There is simply no contradiction or conflict here. Christ expresses the truth gradually and in the appropriate order, while the Holy Spirit leads everyone in their experience to different degrees—there is no onesize-fits-all approach. Christ preaches by giving fellowship on the truth based on the key issues that really exist for God's chosen people, and the guidance of the Holy Spirit is also based on individual circumstances. There is no contradiction or conflict here. People have different statures at different times and at different stages, whereas all the work God performs is in the truth He expresses, that is, the truth, the way, and the life as spoken about by God. His work doesn't go beyond this scope—it is all truth. What are the truths the Holy Spirit enlightens you with and the light He allows you to understand based upon? They're based upon these truths Christ now expresses, that is, the truth, the way, and the life that He now allows you to understand. Some people say, "We don't need You in this flesh. It's enough that we have the Holy Spirit to enlighten and guide us. We can have new enlightenment and light just the same without You, we can enter the new age just the same, and we can attain salvation just the same." Is this a tenable thing to say? (No.) Religious people have believed in Jesus for two thousand years and the Holy Spirit has guided them for two thousand years, and what have they gained? Only the gospel of redemption, and they've just enjoyed much grace from God, yet they aren't able to gain these truths God expresses in the last days. Therefore, if God's incarnate flesh was not here in the last days expressing so many truths, what would you be able to gain? You would be just like those religious people, gaining great enlightenment from the Holy Spirit and much grace, or else God would choose you and use you and you could be a prophet or an apostle, but if you don't accept these truths God's incarnation of the last days expresses, then you will have no way to be made perfect, to enter the kingdom of heaven, or to receive God's commendation.

You are now able to accept the incarnation, yet you still have certain notions about the essence of the incarnation and are never certain that the incarnation is the practical God. If I were to engage with you now, and you discovered that I don't understand some things in the outside world either, would you form notions? Some people wouldn't be able to get over it, and would think, "You don't understand it either. This isn't supposed to happen. You're God incarnate so You should understand everything. There should be nothing You don't know and nothing You can't do. Even though You can't be everywhere at once, You should still know everything!" Isn't this a notion people have? (Yes.) This is a notion, too. What is the concept behind the incarnation's normal humanity? It is that there is normal human logic in the way the incarnation thinks—it's not supernatural, it's not vague, and it's not hollow. He can achieve what can be reached with the thinking of normal humanity by studying, though He may not necessarily know more about such things than someone with the relevant expertise, and this is normal. Moreover, He speaks and acts in accordance with the logic and thinking of normal humanity, and not supernaturally. For example, the thinking of normal humanity proceeds step by step, and this is how the incarnation thinks too. Why is His normal humanity like this? Is this reasonable? (Yes.) Why do you say this is reasonable? How many stairs does a normal person take at a time when stepping up them? (One.) One stair with every step; this is the normal way to walk up stairs. If I were to span many stairs in just one step and enter the house immediately, would you be able to do this? (No.) No, you wouldn't. And if I insisted that you do this, what would you do? Would you be able to achieve this? (No.) No, you wouldn't. It is based on the needs of those whom the work is aimed at. I fellowship on the truth in this way, taking a topic and a core issue and then doing all I can to speak specifically and completely, telling stories, giving examples, saying things again and again, yet even by speaking in this way there are many people who don't understand and who miss the point. So if I didn't speak in such detail and explained everything in a most profound and general way, then you wouldn't be able to gain or understand anything, and this work would be empty and impractical. You can progress by taking one stair with every step, so I will lead you onward by also taking one stair with every step, and in this way you can keep up with Me. If I were to take four stairs in one step, what would the result be? You would never be able to keep up with Me. If My thinking was advanced and could go forward in leaps and bounds, and you weren't able to reach it at all, the incarnation would become meaningless. Therefore, no matter how normal and practical this flesh is—He may even seem to not have the capabilities of God's Spirit—all of this is because of the needs of mankind. Because the people now being supplied by God are people who have been corrupted by Satan, who understand no truth, and who are incapable of understanding the truth, in becoming flesh, He must possess the most basic thinking of normal humanity. What is this most basic thinking? It is that, when He speaks, people with middling caliber and even slightly lacking caliber can understand Him. As long as their thinking is normal, everyone can understand what

He says and talks about and understand the truths He preaches, and can then accept the truth. Only in this way can every step of the work God performs and all the words He utters achieve effects and see results. Isn't this realistic? (Yes.) So, if people cling to notions and won't let them go, saying, "In the past, some emperors were gifted with extraordinary memories and could read ten lines at a glance. Shouldn't God be like that? If You don't possess these gifts, we won't be able to follow You because You're too ordinary. It would be great if You looked like a big shot," what can you see from this? People have been corrupted by Satan to the point where they're so ignorant as to be beyond remedy. Apart from having some normal human thinking and caliber, and with God choosing them and working on them, people having some heart to follow God and a little conscience and reason—apart from this, they understand nothing. Not only do they not understand any truths, but they don't even understand what normal humanity is, what corrupt dispositions are, how notions and imaginings arise, how to resolve them, how people should approach God, or at the very least what conscience and reason they should possess, and so on. No matter what easy-to-understand language God uses, people don't quite understand and only have a superficial understanding. Tell Me, when faced with a group of corrupt people who understand nothing, who are in opposition to God, what kind of essence, what kind of humanity, and what kind of normal human thinking should God incarnate possess in order to be able to lead such people before God? Tell Me, what should God do? Some people say, "Isn't God all-powerful? Why not show lots of signs and wonders to conquer people?" This is a notion held in most people's hearts. They don't question whether corrupt dispositions can be exposed and resolved by showing signs and wonders and by supernatural means. Can the truth be wrought into people by supernatural means? Would this convince Satan? (No.) Your saying "No" now is perhaps a kind of doctrine, but when you have experienced up to a certain day, you will then know just how numb and dull-witted, just how disobedient, just how intransigent, just how wicked people are, and just how much they do not love the truth. When you've experienced up to a certain day, you will then understand that God's incarnate flesh, this flesh of normal humanity, is what is needed by all of mankind. Therefore, if you still have all manner of imaginings and notions, to you this is an irresponsible attitude to have, and to God it is blasphemy; it is to deny and question God's painstaking intent to save mankind. If you think, "We have knowledge and education and brains. We've been born into the last days, and some of us have received higher education in the world and have certain family backgrounds. We're modern, educated people and we have reason to reject such an exceedingly ordinary and normal Christ whom everyone looks down on; we have reason to form notions about You," then what kind of problem is this? This is disobedience and not knowing the difference between good and bad! People can resolve their notions once they've arisen, but if after they've been resolved, people still stubbornly refuse to accept God's incarnation or the normal humanity side of Christ, then this will cause trouble for them and will prevent them from attaining salvation. When you have experienced up to a certain day, you will understand that the more normal God's incarnation, His normal humanity, all that He has and what He reveals, the greater our salvation, and the more normal they are, the more they are what we need. If God's incarnation were supernatural, then not one of those who live on earth would be able to attain salvation. It is precisely because of God's humility and hiddenness, because of the normality and practicality of this seemingly unremarkable God, that mankind has the chance of salvation. Because in people there is disobedience, satanic corrupt dispositions, and corrupt essence, all kinds of notions, misunderstandings, and conflicts toward God are produced; it is even the case that, as a result of these notions, people often proudly or self-confidently deny this Christ, and deny His normal humanity—this is a big mistake. If you wish to attain salvation, if you wish to receive God's salvation, and the judgment and chastisement of God, you must first put aside your various notions and imaginings and erroneous definitions about Christ's normal humanity, you must put aside your various views and opinions about Christ, and you must think of a way to accept all that comes from Him. Only then will the words He speaks and the truths He expresses gradually find entry into your heart and become your life. If you wish to follow Him, you should accept everything about Him; whether His Spirit, His words, or His flesh, you should accept it all. If you have truly accepted Him, then you should not stand in opposition to Him, always misunderstanding Him and being disobedient toward Him in reliance on your notions, much less should you cling to your notions, always doubting Him and even being conflictive and resistant toward Him. This kind of attitude will only harm you and it is of no benefit to you at all. Can you accept what I say? (Yes.) That's good, so now hurry and seek the truth to resolve your notions. This issue pertains to corrupt dispositions, and if you don't solve them, then you must die of your corrupt dispositions.

Now, when it comes to the form in which God performs His work in the last days, despite the fact that some people produce certain imaginings and notions about it, these imaginings and notions are largely incapable of obstructing their faith in God, and people will not casually say that they don't believe in God or deny God. What is this phenomenon? This is the result achieved by God's words. People have been conquered by God's words and work, and can basically accept Christ as their God. In this sense, people have basically laid down a foundation on the true way, and they are certain about it and sure about it. When this result is achieved, are people's misunderstandings about God then resolved? (No, they're not.) That their misunderstandings are not resolved proves that they still have many imaginings, requirements, and notions about God's incarnate flesh and about Christ. These notions can guide your thoughts, guide the direction and goals of your pursuit, and they can also frequently influence your state. When the matters you encounter do not touch upon your notions, you are still able to eat and drink God's words and perform your duty normally. The moment something clashes with your notions, goes beyond your notions, and contradictions arise, how do you resolve this? Do you give free rein to your notions, or do you deal with them, restrain them, and forsake them? Some people have notions when things happen to them, and not only do they not let their notions go, but they also go and spread their notions to others and find opportunities to vent them, so that others come to have notions too. Some people also argue, saying, "You say everything God does is meaningful, but I don't think this particular occurrence has any meaning." Is this appropriate to say? (No.) What is the correct path to take? When some people have notions about God, they can realize that their relationship with God isn't normal, that they have formed misunderstandings about God, and that it will become very dangerous if they don't resolve them, that they will be likely to conflict with God, question God, and even betray God. They then pray to God and relinquish their notions. First, they deny their own incorrect perspective, then they seek the truth to resolve it. By doing this, they can easily come to submit to God. If someone forms notions, but still believes that they are right, and if they are ultimately unable to completely let go of or resolve their notions, then over time these notions will exert an influence on their life entry. In severe cases, they can even rebel against God and resist Him, and the consequence of this does not bear thinking about. If it is someone who pursues the truth, who already understands some truths and who occasionally forms notions about things, this is not such a big problem, and their notions will not have a great influence on them. Because they have the truth within them, directing their thoughts and behavior, and guiding them in the performance of their duty, their notions will have no impact on them following God. Perhaps one day they will listen to a sermon or some fellowship and they will understand, and their notions will be resolved. Some people form notions about God's orchestrations and arrangements, and afterward they don't feel like doing their duties, and they don't put effort into performing them, they're always in a negative state, and their hearts harbor conflict, dissatisfaction, and resentment—is this behavior right? Is this an easy thing to resolve? For example, suppose that you think yourself clever, but I say that you are a fool and that you don't have spiritual understanding. Upon hearing this, you become angry and conflict with it, and you say to yourself in your heart, "No one has ever dared to say I don't have spiritual understanding. Today is the first time I've heard this and I cannot accept it. Could I lead the church if I didn't have spiritual understanding? Could I do this much work?" A contradiction has arisen, right? What should you do? Is it easy for people to reflect on themselves when this happens to them? What kind of person can reflect on themselves? Someone who accepts the truth and seeks the truth can reflect on themselves. If you are someone who possesses reason, you should first deny yourself when this happens to you; denying oneself means acknowledging that one does not possess the truth. Even if you have some ideas and perspectives, they are not necessarily accurate. Therefore, to practice denying yourself in such circumstances is the correct thing to do, it is not debasing yourself. After you've denied yourself, you will feel at peace in your heart, you will be much more well-behaved, and your attitude will be corrected. When you hear God

say that you are a fool and that you don't have spiritual understanding, you should quiet yourself before God and accept His words with a submissive mindset. Even though you don't yet have any consciousness or understanding of God's words, and you don't know whether they are right or not, within your belief you should acknowledge that: "God is truth, so how could God say something wrong?" Even though what God said differs from what you think, you must accept God's words based on faith; even if you don't understand them, you must accept them as the truth. Doing this is guaranteed to be correct. If people don't accept God's words as the truth when they don't understand them, that is so lacking in sense, and those people must be shamed in this matter. So, obeying God can never be wrong. This isn't doctrine, this is practical, and these words come from experience. Then, when you are able to take God's words as the truth and accept them, you must begin to reflect on yourself. Through performing duty and interacting with others, you will discover that not only do you not have spiritual understanding, you are also incredibly foolish, and have many faults and deficiencies, and you will discover that you have a serious problem. Won't that mean that you'll be able to understand and accept what God has said? You must accept these words, first as a rule, a definition, or a concept, and then in real life you must think of a way to compare yourself to His words, and to understand and experience them. After a while doing this, you will come to possess an accurate assessment of yourself. When that happens, will you still have misunderstandings about God? Will you still refuse to accept God's assessment of you if there is no disagreement between you and God on this matter? (No.) You will be able to accept it and will no longer be disobedient. When you can accept the truth and thoroughly understand these things, you will then be able to take a step forward and make progress. If you don't accept the truth, then you will always be standing in one place and will not make any progress. Is it important to accept the truth? (Yes, it is.) People must relinquish their notions about God, and they mustn't harbor any hostility toward or conflict with the things God says—only this is an attitude of accepting the truth. Some people become negative and weak because they are replaced. They don't want to perform their duties and are always passive and slacking off work. From the outside, it looks as though it's because they have no status and they cherish status too much, but this is not in fact the case. They feel weak and negative simply because God's assessment of them, or the assessment the brothers and sisters have of them, doesn't match with their own assessment of themselves, because it is poorer than how they assess and understand themselves. That's why they feel unconvinced and aggrieved, and ultimately, they decide to be negative and antagonistic, and to write themselves off as hopeless, thinking, "Didn't You say that I'm not good enough? Then I'll show You, I'm not going to do anything at all." The result of this is that they cause delays to their duties, they offend God, and their own life entry grinds to a halt—this is a significant loss.

Some people say, "I can't accept it when Christ says I'm bad. I'd accept it if the God in heaven said there was something bad about me. The incarnate God has normal humanity, His judgments can be wrong, and the things He does cannot be 100 percent correct. There are some questions over whether He could be mistaken in His assessment and condemnation of people, or in how He handles and makes arrangements for them. So I'm not afraid of what Christ-the God on earth-says about me, for He cannot condemn me or determine my end." Do such people exist? They certainly do. When I deal with them, they say, "The God in heaven is righteous!" When I handle them, they say, "I believe in God, not some person!" They use these words to rebuff Me. And what are these words? (They are a denial of God.) That's right, they are a denial and a betrayal of God. What they mean is, "This is not up to You, but the God of heaven." In their notions and in their understanding of God, these people will never realize what the relationship is between the incarnate Christ and the God in heaven, that is, what the relationship is between the flesh and the Spirit in heaven. In their eyes, this insignificant person on earth will always be just a person, and no matter how many truths this person expresses, how many sermons He preaches, He is still a human; even if He makes some people complete, and brings them salvation, He will still be on earth, He will still be a person, and incapable of transcending the God in heaven. Thus, these people believe that faith in God must be the faith in the God in heaven; to them, only belief in the God in heaven is the true belief in God. People like this believe however they wish. They believe in whatever way makes them happy, and they imagine God to be whatever they wish Him to be. They follow their own imagination when it comes to the incarnate Christ, too: "If this God on earth were a little nicer to me, if He made sure that things went well for me, then I would respect Him, and love Him. If He isn't good to me, if He has a problem with me, if He has a bad attitude toward me, and always prunes and deals with me, then He is not my God; I choose to believe in the God in heaven." People with this attitude are not in the minority. They include you, too, for I have already encountered such people. When all is well, they are pretty nice to Me, and wait on Me attentively, but as soon as I replace them, they turn against Me. So, when they were being good to God, did they really believe that this was God, and Christ? No: What they are eyeing up is the identity and status of God, their every move is nothing more than fawning over the status and identity of God. At all times, they only identify the vague God in heaven as the true God; no matter how many truths this God on earth expresses, or how edifying and beneficial He is to man, the mere fact that He lives in His normal humanity and is of a fleshly body means that He cannot possibly be the God in heaven, and regardless of how these people flatter, serve, and respect this God on earth, in their hearts these people still believe that the God in heaven is the only true God. What do you think of this view? It is fair to say that such a view exists deep in many people's hearts, that it is buried deep in their subconscious. At the same time as accepting the provision and shepherding of Christ, they are also observing, studying, and questioning Christ—whilst also looking forward to when the righteous God in heaven comes to pass judgment on all they have done. And why do they wish the God in heaven to pass judgment on them? Because they want to go with their preferences, notions and imaginings to give free rein to their desire that the God in heaven—the God of their imagination—shall behave toward them as they wish, whereas the God on earth will not do that; the God on earth only expresses the truth and speaks the truth principles. And they think, "The God in heaven's love of man is selfless, unconditional, and without limit, whereas as soon as you say or do something wrong and the God on earth finds out, He uses you as a negative example in His sermons and begins dissecting you—so people must be more careful, they must keep themselves more hidden, and they can't let Him know when something's up." Tell Me, am I not able to dissect the things you try to keep from Me? I don't need to dissect the things you do; I'll dissect your dispositions and your states. I don't need to take these things you do as examples; I can still fellowship on the truth and give sermons to solve problems just the same, and I can still enable people to understand the truth. In the hearts of the nonbelievers, they believe that this flesh, this God, cannot know the things which His eyes do not see, much less know anything to do with the spiritual world or the truth. They believe that He can't even see the things people are capable of doing when they're being dominated by their corrupt dispositions, and that He can't possibly totally understand man's corrupt essence—this is the logic and reasoning of nonbelievers. They are always approaching Christ with a studying, questioning, and even nonbelieving attitude, and they also use the criteria for measuring man as well as the knowledge they understand and the things they imagine to measure Christ. For example, when talking to others, some people believe that other people don't know what they think in their hearts or what kind of dispositions they have, and they speak to Me in this way too, treating Me in this way just as they would treat an ordinary person, thinking that I know nothing—isn't this them not knowing God? They lie to other people and other people don't mind, and they also lie to Me like that, giggling and treating Me as an equal, always wanting to treat Me like their buddy. They believe they can act that way because they're familiar with Me, and they think that I may not know anything. Is this not a human notion? This is a human notion, this is human ignorance, and within this ignorance there lurks a satanic wicked disposition; it is this wicked disposition that leads people to form notions. Tell Me, do I need to live with someone, and spend every minute observing their thoughts and views, and totally comprehend their background, in order to reveal or see through their nature? (No.) No, I don't, but you wouldn't be able to achieve this. Even though you associate with people and live with them every day, you still aren't able to see through their nature essence. No matter what happens to you, you are only able to see through the surface of things and not their essence. You could only have a little discernment of someone if God were to completely expose them, otherwise you wouldn't be able to see through them even if you associated with them for several years. I can be in contact with someone for a day or two, and they do some things, say some things, and express some views, and then I basically know what kind of person they are. However, there are some people who haven't done anything yet, who I haven't interacted with or handled anything with, yet I draw a question mark over them, and the moment they encounter an issue and express some view, their nature essence is revealed right away. Many people say, "Can You see through them as soon as their nature essence is revealed? What do You base this insight on? How come we can't see through them?" If you don't understand the truth then you won't be able to take people's measure, and you will never have the necessary criteria to do so. If you don't have those criteria, you won't be able to see through people. I, however, have those criteria. In one respect, I understand the truth, so I'm more perceptive and quicker when it comes to taking someone's measure, and in another respect, God's Spirit is at work. Some people think, "When people have lived in this world for a long time, they are able to see through things and people." That's not real insight; what is it they see through? The types of scams that exist in this society, such as political scams, business scams, financial scams, or scams related to pornography. These things can be avoided by people who have experienced and heard about them more. People who've undergone and experienced these things less are often deceived, but once they've been duped more, they gain experience, and they are able to see through them. This is how they see through things. However, when it comes to man's corruption, nature, and man's essence that has been corrupted by Satan, if people don't possess the truth, then they will never have the wisdom to see through these things, and they will never be able to see through the dispositions that various kinds of people reveal behind a matter, or the source of the problem. If you can't see through these things, then you won't know how to handle the matter or the related people, events, and things—you will have no way to handle it and you won't have the wisdom to handle it. That's why when you encounter such a matter, you feel very flustered and agitated, and you find it difficult to deal with. If you understand the truth clearly, then you'll be able to see through people's corrupt dispositions and the essence of their corrupt dispositions. Through seeing the corrupt dispositions they reveal, you'll come to know their essence, and then you'll know what kind of thing they are, what kind of person they are, you'll know how to guard against them, how to discern them, and you'll know how to cope with this matter. Isn't this the source of wisdom? (It is.) So, Christ can see through man and supply man—what is the source of all this? To say it in doctrinal terms, it all comes from the Spirit of God. To say it in more practical terms, it's because Christ possesses the truth that comes from God. This is how it is. When one day you come to possess the truth reality as your life, you will then have wisdom and you will be able to see through people.

There is another aspect to human notions, and that is the notions people form about God's work. How do people's notions about God's work come about? Some come from people's previous comprehension of faith, and some come from their own imaginings about the work of God. For example, people used to imagine God's work of judgment as there being a big white throne in the sky, with God upon the throne judging all peoples. Today, you all know that such imaginings are unrealistic—such things are impossible. Whatever the case, people have many imaginings about God's work, management, and treatment of man, and most of these imaginings come from human predilections. Why do I say this? Because people do not want to suffer. They always want to follow God to the very end with ease, enjoy ample grace, inherit His blessings, and then enter the kingdom of heaven. What a wonderful thought! The most common and extravagant idea that corrupt mankind has about the work of God is breezing into the kingdom of heaven upon a sedan chair. Moreover, when people encounter the work of God, most of the time they are incapable of understanding it; they do not know the truth it contains, or what God's aim is in doing this work, and why God behaves toward man thus. For example, I have previously described God's love using the words "vast" and "immense," but I think it likely you have never understood just what I meant by these two words. What was My aim in using these two words? It was to get everyone's attention, so that you would go and reflect on them. Superficially, these words seem empty. They do have a certain meaning, but no matter how much thought people give them, all they can come up with is, "Vast—it means as boundless as the sky; it is saying that God's heart is boundless, there is no limit to His love for mankind!" God's love is not the kind of love that can be imagined by the mind of man. People are incapable of imagining this love, they must not use learning and knowledge to interpret this word, but must use another method to appreciate and experience it. Ultimately, you come to sense truly that the love of God is different from the love spoken of by people, that the true love of God is unlike any other kind of love, unlike the love understood by all mankind. So what exactly is this love of God? How should you understand God's love? First you must not approach it with the notions and imaginings of man. Take a mother's love, for example: A mother's love toward her children is unconditional, it is extremely protective and warm. Right now, does the love of God for man that you feel have the same level of sensation and meaning as a mother's love? (Yes.) Then this is a problem—it is wrong. You must distinguish God's love from the love of parents, of a husband, wife, or children, of your kin, from the concern of friends, and come to know the love of God anew. Just what is the love of God? The love of God is without emotion and is unaffected by relationships of blood. It is love pure and simple. So how should people understand the love of God? Why have we come to discuss the love of God? The love of God is embodied in the work of God, so that people acknowledge it, accept it, and experience it, and ultimately realize that this is the love of God, and acknowledge that this is the truth, that God's love is not empty words, nor some form of behavior on the part of God, but the truth. When you accept it as the truth, you will be able to recognize this aspect of God's essence from it. If you treat it as some form of behavior, you will have difficulty recognizing it. What is meant by "behavior"? Take mothers, for example: They give their youth, their blood, their sweat and tears to bring up their children, and they give them whatever they want. Regardless of whether her child has done right or wrong, or what path they take, a mother gives selflessly, meets her child's needs, never teaching, helping or guiding her child how to follow the right path, just constantly caring for, loving and protecting them, to the extent that ultimately, the child cannot tell right from wrong. This is the love of a mother or any kind of love born of the flesh, emotions, and fleshly relationships of man. The love of God, meanwhile, is exactly the opposite: If God loves you, He expresses this by often chastening and disciplining you, by pruning and dealing with you. Although your days may pass uncomfortably, amid chastening and discipline, once you have experienced this, you will discover that you have learned much, that you have discernment and are wise when it comes to interacting with other people, and also that you have come to understand some truths. If the love of God were like the love of a mother or father, as you imagine it to be, if He were so scrupulous in His care, and invariably indulgent, could you gain these things? You could not. And so, the love of God people can comprehend is different from the true love of God they can experience in His work; people must approach it according to God's words and seek the truth in His words in order to know what true love is. If they do not seek the truth, how could someone who is corrupt conjure, out of thin air, an understanding of what God's love is, what the aim of His work in man is, and where His painstaking intentions lie? People would never understand these things. This is the most likely misunderstanding people have about God's work, and it is the aspect of God's essence that people find most difficult to understand. People must experience it profoundly and personally and practically engage with it and appreciate it in order to be able to understand it. Ordinarily, when people say "love" they mean giving someone what they like, not giving them something bitter when they want something sweet, or even if sometimes they are given something bitter, it is in order to treat an illness; in brief, it involves the selfishness, the emotions, and the flesh of man; it involves aims and motivations. But no matter what God does in you, no matter how He judges and chastises you, chastens and disciplines you, or prunes and deals with you, even if you misunderstand Him, and even complain about Him in your heart, God shall, with unflagging patience, continue to work in you. What is God's ultimate aim in doing this? He uses this method to awaken you, so that one day you can understand God's will. But when God sees this outcome, what has He gained? He has actually gained nothing. And why do I say this? Because your all comes from God. God does not need to gain anything. All He needs is for people to properly follow and enter in accordance with what He requires while He performs His work, to ultimately be able to live out the truth reality, to live with the likeness of man, and no longer be deceived, beguiled, and tempted by Satan, to be able to turn their backs on Satan, to obey and worship God, and then God is well pleased, and His great work is done. What does God gain? God gains you and you can praise God. But what does your praise mean to God? Would God not be God if you did not praise Him? Would God not be all-powerful if you did not praise Him? Would you not praising God change His essence or His status? (No.) No. This can only be said to be the love and work of God. Is there this meaning to your understanding of God's love as vast and immense? (No.) Your understanding has not reached that point. Even when someone breaks God's heart, and others think there is no way God could save them, what is God's attitude when they reflect on themselves, realize the error of their ways and repent, and put aside the evil in their hands and accept His salvation? God accepts them all the same. As long as people take the right path, God will not hold people's transgressions to account. This is the love of God. What notion of man is to be remedied here? It is the notion regarding the way God loves. People should leave their various notions and imaginings behind; they must seek the truth and understand the truth in order to be able to let their notions go. It is easy to leave one's notions behind, but thoroughly changing one's notions is not easy. If you are to encounter a similar issue in the future and your notion forms again, what kind of problem is that? It would prove that this notion is deeply embedded within you. Even though with some matters you can let notions go by fellowshiping on the truth, with some other matters you will not be able to let them go. It may be easy to let a notion go with one matter, but to get people to utterly resolve their notions is not easy. One must understand many truths before being able to utterly resolve the problem of one's notions. This requires people to seek the truth in the matters they encounter, practically experience and appreciate God's love, and it requires God to perform many deeds so that people can know Him. Only when people know God can the problem of their harboring notions and imaginings about God be thoroughly removed.

What you need to analyze now are notions about God's work and what these notions are, and mainly summarize your various imaginings, conflicts, and requirements about God's work, God's sovereignty and arrangements, and the way God works. These things can hinder you from submitting to God's orchestrations and arrangements and can cause you to misunderstand and feel conflictive toward everything God has done with you. Such notions are very serious and are worth dissecting. For instance, some people read God's words which judge and condemn people and they form notions and say, "God says He doesn't love people like me, so perhaps He won't save me." Is this not a notion? What will the consequence be of this notion? No matter what corruption you have or what kind of person you are, you know that God doesn't like people who disobey Him, so why don't you repent? If you accept the truth, cast off your corruption and completely submit to God, won't God then like you? Why do you delimit God, saying that He won't save you? These negative thoughts you have will hinder you from following God and experiencing His work, they will cause you to remain at a standstill and abandon yourself to despair and will even cause you to reject God. Antichrists and wicked people appear in some churches and create disturbances, and in doing so they deceive some people—is this a good thing or a bad thing? Is this God's love, or is it God playing with people and exposing them? You can't understand this, can you? God brings all things into His service to perfect and save those He wishes to save, and what those who genuinely seek the truth and practice the truth ultimately gain is the truth. Some who don't seek the truth, however, complain, saying, "It isn't right for God to work this way. It causes me to suffer so much! I almost fell in with antichrists. If this really is arranged by God, how can He allow people to fall in with antichrists?" What's going on here? You not following antichrists proves that you have God's protection; if you fall in with antichrists, then that is a betrayal of God and God no longer wants you. So, is it a good thing or a bad thing that these antichrists and wicked people cause disturbances in the church? From the outside, it appears to be a bad thing, but when these antichrists and wicked people are exposed, you then grow in discernment, they are cleansed away, and you grow in stature. When you encounter such people again in the future, you will have discernment of them even before they've shown their true colors, and you will reject them. This will allow you to learn lessons and be benefited; you will know how to discern antichrists and will no longer be deceived by Satan. So, tell Me, is it not a good thing to have antichrists disturbing and deceiving people? Only when they have experienced to this stage can people see that God has not acted in line with their notions and imaginings, and that God permits the great red dragon to frenziedly create disturbances and permits antichrists to deceive God's chosen people so that He can use Satan in His service in order to perfect His chosen people, and only then do people understand God's painstaking intentions. Some people say, "I've been deceived by antichrists twice and I still can't discern them. If a yet more cunning antichrist comes along, I'll just be deceived again." Then let it happen again so that you can experience it and learn the lesson— God must do things this way so that He can save mankind from Satan's influence. Two phrases can be used here to describe the way God works, and they are that the various ways in which God works are extraordinary and beyond the imagination of ordinary people. Why do I define God's work using these two phrases of "extraordinary" and "beyond the imagination"? It's because corrupt mankind can't understand these things and they don't understand the truth, the way God works, or the wisdom of God in His fight against Satan—all of mankind draws a blank with these things. So how can people still harbor ideas and notions? It's because they learn a little knowledge, understand some doctrine, and have their own preferences, and so they form certain notions and imaginings. When it comes to matters of the spiritual world and the work God performs, however, they don't understand these things at all. In the last days, the Creator directly faces all of mankind and utters His words. This is the first time this has ever happened since the creation of the world. That is, He faces all of mankind and openly performs deeds in this way, publicizes His management plan and then implements it and carries it out among mankind—this is the first time this has ever happened. People draw a blank with and are strangers to this realm of God's thought, God's essence, and the way God works, therefore it is normal for people to harbor notions about these things, but this does not mean that they accord with the truth. No matter how normal people's notions are, they still go against the truth, they do not conform with God's words, and they conflict with God's will. If these notions are not resolved in a timely manner, then they will be a huge obstruction to people experiencing God's work and to their own life entry. Therefore, when it comes to human notions, no matter how much they accord with people's imaginings and ideas, as long as they do not conform with the truth and with God's words, then they all run contrary to the truth and are in opposition to God, and they are not compatible with God. No matter how in line with people's imaginings their notions may be, people should always try to discern them; they should absolutely not blindly accept their notions. What should mankind accept? Mankind should accept God's words, the truth, and all positive things that come from God. As for the things that pertain to Satan, regardless of how good or how in line with their own imaginings people think these things are, they must not accept them, but instead must reject them. Only in this way can people achieve submission to God and meet the Creator's requirements.

People's notions can only be resolved through God's words and by using the truth; they cannot be put aside through preaching doctrine and by giving advice and encouragement—it is not that easy. People have no commitment to righteous matters, but are liable to cling to various notions or wicked, deviant and absurd things, which they find hard to put aside. What is the cause of this? It is because they have corrupt dispositions. Whether people's notions are large or small, serious or not, if they do not have corrupt dispositions, these notions are easy to solve. Notions, at the end of the day, are just a way of thinking. But because of people's corrupt dispositions, such as arrogance, intransigence, and even wickedness, notions become a fuse which causes people to conflict with, misinterpret, and even pass judgment on God. Who can still obey and praise God when they harbor notions about Him? No one. Harboring notions, people are just conflictive toward God, they complain about Him, they judge Him, and they even condemn Him. This is sufficient to show that notions arise from within corrupt dispositions, the appearance of notions is the expression of corrupt dispositions, and all corrupt dispositions that are expressed are rebellious against and resistant to God. Some people say, "I have notions, but I don't resist God." This is deceptive talk. Even if they don't say anything, in their hearts they are still conflictive, and their behavior is conflictive. Can such people still submit to the truth when they're like this? It's impossible. Governed by a corrupt disposition, they cling to their notions—this is caused by their corrupt dispositions. And so, as notions are solved, so too are people's corrupt dispositions. If people's corrupt dispositions are solved, then many of their immature, childish thoughts, and even the things that have already become notions, are not an issue for them; they are just thoughts, and do not affect the performance of your duty, or your obedience to God. Notions and corrupt dispositions are connected. Sometimes a notion is in your heart, but it does not direct your actions. When it does not infringe upon your immediate interests, you ignore it. Ignoring it, however, does not mean there is not a corrupt disposition within your notion, and when something happens that is in conflict with your notion, you cling to it with a certain attitude, an attitude dominated by your disposition. This disposition could be intransigence, it could be arrogance, and it could be viciousness; it causes you to shoot your mouth off to God, saying, "My point of view has been academically ratified many times. People have held it for thousands of years, so why can't I? The things You say that are at odds with human notions are wrong, so how can You still say they are the truth, that they are above all else? My perspective is the highest of all mankind!" One notion can lead to you behaving like this, to such bluster. What causes this? (Corrupt dispositions.) That's right, it is caused by corrupt dispositions. There is a direct relationship between notions and people's corrupt dispositions, and their notions must be resolved. Once people's notions about faith in God have been addressed, it becomes easy for them to submit to the work arrangements of the house of God, and so they more smoothly perform their duty well, they are not taking circuitous paths, they do not disrupt or disturb, and they do not do anything that brings shame upon God. If people's notions and imaginings are not addressed, it becomes easy for them to do things that cause disruptions and disturbances. In more serious cases, people's notions can produce in them all manner of conflict to the incarnation of God. Speaking of notions, they are certainly wrong views that are at odds with the truth, they are entirely opposed to the truth, and they can cause all kinds of conflictive feelings to God to arise in people. This conflict makes you question Christ and become unable to accept or obey Him, whilst also affecting your acceptance of the truth and entry into the truth reality. In even more serious cases, people's various notions about the work of God cause them to deny the work of God, the ways in which God works, and the sovereignty and arrangements of God—in which case they have no hope of salvation whatsoever. No matter which aspect of God people have notions about, behind these notions lurk their corrupt dispositions, which can cause these corrupt dispositions to become worse, giving people even more of a pretext to approach the work of God, God Himself, and the disposition of God using their own corrupt dispositions. And does this not encourage them to resist God with their corrupt dispositions? This is the consequence of notions for man.

Although we've previously often talked about human notions, we've never fellowshiped systematically and in detail on what aspects and matters people harbor notions about, and the kind of notions they form. By fellowshiping and dissecting point by point in this way today, I've given you a clear line to follow so that you know what kind of notions you have, and so you can then have a path to resolve them one by one. If people can resolve these notions one by one, all aspects of the truth will become increasingly clear to them. In this way, their onward path will also become increasingly clear, and the path they walk in their faith in God will become increasingly solid and bright the farther they go.

Regarding the issue of notions, we fellowshiped last time about three points: The first was notions about belief in God, the second was notions about incarnation, and the third was notions about God's work. We finished discussing the first two points, and talked about some fairly basic conceptual content with respect to the third point. Regarding the notions concerning this point, or the content concerned with these notions, afterward did you carefully contemplate what other content is concerned with these notions and relates to this truth? No truths are as simple as their literal meaning; they all have their own real meaning contained within, and they are all concerned with people's life entry, as well as with all aspects of their daily lives and belief in God. So, have you figured out from your daily lives any content regarding this aspect of the truth? When you are listening to fellowships on this aspect of the truth, you can only understand some of it, in a literal sense, and have some discernment of obvious notions. Afterward, through further contemplation, prayer and seeking, and fellowshiping with your brothers and sisters based on your experience, you should be able to gain a somewhat deeper and more real understanding. Looking at these three truths in the literal sense, which one is most concerned with people's corrupt dispositions, their understanding of God's disposition, and their actual entry? Which truth is the most in-depth and profound? (The third truth.) The third truth is a little more in-depth. The first was notions about belief in God, and these notions are fairly obvious and superficial things; the second was notions about incarnation, which involve some content that people can see and understand, and that they may come into contact with and reflect on in life; the third was notions about God's work, which is concerned with people's corrupt dispositions—this last truth is somewhat more profound. So what exactly are notions about God's work? What notions do people have about God's work? How should they understand and deal with these notions, and how should they resolve them? This is the content of today's fellowship.

When people's notions about God's work escalate from their application of reasoning and judgment to their making demands on God, having extravagant desires toward God, conflicting with Him, and making some assessments or judgments about His work, then these notions are no longer just a point of view or a belief, but are also concerned with people's corrupt dispositions. Once they become concerned with corrupt dispositions, this is enough to cause people to resist God, judge Him, and even betray Him. Hence, it is not a big problem if people's notions about God go no further than imaginings and speculation. Whereas, if they escalate into a point of view and an attitude toward God's work, turn into unreasonable demands on God or judgment and condemnation of God, or become filled with ambition, desires, or intentions, then these are no longer ordinary notions. Why do I say they are no longer ordinary notions? Because these notions and thoughts relate to your life entry, and to your understanding of God's work, and to whether you can accept and obey God's sovereignty, and to whether you can recognize Him as your Sovereign and as the Lord of creation, and all this has a direct bearing on your standpoint and attitude toward God. Looking at it this way, is it a serious problem for people to have these notions? (Yes.) In order to dissect these notions, if we do it from a theoretical point of view, they may sound a bit abstract, or somewhat far removed from your daily lives. So let us talk some more about various types of people's living situation, which we can see in daily life or among humankind, or about their destiny, or about their various views and attitudes toward life and toward God's sovereignty and orchestration, so as to dissect people's notions and allow them to see how God rules over and orchestrates humankind, and what the actual circumstances of God's work are. This is a topic that is not so easy to fellowship on. If the fellowshiping is too theoretical, people will feel it is hollow, whereas if it is too concerned with trivial matters or too close to people's real lives, they will think it is very shallow, and there will be problems of this type. Be that as it may, let us nevertheless fellowship about it in a way that is fairly straightforward and easy to understand, which is still by telling a story. Through the plot and characters of the story, as well as the philosophy of living reflected in the story itself and the phenomena that people see, they can understand some of the ways and methods by which God does His work, as well as the mistaken and absurd views that people have in real life regarding God's work, His sovereignty and orchestration of everything, or some incorrect things that people cling onto—it is somewhat easier for people to understand when fellowshiping in this way.

So here is the story. There was once a little girl who was born into a not-so-rich family. Ever since she was very young she had a wish: She didn't ask to be rich or wealthy in life, all she wanted was someone to rely on. Was this wish too extravagant? Was it asking too much? (No.) But unfortunately, her father passed away before she reached adulthood, so in effect she had no one to rely on in life. She had lost the primary person she could rely on in this life, the only person she thought in her young mind that she could depend on. Was her young mind not afflicted with great anguish? For something like this to happen, it must have caused her great anguish. Was there trauma in her heart? There definitely was trauma. How did such trauma come about? It was because, in her young mind, she wasn't ready yet, saying, "I can be independent, I can provide for myself, I don't need to rely on my parents anymore." She was, as they say, yet to spread her wings. In her naive thoughts, she hadn't got around to thinking what to do about her future or how she would survive without her parents. It was in this situation, before she had become aware of such things, that her father passed away, which meant that her means of support in life was gone, and that times would get even tougher than they already were. You can imagine what her days must have been like after that. She led a difficult life with her mother and young brother, barely making ends meet. But no matter how anguished she was, life still had to go on, so she just stumbled on, keeping her mother and brother company. A few years later she had grown up, and could independently earn some money to provide for her mother and brother's living expenses, but still they were by no means wealthy in life. All this time, her innermost wish had not changed. She needed someone to rely on, but what kind of person? What exactly was the one she wished to rely on? You describe them to Me. What does "someone to rely on" mean in the simplest terms? It means someone who could give her the means to live, as well as food and clothing, without her needing to go off and eke out a living on her own, or suffer any pain. Someone whom, at the very least, she could lean on whenever things went wrong, someone who had her back, as they say—that was the kind of person she hoped to rely on. Even if they couldn't help or support her financially in life, then at the very least, whenever something went wrong or whenever she felt anguished, she would have a shoulder to lean on, someone who could help her get through the tough times and ride out the storm—this was what she wished for. Was this too much to ask? Was this wish unrealistic? It wasn't too much to ask, and it wasn't an unrealistic wish. Don't many people also wish for something so simple as this? Very few people can say that they were born without relying on anyone but themselves. Most people living in this world and in a community hope to have a friend, or someone to rely on, and this girl was no exception.

In the blink of an eye she reached marriageable age, and still she wished to find someone she could rely on, someone dependable. That person didn't need to be particularly wealthy, or to keep her in the lap of luxury, and he didn't need to be a great conversationalist. He just needed to be there to support her whenever she was most in trouble, or beset by difficulty or illness, even if only to give her a few comforting words and nothing more. Was this a wish that could easily come true? This is uncertain. No one knows whether people's wishes are what God planned to give them or accomplish in them, or whether ultimately, their wishes are already preordained in their destiny. Therefore, no one knew whether this girl's wish could come true, and she herself didn't know either. However, she kept holding onto this wish as she moved toward the next stage in life. At this time, she felt very apprehensive and uneasy, but be that as it may, the day had nevertheless come. She didn't know if the person she was planning to marry actually was someone she could rely on for the rest of her life, but still she sincerely hoped in her heart: "This person should be someone I can depend on. The past twenty or so years of my life have been hard enough. If I end up with someone who isn't dependable, the rest of my life will be even harder. Who else would I be able to rely on?" She felt pained, but there was nothing she could do, so she just continued hoping. In order to survive, when people don't know why they are here in this life and how they should go through life, they grope forward with this kind of wish and unknown hope. When this moment came, she didn't know what her future would be like. The future was unknown. She continued to move forward. However, many facts often run counter to people's wishes. For the time being, let us not comment on why God arranges people's destiny in this way—whether it is God's intentional arrangement, or whether it is because people's corruption and ignorance have caused their desires and demands to be diametrically opposed to the destiny God has arranged for them, so that their wishes often cannot come true, and so that things often don't turn out the way they had hoped—let us not discuss all this for now. First, let's continue with the story itself.

After the girl got married, she entered the next stage of life, while holding onto her wish. What awaited her at this stage of life? She didn't know, but she couldn't avoid it just because she was afraid of the unknown. She had to steel herself and move forward, and she still had to live through each day. At this major turning point in her life, the destiny that God had arranged for her finally arrived—and it was the opposite of what she had longed for. The homely family life that she had longed for, with a simple bed, a small writing desk, a simple, clean room, a husband and children—this simple life she wanted could never come to pass. After she got married, her husband would spend all year away from home due to work, so they had to live apart. What prospects does such a life hold for a woman? That of being bullied and discriminated against. Having to face such a living environment was another blow to her life and destiny. This was something she had never envisioned, and also something she had never wanted to see or face. But now, the facts were completely inconsistent with her wishes and imaginings. That which she didn't want to see or experience had actually happened to her. Her husband was away at work all year long. She had to be independent, both in life and financially. She had to go out and earn money to pay the bills by herself. She didn't have anyone to help her in life, and had to rely on herself for everything. In such a living environment, did this woman end up with someone she could rely on, or not at all? (Not at all.) Was her wish fulfilled or dashed after she got married? (It was dashed.) Obviously, in the second important stage of her life, her hope had been dashed once again, and she had no one to rely on. The person she had thought she could rely on in life was not by her side, and couldn't be relied on at all. The person whom she had considered to be her pillar of strength, her rock, and someone to rely on couldn't be relied on at all. She had to do everything by herself, and handle and face everything on her own. During her most difficult times, she could only hide in bed and cry under the covers, with no one to share her troubles with. For the sake of her face, competitiveness, and self-esteem, she often projected a formidable exterior, and came across as a strong woman, but deep down she was actually very fragile. She needed support, and longed for someone to rely on, but this wish had not yet come true.

A few years further on and she was moving around with her several young children in tow, renting houses and living a life of no fixed abode. In this way, one of her most basic requirements for life was gradually being eroded away, bit by bit, as the years passed. All she had wanted was to have a small room with a bed, a small writing table, and a stove for cooking on, and for her family to be able to eat around the table, keep a few chickens, and live a simple life. She didn't expect to be rich or wealthy. As long as life was simple, peaceful, and the family was together, that was enough. However, all she could do now was live a hand-to-mouth existence with her children in tow. Not only did she have no one to rely on, but worse still, she had to become the person whom her own children relied on. She also thought that, since living in this mortal world was so painful, she would maybe find a way to resolve this pain, such as by becoming a Buddhist nun, or finding a place to cultivate her spiritual virtues, away from human society and away from this suffering, without relying on anyone, and without anyone relying on her, because living like this was just too tiring and painful. But what was the one thing that sustained her and kept her going? (Her children.) That's right. If she didn't have children, perhaps each day she lived would have been even more painful, but once she had children, she took on responsibilities and became the person they relied on. When her children called out "Mommy," she felt that the burden on her shoulders was too heavy, that she couldn't just abdicate her responsibilities like that, and that she couldn't rely on others, but she could be the one others relied on—this, she thought, could also be regarded as a source of joy in life, an attitude toward life, and a motivation to live. In this way, she endured another ten years or so for the sake of her children. Did the days seem long? (Yes, they did.) Why did they seem long? (Because she lived a hard life, so the days seemed long.) You know from experience, those sound like the words of someone who has been there and done that. The days were hard and torturous, so they seemed extremely long. Everything she experienced was like a kind of torture deep within her heart, so she had to live counting the days, and this kind of life was not easy to go through. Even after the children had grown up, her wish still did not change. She still had this wish deep in her heart: "The children are older and it's no longer such an effort to take care of them. If my husband could be with us and the family were to be reunited, then our life would be even better." Her wonderful imagining returned and, just as unbelievers say, it put the wind of hope back in her sails. Whenever she couldn't sleep at night, she would think such thoughts as: "Now that the children are grown up, if they can get into college, and eventually find a good job and earn money, then life will be easier, and the food, clothing and housing situation will be better than it is now. And if my husband comes back, life will be even better, and I'll have someone to rely on! The two people that I relied on before failed me, but now I have more people to rely on. Heaven has been pretty good to me! It looks like better days are ahead." She believed that better days were ahead. Is this a good thing or a bad thing? No one knows. No one knows what a person's destiny in life is, or what lies ahead. People all stumble through life like this, clinging onto their beautiful wishes.

Ten years passed, her husband transferred to a different job, and the family was finally reunited, which was a good thing. So in the end, could her husband become someone she could rely on? Could he share some of the pain in her life? Because they had never lived together, nor interacted on a deep level, she didn't know her husband well at all. In the days that followed, she and her husband started learning to live together and gained a deeper understanding of each other. Still her wish did not change. She hoped that this man could become the one she relied on, the one to comfort her and relieve her pain, come what may. However, things still didn't turn out as she had intended. This husband whom she had never interacted with on a deep level, this man whom she didn't understand at all, simply couldn't become the one she relied on. The reason was that the two people's survival abilities, human qualities, outlooks on life, values, and attitudes toward their children, family, and relatives were completely different. The couple constantly guarreled, and continually bickered with each other over isolated things. This woman hoped deep down that she could keep enduring so that her husband might come to understand her kindness, her patience, and her hardship, and afterward be emotionally touched by her and reconnect with her, but still her wish did not come true. As far as she was concerned, deep down, was her husband someone she could rely on? Could he become someone for her to rely on? (No, he couldn't.) Whenever she faced difficulties, her husband not only failed to comfort her and ease her pain, but actually increased her pain, making her feel even more disappointed and helpless. At this time, what were her innermost feelings and understanding on life? They were disappointment and pain, which made her question, "Is there really a God? Why is my life so hard? All I want is someone to rely on, is that too much to ask? I only have this one little wish. Why has it still not come true in all the years I've lived? My requirements aren't excessive and I have no ambitions. I just want someone to lean on whenever things go wrong, that's all. Why can't even such a small wish be fulfilled?" This situation went on for several years. Obviously, this family's life was not very harmonious; there were frequent arguments. The children were sad and unhappy, and so were their parents. There was no peace or joy in the family, and each person felt only fear, trepidation, and terror, as well as pain and uneasiness deep in their hearts.

A few years later, things finally turned around and the gospel of the Lord Jesus came to her. She felt that her wish might finally come true. "I don't need to rely on my father, my husband, or anyone around me," she thought. "As long as I rely on the Lord Jesus I can be at peace, and have someone to really rely on, and find real peace and happiness, and then life will become less of an ordeal." After accepting the gospel of the Lord Jesus, this woman became much happier, and of course her life became much more settled. Although her husband's attitude toward her hadn't changed, and he was still as harsh as before, ignoring her and showing her no consideration, care or concern, or even patience, gratitude or tolerance, nevertheless, because she had the salvation of the Lord Jesus in her heart, her attitude toward all this changed. She no longer argued or tried to reason with her husband, because she had come to understand that people have nothing to gain from arguing about all these things. Whenever things went awry, she spoke to the Lord Jesus and her heart became much more open. In this way, her family life appeared to become relatively settled. But the good times didn't last long, and her life took another turn. Once she started believing in the Lord Jesus, she preached the gospel with zeal, embraced church life, and supported her brothers and sisters. However, her husband didn't approve. He began to persecute her and often chided her by saying things like: "Do you still want to live with me? If you really don't want to do so, let's split up!" She had no alternative but to just pray to the Lord and put up with it. Although days like this were difficult and painful, the trauma in her heart was much less than before, and she could also draw some comfort from prayer. Whenever she was distressed, she would pray to the Lord. Her heart thus had someone to rely on and gained temporary fulfillment, and she felt that her life was much better.

Gradually, the children grew up. Because the children had lived with her since childhood and their affection for her was somewhat stronger, this woman felt, "Now that my children have grown up, I no longer need to rely on my husband, I can rely on my children." To all appearances, it seemed that she had already come to rely on the Lord Jesus and had put her heart, her family, and even her future and prospects in His hands. But in fact, deep down, she still clung onto this wish for the people she could see and who had a relationship with her, and she hoped that this wish would one day come true. Because people cannot see where the Lord Jesus is, they say that the Lord Jesus is beside them and in their hearts, but she thought that God could not be touched or seen, so this made her feel uneasy. She thought it would be enough to just rely on the Lord Jesus to see her through significant events and major issues, but that in real life she would still have to rely on her children. Throughout all this time her wish had not changed, and she had not let go of it. She now believed in the Lord Jesus, but why had this wish still not changed? There are multiple reasons for this. One is that she didn't understand the truth and didn't know or understand much about God's sovereignty and orchestration; this is the objective reason. The subjective reason is that she was a cowardly person. Although she believed in God, after experiencing so much pain, she still had no clear insight about the significance of believing in God, or about people's destiny, God's orchestration, and the way in which the Creator works. Which things show that she had no clear insight about these things? First of all, she always pinned her own happiness and her deep-seated yearning for a better life onto others, hoping that her wish could be realized because of others' assistance or helping hands. Was this a mistaken view about life and destiny? (Yes.) This view was mistaken. As a parent, is it a mistake to pin your hopes onto your children, by hoping that they will be dutiful to you and able to support you when they grow up? It's not mistaken, and it's not asking too much. So what is the problem here? She constantly wanted to rely on her children, and to live a happy life by relying on her children, and to spend the rest of her life relying on her children, and to enjoy this-and-that by relying on her children. What was her mistaken view in doing this? Why did she have this idea? What was at the source of this view that she held? People always extravagantly hope for a certain way of life and a certain standard of living. That is to say, even before people come to know how God has preordained their lives or what their destiny is, they have already planned what their standard of living must be, which is that they must be happy, and have peace and joy in their lives, and be rich and wealthy, and have people to help them and rely on—people have already planned their own life path, their life goals, their final destination in life, and everything else. Is there any belief in God within all of this? (No.) No, there isn't. This woman always had a view on life: If I rely on so-and-so, my life will become more peaceful, happier, and more affluent; if I rely on so-and-so, my life will become more settled, more secure, and more joyful. Is this viewpoint right or wrong? (It's wrong.) After so many years, she had already reached the stage of believing in the Lord Jesus, but she still hadn't seen clearly what human life is about. She still had her own intentions and plans, and was calculating her future path and planning her future life. Looking at it now, was this attitude toward life and this kind of planning correct or incorrect? (It was incorrect.) Why? (Because she was pursuing her own ideals and wishes, rather than what God requires of people.) What she was pursuing had nothing to do with God's preordination. Even before she knew what God was going to do, she first resolved to find someone to rely on. She would rely on this person at this stage and that person at the next stage. In this way, she lost her reliance on God and came to rely solely on people, rather than on God. Given that she constantly had this wish and these plans, did she have God in her heart? (No.) So, in a way, what was the cause of the pain that came from all her struggles? (It was caused by her wish.) That's absolutely true. So how did her wish come about? (By her not believing in God's sovereignty or in His orchestration and arrangements.) That's right. She didn't understand how people's destiny comes about, nor did she understand how God's sovereignty works. This is the root of the problem.

Let us continue the story. When this woman's children grew up, some got jobs and others settled down and got married, and of course they had to leave their parents and lead independent lives, and couldn't get together with their parents often. So, what was the next problem this woman faced? Her wish to rely on her children seemed to be on the verge of being shattered yet again. It was another painful tragedy, another blow in her experience of life. Due to all sorts of reasons, her children couldn't live by her side and keep her company, or often visit her and take care of her. Therefore, her hope that her children could be by her side to be filial to her and take care of her, and her wish to rely on her children so that she could take things easier, and live a more comfortable and happier life—all this was slipping further and further away from her. Thus, her concern, worry, and longing for her children became more and more intense. Was this not another kind of pain? As she grew older and the years weighed on her little by little, her pain became deeper and deeper, as did her longing for her children. Many years passed, and although the people whom this woman relied on at each stage of her life were different, they all left her at the appointed times, completely shattering her wishes or delusions, and leaving her feeling extremely tormented and anguished deep down. What did this bring to her? Did it cause her to reflect on life? Or to reflect on how the Creator arranges people's destiny? If one takes into account people's normal thinking, after listening to some sermons and having understood some truths, they should know some things about the Creator, about life, and about people's destiny. However, due to various reasons, and because of the problem with the protagonist herself in this story, up to this point she still could not comprehend and didn't have a clue about what she had experienced and encountered at each stage of her life, or what her problem was, and deep in her heart she still longed for someone to rely on. So who exactly should she rely on? It is true that God is the One that people rely on, but God is not just for people to rely on, this is not all He is for. It is more important for people to know how to get along with the Creator, how to know God and submit to Him—it is not just a relationship of relying on and being relied on.

After this woman lost her reliance on her children and by the time she reached old age, she transferred her hopes onto her husband, who became her one last straw to grasp at. She had to rely on him for her basic necessities, and to keep on living. She had to find ways to make her husband live a few more years, so that she could draw some benefit for herself. That was the one she relied on. Having lived for this long, the old woman had a head full of gray hair, a wrinkled face, and almost all of her teeth had fallen out. Although her appearance had changed, what remained the same was that at each stage of her life, she had hit a wall, and despite hitting a wall many times, she had the same constant wish—that of having someone to rely on. Another thing that didn't change was her delusion about God's promises to people, as well as some delusions about herself, humankind, and her destiny and prospects. Although deep down, these delusions were becoming more and more fuzzy and distant, perhaps she still held a glimmer of hope deep within her heart: "If, in my remaining years, I am able to live happily with someone I can rely on, or I can see the day when God's work ends and He is glorified, then this life will not have been in vain." That was the life of this woman. And that's the end of the story. What should the title of this story be? ("Who Do I Rely On?") That's a pretty good and thought-provoking title.

Returning to the topic of our fellowship, what does this story have to do with people's notions about God's work? Which part relates to people's notions about God's work? What notions does it relate to? Share your thoughts. (People feel that God should accomplish things according to their expectations and plans. This is the kind of notion that people have.) Within people's notions, people think that so long as their aspirations are good, positive and proactive, the Creator should grant them, and that they should not be deprived of the right to strive toward a beautiful life. This is a notion. Does the Creator's fulfillment accord with man's wishes, with his hopes, with his imaginings? (It does not.) In what way, then, does the Creator act? Regardless of who you are, and regardless of what you have planned, how perfect and honorable your imaginings are, or to what extent they match the reality of your life, God does not look at any of these things, nor does He pay attention to them; rather, things are accomplished, orchestrated, and arranged according to God's ordained methods and laws. This is God's righteous disposition. Some people think, "After the countless hardships I've experienced in my life, aren't I entitled to a good life? When I come before the Creator, won't I be qualified to request and aspire toward a beautiful life and a beautiful destination?" Is this not a human notion? What are such notions and human-engendered thoughts to God? They are unreasonable demands. How do such unreasonable demands come about? (People do not know God's authority.) This is the objective reason. What is the subjective reason? It is that they have a rebellious disposition, and that they are unwilling to seek the truth or to submit to the Creator's sovereignty or arrangements. Is the life the Creator arranges for the majority of people one of hardship, or is it happy and carefree? (One of hardship.) The majority of people live lives of hardship, with too many difficulties and too much pain. What is the Creator's purpose in arranging hardships for people during their whole life? What is the significance of this? In one sense, such arrangements are meant to allow people to experience and know God's sovereignty, arrangements, and authority; in another sense, His primary purpose is to let people experience what life really is, and thereby to realize that man's destiny is controlled in God's hand, and is neither decided by any person nor changed in the wake of changes in people's subjective will. Whatever the Creator does and whatever sort of life or fate He has arranged for people, He makes them reflect on life and on what man's destiny really is, and, as they reflect on all these things, He makes them come before God. When God expresses the truth and tells people what all this is, He makes people come before Him, accept what God says, experience what God says, understand what the relationship really is between all God says and all the things people experience in their real lives. He lets people verify the practicality, accuracy, and validity of these truths, after which they gain them and acknowledge that man is controlled in the hand of the Creator, and that man's destiny is ruled and arranged by God. Once people have understood all this, they will no longer have any impractical plans for their life, and they will not have plans that go against the wishes of the Creator nor what He has ordained and arranged; rather, they will have an increasingly accurate assessment and understanding, or a comprehension and plan, of how their life should be lived and the road they should take. This is the purpose and significance of the many hardships that the Creator arranges in people's lives.

Returning to the story, after the protagonist experienced many hardships, what was her understanding of why she had suffered hardships and pain in this life, and of why the Creator orchestrated and arranged things this way? Can you see that from the story? Did she gain an understanding of these things? (No.) Why did she not gain it? (Because at every stage of her life, and at every turning point in her life, when her wishes were shattered again and again, she did not reflect or draw a conclusion as to why her lifelong dream could never come true. If she could have reflected and sought the truth, she would have changed. However, she didn't understand the sovereignty of the Creator, and could only resolutely persist with her dream and hope that one day her destiny would suddenly change, which was impossible. During this process, she was constantly resisting and struggling, hence her immense anguish.) That's how it was. Because she chose a wrong path, but she didn't know it. She regarded it as a correct path, as her legitimate pursuit and legitimate wish, and then worked hard, fought, and struggled in that direction. She never doubted whether her wish was realistic or not, nor did she doubt the correctness of it. Instead, she stubbornly pursued this direction, never changing or turning around. What, then, was God's purpose in giving her so much hardship in life? It was not by accident that God did all this. In any person's life, God arranges some exceptional experiences and some painful experiences for them. In fact, the Creator is using this method and these facts to tell you not to go on like this, and that this path leads nowhere, and that it is not the path you should take. What do you see in this, intangibly? This is God choosing a path for people, and it is also God's way of talking to people, and His way of saving people, and of getting people to emerge from their wrong notions and stubborn ways. This is also God's way of telling you: The path you chose is a quagmire, a pit of fire, a road of no return, and you must not walk down it. If you keep on going this way, you will continue to suffer. This is not the correct path in life, it is not the path you should take, and it is not the path that God has preordained for you. If you are a smart person, then after experiencing hardship, you will reflect: "Why did I experience such hardship? Why did I hit a wall? Is this path not suitable for me? So, what path should I walk and what direction should I take in life?" While you are reflecting, God will give you some inspiration and guidance, or point out the right direction in which you should take your next step. God is constantly guiding you, so that you can more practically and accurately grasp the path ahead which He has planned for you in real life. Did the protagonist in the story I just told you do this? (No, she never reflected.) What kind of disposition did she have? (Intransigence.) Intransigence—this is so troublesome. From when she was a child to when she was a gray-haired old woman, her wish of having someone to rely on never changed. Whether before she had heard God's gospel and gained insights into how the Creator created the heavens and earth and all things, or when God's gospel came to her and God told her the truth of all this, her wish never changed from start to finish—this is the most lamentable aspect. People have thoughts and ideas. What was God's purpose in creating all this for people? It was for people to perceive and comprehend the people, events, things, and environments that God arranges for them. As a normal person possessed of reason and conscience, every created human being will understand the Creator's intention more or less and to a varying degree of depth when they experience and appreciate with their heart all these things that God has orchestrated. This is one way in which God works that is particularly practical and real. But because people are too arrogant and intransigent, and cannot easily accept the truth, it is difficult for them to grasp the Creator's will. How is people's intransigence manifested? No matter what God says or does, people still cling onto their own things. Their mentality is: "I want to plan my life. I have ideas, I have a brain, I'm educated, and I can be in control of my life. I can see the source of everything in my life, and I can completely orchestrate all of this, so I can plan my own happiness, my own future, and my own prospects." When they hit a wall, they say, "I failed this time, I'll try again next time." They believe that this is how people should live, and that if a person doesn't have a competitive spirit, they will be extremely useless and feeble in life. What is at the root of their persistence? What's the reason for it? It is because they believe that they must absolutely be a strong person rather than a weak person, and that they must not be beaten down by life, much less be looked down upon by others, and that people should be independent and competitive, and possessed of resolve, and be held in high esteem by others. These dispositions, these ideas, and these thoughts dominate their behavior, so that each time they face the difficulties, predicaments, or pain that God orchestrates for them, they choose the same way as before: that of persisting with their own thoughts, not turning around, and absolutely persisting to the end with whatever they think is good, right, and beneficial for themselves, and being a competitive person. It is precisely this intransigent disposition that leads them to make many ignorant and impractical judgments, and gives rise to many impractical understandings and experiences.

I talked just now about one aspect of people's dispositions—intransigence. Because of people's intransigence, when they face the painful circumstances and predicaments that the Creator puts them in, their attitude is not to submit, but rather, to hold fast to whatever benefits them and to not abandon it. How does God deal with such behavior? God's work is independent of people's will, so how does God deal with people's actions like this? God will definitely not say, "You failed this time, so you are doomed. People like you are no good and I don't want you anymore." God has not given up on people. He keeps using the same way, arranging different environments and different people, events, and things, so that people can experience the same pain and face the same predicaments. What is the purpose of this? (It makes people come to their senses.) It makes people reflect, come to their senses, and abandon their stubborn views. Time and time again, God uses His own unique methods to converse with humans in this way, and to interact with humans in this way. Ultimately, what is the result that God wants to achieve through this method of working? God guides people by making them go through different predicaments, anguish, and even illnesses and family misfortunes throughout their lives. The purpose of making people experience this suffering is to get them to constantly reflect and understand in their soul, and to verify deep down: "Is this God's arrangement? How should I walk my future path? Should I change direction? Should I seek the way of truth? Should I change the way I live?" God makes people experience all kinds of pain, tribulations, misfortunes, and predicaments, so that afterward they receive confirmation deep in their hearts that there is a Sovereign who rules over people's destiny, and that people cannot be willful, arrogant, or stubborn, but must learn to submit—submit to environments, submit to destiny, and submit to everything that happens around them. Before you hear God's clear words, God uses these ways and facts to make you experience all sorts of environments, people, events, and things, and to make you constantly confirm deep in your heart that people's destiny is arranged by

God, that no person holds sovereignty over it, and that people cannot hold sovereignty over their own destiny. You constantly have this kind of understanding or voice deep in your heart, and you constantly confirm that everything you experience is not caused by any one person, nor does it happen by chance, nor is it caused by objective reasons or circumstances, but it is God who invisibly holds sovereignty over everything. It is not by coincidence that a person meets another person and something happens, or that they encounter an environment that changes their life. It is not by coincidence that a person is afflicted by disease and afterward obtains great blessings. This is God telling each person in this unique way: God holds sovereignty over people's destiny, God is watching over and guiding people every day, and guiding everyone through each day and throughout their life. In addition to letting people know that He holds sovereignty over the destiny of humankind, over everything to do with people's lives, over the destination of humankind, and over absolutely everything to do with humankind, what else does God want to accomplish? It is to make some impractical notions, imaginings, and demands that people have toward God the Creator gradually fade, disappear, and be cast off, and then for people to gradually reach the point where they can clearly recognize and understand the ways in which the Creator guides humankind and the ways in which the Creator arranges the destiny of people's whole life. From these things, people can then see that God has a disposition and that God is vivid and lifelike. He is not a clay statue, nor a robot, nor is He an inanimate creature imagined by people, but rather, He has life and dispositions. In one sense, this makes people understand the ways in which the Creator works and makes people let go of all sorts of notions, imaginings, and some empty reasoning and logic that do not conform to reality. In short, it makes people let go of all empty notions and imaginings regarding God's work. In another sense, once they let go of these notions and imaginings, people can accept and submit to God's work and His sovereignty. This is a small result in one sense, but in another sense there is a result that you have not seen, and it is the one that is the biggest and the most profound. What is this result? It is that God uses these ways to tell people that everything He does and accomplishes on people, He does in a particularly practical and real state. Once people understand this, they will cast off some empty and illusory things, actually obey and submit to the Creator's arrangements, and then actually face everything arranged by the Creator in real life, instead of using some empty theories or religious concepts or theological knowledge to imagine the Creator, or to deal with some things in life. This is the outcome that God wants to see, and what He wants to achieve in people. Therefore, in the first stage, before you hear the Creator's voice and understand the Creator's clear words about various truths, the way God works on people is to arrange various environments for you to experience and be exposed to. When you have some confirmation, and when you have some feelings about these things deep in your heart, and are moved by them and comprehend them, God will tell you in clear words what life is about, what God is about, how humans came to be, and what kind of path people should take. In this way, based on the belief that humans come from God and were created by God, and the belief that there is a Sovereign among the heavens and earth and all things, people then take the path of faith in God, and subsequently come to accept God's judgment and chastisement, and accept God's salvation and perfection—the effectiveness of this is even better. Now, who are all the people who accept God's work of the last days? At the very least, they acknowledge the existence of God and believe that the entire universe world is subject to God's sovereignty. They also believe in destiny and that human life is preordained by God, and furthermore, they believe in the existence of the spiritual world and the existence of heaven and hell, and that people's destiny is predetermined. From among these people, God has selected His chosen people, who love the truth and who can accept the truth. They can understand God's voice and accept God's work. This is one way and one principle by which God works.

We talked just now about how God works on people, and about the ways in which God works. We touched on these things alone, without saying anything about what people's notions are or what demands people place on God. Let's fellowship now on the issues in this regard. Since we mentioned in this fellowship that people have some empty and vague ideas and understandings about God's work, let's find some examples to prove this, and talk a little bit about both positive and negative examples. On this foundation, won't people then be able to understand which imaginings are fairly hollow and quite vague, and are notions about God's work? Starting with the story I told you earlier, the protagonist of the story went through a number of painful experiences in life. After each painful experience, God continued, using His own methods, to arrange and orchestrate her destiny and guide her on the road ahead. Although she didn't understand, didn't know, and didn't reflect, God still did this, just as He had always done. At this stage, did she display some thoughts about this way in which the Creator works? Could those thoughts be said to be a sort of notion? What exactly are these thoughts and this kind of notion? First of all, in terms of the protagonist herself, she had one wish. She didn't expect to be rich or wealthy in life, she only wanted someone to rely on. Through dissection and analysis, we can see that this wish was wrong. In one sense, it was contrary to the destiny that God orchestrates and arranges for people, and in another sense, it wasn't practical either. So has God provided a definition or a statement about this wish of hers? According to people's imaginings, it would be very easy for God to make a person understand a little bit of doctrine, wouldn't it? If He wanted to make them understand, wouldn't they just understand? This woman had a desire to have someone to rely on—God could make her not have that desire, or make her change that desire—did God do that? (No.) No, God didn't do that. Was her desire a sort of notion? Was it supernatural? Was it hollow? It is a natural phenomenon for such thoughts to arise in people. Why do I say that it's a natural phenomenon? God made man with free will. Man has a brain, thoughts, and ideas. After being corrupted by Satan, man became immersed in the sounds and sights of the world, and, after being educated by parents, conditioned by families, and educated by society, many things arise in man's thoughts things that are born of man's heart, which all come forth naturally. How are these things that come forth naturally within man formed? Firstly, a person must have the ability to give thought to problems—this is the foundation one must have to be able to give rise to these things. Then, through environmental conditioning—such as being educated by one's family and society—as well as being impelled by one's own corrupt dispositions and ambitions and desires, these thoughts gradually take shape. When it comes to such formed thoughts and ideas, regardless of whether they accord with reality or are hollow, or however else they may be, we will not pass a verdict on them now. Instead, we will just speak about how God handles thoughts of this kind. Does God condemn them? God does not condemn them. So how does He approach them? He does not remove such thoughts from people. People harbor a notion and imagining, they think that with a gentle touch of God's great, formless hand, their thinking will be changed. Is this notion not vague, supernatural, and hollow? (It is.) This is a notion people have of how God works. In the depths of their hearts, people often have fantasies of God's work and the methods of His work, though they do not give voice to them. People imagine the Creator coming softly next to man and, with a wave of His great hand and a puff of breath or with the rotation of a thought, the negative things inside man will disappear in an instant, with the wordless silence of a great wind blowing away a cloud. How does God treat these ideas of man, these things to which man's mind gives rise? God does not resolve them with supernatural, hollow methods, but by laying out man's environment. What sort of environment does He lay out? It is not hollow—God does not do anything supernatural, breaking all the laws. Rather, He lays out an environment that compels a person to understand the matter and to reflect unceasingly, after which God makes use of all manner of people, events, and things to light that person's way, whereupon that person comes to an understanding. God does not change their destiny; He just adds a few incidents to the course of their destiny, thereby enabling them to understand these things. Man's notions are all supernatural, hollow, vague, discordant with reality—they are divorced from reality. Say, for instance, someone is hungry and would like to eat. There are those who would say, "God is omnipotent, all He'd have to do would be to breathe on me and I'd be full. Do I really need to cook? It would be great if God could perform a little miracle so that I didn't feel hungry." Is this not unrealistic? (It is.) If you told God you were hungry, what would God say? God would tell you to find some food and cook it. If you said you had no food and could not cook, what would God do? He would tell you to learn to cook. This is the practical side of God's work. When you encounter something obscure to you, and you no longer give hollow prayers or rely vaguely on God in a self-assured way, or consign your hopes upon these notions and imaginings you have about God, you will then know what it is you should do—you will know your duty, your responsibility, and your obligation.

I just talked about one aspect, which is that when people don't understand the environments that God lays out, what does God do? God continues to lay out environments.

He does this so that people keep on understanding the Creator's sovereignty, and understanding what their destiny is through the experience of life, and so that people know deep down that their wishes are distinct from their destiny, and distinct from the Creator's arrangements. He does it so that people will then learn to gradually let go of their own wishes and submit to everything the Creator orchestrates. This is fairly easy to understand. Another aspect is that when God's clear words come to people, they form some more notions and imaginings. What notions? "God's words are the bread of life and the truth. God's words are God Himself. When I hear God's words, no matter how stupid I am, I immediately become intelligent. As long as I read more of God's words, my caliber will improve and my skills will increase." What are these thoughts that people have? They are their notions. So, is this how God works? (No.) Since these are man's notions, they are definitely at odds with God's work and in opposition with it. Herein lies a fact. God speaks with man face-to-face and tells him what he should and should not do, what road he should take, how he should obey God, and the principles he should enter into within the various aspects of the work. God clearly tells man all these things, yet man often still waits and anticipates that God will tell him what His intention really is by means other than His words, hoping to be able to attain previously unimaginable results and hoping to witness miracles. Is this not man's notion? (It is.) What does God do, in fact? (God lays out practical environments for people to go through and experience God's words.) What does God do if people still don't understand His will after He lays out those practical environments for them? (He enlightens and guides people.) What should you do if He doesn't enlighten and guide you? (Practice according to God's words and do as God says.) That's right. From the time that God began His work until the present, how many words has God spoken to people face-to-face? There are so many that even if you spent several years reading them, you still wouldn't get to the end. But how many words do people gain? If a person gains too few of them, what does that prove? It proves that the person has not put enough effort into God's words and has not listened to them. There are some who say, "I listened"—but did you take God's words in? Did you understand them? Did you focus on them? You didn't focus on them, so God's words have already flowed right past you. Therefore, when God uses clear language to tell man how to act, how to live, how to obey Him, and how to experience every event, if man still does not understand, God does nothing more beside laying out environments for him, giving man some special enlightenment, or having man undergo some special experiences. That is the end of what God can, should, and is willing to do. There are those who ask, "Doesn't God want every person to be saved and not want anyone to suffer perdition? If God used such a method to act, how many people would be able to be saved?" In response, God would ask, "How many people heed My words and follow My way?" There are as many as there are—this is God's view and the method of His work. God does no more. What is man's notion of this matter? "God takes pity on this mankind, He's concerned for this mankind, so He's got to take responsibility unto the end. If man follows Him unto the end, he'll inevitably be saved." Is this notion right or wrong? Does it accord with God's will? In the Age of Grace, it was normal for people to have these notions, because they did not know God. In the last days, God has told people all these truths, and God has also made clear to them the principles of His work of saving people, so it is very preposterous if people still have these notions in their hearts. God has told you all these truths, so if, in the end, you still say that you don't understand God's will and don't know how to practice, and you still say such rebellious and treacherous words, can such a person be saved by God? There are some who always think, "God does such great work, He should gain more than half of the people in the world, and use a great force of many people with lots of high-class personages to bear witness to God's glorification. How wonderful that would be!" This is man's notion. In the Bible, in both the Old and New Testaments, how many were there, in total, who were saved and made perfect? Who was able to fear God and shun evil in the end? (Job and Peter.) They were the only two. As God sees it, to fear Him and shun evil is, in fact, to meet the standard of knowing Him, of knowing the Creator. People like Abraham and Noah were righteous in God's eyes, but they were still a level beneath Job and Peter. Of course, God did not do so much work then. He did not provide for people as He does now, nor did He speak so many clear words, nor did He do the work of salvation on such a large scale. He may not have gained many people, but this is still within His preordination. What aspect of the Creator's disposition can be seen in this? God hopes to gain many people, but if many people cannot, in fact, be gained—if this humanity cannot be gained by God while He does His work of salvation—then God would rather abandon them and discard them. This is the inner voice and view of the Creator. In this regard, what demands or notions does man have of God? "Since You wish to save me, You must be responsible unto the end, and You promised me blessings, so You must give them to me and let me gain them." Within man, there is many a "must"—many demands—and this is one of his notions. Others say, "God does such great work—a sixthousand-year management plan—if, in the end, He only gains two people, that would be such a shame. Wouldn't His actions be in vain then?" Man thinks it ought not to be so, but God is happy to gain even two people. God's real purpose is not merely to gain those two, but to gain more than that, but if people do not wake up and understand, and they all misunderstand and resist God, and are all hopeless and worthless, then God would rather not have them. That is God's disposition. Some people say, "That won't do. Wouldn't Satan be laughing then?" Satan may be laughing, but is it not God's vanquished enemy all the same? God has still gained mankind—several among them who can forsake Satan and not suffer its control. God has gained true created beings. Are those who have not been gained by God then taken captive by Satan? You have not been made perfect—are you capable of following Satan? (No.) Some people say: "Even if God doesn't want me, I still won't follow Satan. Even if it offered me blessings, I wouldn't take them." None of those whom God has not gained follow Satan—does God not thus gain glory? People have a notion about the number of people God gains or the scale with which He gains them; they believe God should not gain only those few. That man can give rise to such a notion is because, in one regard, man cannot fathom the mind of God and cannot understand what sort of person He wants to gain—there is always a distance between man and God; in another regard, to have such a notion is a way for man to comfort himself and set himself free so far as his own destiny and future are concerned. Man believes, "God has gained so few people—how glorious it would be for Him to gain us all! If God didn't discard a single person, but conquered everyone, and everyone was made perfect in the end, and the talk of God's choosing and saving people didn't come to naught, nor did His work of management, then wouldn't Satan be humiliated all the more? Wouldn't God gain greater glory?" That he can say this is partly because he does not know the Creator and partly because he has his own selfish motive: He is worried about his future, so he hitches it to the Creator's glory, and thus his heart feels at ease, thinking that he can have his cake and eat it too. In addition, he also feels that "God gaining people and humiliating Satan is strong evidence of Satan's defeat. It's killing three birds with one stone!" People are really good at working out how to benefit themselves. This notion is quite clever, isn't it? People have selfish motives, and is there not something of rebelliousness in these motives? Is there not a demand made of God? There is within it an unvoiced resistance against God that says, "You have chosen us, led us, labored so much on us, bestowed Your life and Your entirety upon us, bestowed Your words and truth upon us, and had us follow You all these years. What a loss it would be if You couldn't gain us in the end." Such an excuse is an attempt to blackmail God, to obligate Him to gain them. It's saying that if God doesn't gain them, then they won't be losing out, and that it's God who will suffer a loss—is this statement correct? Within this, there are both man's demands, and his imaginings and notions: God does such great work, so He must gain however many people. Where does this "must" come from? It comes from man's notions and imaginings, his unreasonable demands, and his vanity, along with some admixture of his intransigent and ferocious disposition.

Such notions of man must be fellowshiped on from another perspective. There are some who think, "Since the Creator doesn't care how many people He gains, and thinks that He will just gain as many people as He gains, since this is the Creator's attitude, how should we cooperate with Him? Is it okay to just believe casually and not take it so seriously? In any case, God doesn't take it seriously either, so we don't need to be so serious in catering to God's requirements, nor do we need to regard it as our primary occupation, or as our lifelong pursuit. Now that we know God's thoughts, shouldn't we change our way of living?" Is this view right or wrong? (It's wrong.) Since God's attitude has been made clear to people, and they understand it, they should let go of their notions. After letting go of their notions, what should people do and how should they choose, and how should they understand and deal with this matter so that they have the view and attitude that they ought most to hold? First of all, in terms of their views, people should try to ponder over them. Once one believes in God, they have a vague imagining of reverence and esteem for Him. They think that "God is almighty, omnipotent, and, since He has chosen a group of people from among this corrupt humanity, He will certainly be able to make them complete. We, therefore, are bound to be blessed, as a matter of certainty." Does such "certainty" not have a mentality of trying one's luck behind it? To wish to gain blessings and God's approval without pursuing the truth or undergoing God's judgment and chastisement is the attitude man ought least to hold. Do not adopt a mentality of trying your luck—luck is the great enemy. What sort of mindset is trying one's luck? Which of your states, thoughts, ideas, attitudes, notions, and views have a mentality of trying your luck behind them? Can you detect this? If you do detect this and see the existence of a mindset of trying your luck to gain blessings, how should you go about changing it? How should you resolve it? These are practical issues. You must see through the mentality of trying your luck. You must resolve it. If you don't resolve it, it will be likely to trip you up and you will suffer. So, what things involve a mentality of trying one's luck? There are some who think, "I believe in God and have even left my family and guit my job. No matter what, even if I haven't rendered a meritorious service, I've worked hard, and even if I haven't worked hard, I've tired myself out, so as long as I follow God to the end, I might become one of the overcomers, one of the saved, one of the blessed, one of the people of God's kingdom." This is a mentality of trying one's luck. Doesn't everyone have this mentality? At the very least, the majority of those who leave everything behind to follow God and perform their duties full-time have this sort of mentality. Is a mentality of trying one's luck not a sort of notion? (It is.) Why do I say it is a sort of notion? Because, when you have not understood or comprehended the intention and the attitude the Lord of creation has toward this matter, you just subjectively expect a good outcome and subjectively pursue, and that is how you approach it. It is a sort of notion. To the Lord of creation, is such a notion not a kind of blackmail? Is it not an unreasonable demand? It is as if to say, "Since I've followed You, and since I've left everything behind and come to God's house to perform my duty full-time, I must count as someone who has submitted to the arrangements of the Lord of creation, right? So, can I have a promising future now? My future shouldn't be obscure—it should be plain to see." This is a mindset of trying one's luck. How is such a mindset resolved? One must know God's disposition. Now that I have fellowshiped like this, everyone should fundamentally understand this: "So that's what God thinks. That's God's view and His attitude. So, what should we do?" People should put aside their mentality of trying their luck. To put aside this mentality, is it enough to say, "I've put it aside and won't have such thoughts anymore. I'll treat my duty seriously, take responsibility, and work harder"? It is not so simple—when one develops a mentality of trying their luck, there emerge in them some thoughts and practices, and, more than that, some dispositions will be revealed. These things should be resolved by seeking the truth. Some say, "If I've understood God's will and attitude, aren't I rid of the mentality of trying my luck?" What sort of talk is that? It is lacking spiritual understanding; it is hollow talk. How, then, is this problem resolved? You must consider, "What should I do if God takes everything away from me? Is everything I devote to God and expend for Him given willingly, or are they attempts to barter with Him? If I have an intention to barter with Him, then that's not good. I'll have to pray to God and seek the truth to resolve that." In addition, as you practice and as you perform your duty, you should understand which truth principles you do not understand, what you do that goes against God's requirements and His will, what sort of path is the wrong one and the path of disaster, and what sort of path is the one that can meet with God's approval. What other things involve a mindset of trying one's luck? There are people who, having come down with a serious illness, are saved by God and are ill no longer. They think, "All of you believe in God to chase after blessings. I'm different. It was God's great love that brought me here; He gave me special circumstances and special experiences that led me to believe in Him, so He loves me more than He loves you, He treats me with particular grace and, in the end, I will have a greater chance to survive than you." They think they have an extraordinary, special relationship with God—that their relationship with Him is different from those of ordinary people. Because of their special experience, they feel themselves to be extraordinary and uncommon, and they therefore maintain a kind of certainty that they will succeed. They define themselves as assuredly different from others, and are assured of their ability to survive—this, too, is a mentality of trying one's luck. There are others who have taken on some important work and whose status is high. They suffer a bit more than others, are pruned and dealt with a bit more than others, keep themselves a bit busier than others, and speak a bit more than others. They think, "I've been put in an important position by God and by His house and I am in favor with my brothers and sisters. What an honor this is. Doesn't this mean I'll be blessed before others?" This, too, is a mentality of trying one's luck, and it is a kind of notion.

I have just talked about some practical manifestations and states of trying one's luck. What other states, manifestations, or things that often arise and habitually exist in people's minds belong to trying one's luck? Besides those who have special experiences, high status, and who have left everything behind to expend themselves for God full-time, there are also those who are qualified, perform some special duties, and have some special talents—these people all have a mindset of trying their luck. What does "qualified" refer to? For example, some who preach the gospel believe that if they win over 10 people, they will have borne 10 fruits and have a 10 percent chance of being blessed, and that if they bear 50 fruits they will have a 50 percent chance, and if they bear 100 fruits then they will have a 100 percent chance. This is a sort of notion, a kind of bartering, and above all, it is trying one's luck. If they can measure God's work while holding onto these notions and this mentality of trying their luck, is this believing in God? What path are they taking? Is there not something wrong with their pursuit? Why do these things arise in them? Why do they hold onto them and refuse to let go? Some say that it is because they don't know God. Is this right? This is empty talk. So what exactly is the reason? The people who always hold onto such views and attitudes, and who have these notions and are particularly stubborn in clinging onto them—are they seriously putting effort into God's words? (No.) They always have a perfunctory attitude toward God's words, that is, the attitude and view of someone who is looking through a haze. They think that in their belief in God, they only need to know how much they have suffered for God and how much of a price they have paid, how much merit they have earned, what special talents they have, how skilled they are, how high their status is, what kind of "moments of companionship in adversity" they have experienced with God, what special experiences they have had, and what special things God has given them, or what grace and blessings He has given to them that are different from what has been given to other people—they think this is enough. No matter how tightly they cling onto these views, they have never reflected on whether these views of theirs are correct, or which of God's words and which principles of His work these views conflict with, or whether these views have been validated by God, or whether God works this way, or accomplishes things this way. They have never cared about these issues. Up until now, they have only pondered, ruminated, and dreamed in their own minds. So what has the truth become to them? It has become a decoration. Although these people believe in God, their belief has nothing to do with God or with the truth. So what does their belief have to do with? It has only to do with notions, imaginings, and their own desires, as well as their future blessings and destinations. They haven't put effort into the truth, so they end up with these results.

Through today's fellowship, now that you have gained some understanding of God's way of working or God's views and attitude, can this have some effect and achieve some results when it comes to your pursuit of knowing God, your pursuit of the truth, and your pursuit of life entry? Can it turn your wrong views around, so that you let go of your own notions? (Yes.) What does this require people to do? (To let go of their notions and act according to the standards required by God.) You must understand that since God has made such requirements and determinations, He will definitely bring them to pass. In the end, the fact is that God's words will not come to naught—they will all be accomplished and fulfilled. If you think that God may not necessarily carry out the things He talks of, this is man's notion and imagining, and it is also doubting and judging God. There are some who say, "How could God do that? How could He be content with just saving as many people as He saves? Is God's love not great and infinite? God's patience is infinite, and God's tolerance and mercy are also infinite." They make all kinds of excuses for not pursuing the truth, they leave themselves a convenient way out so that they can tread their own path, and they ignore God's words and work, and the appearance of the Creator. They know full well in their hearts that it is the truth, and yet they hope that it were not so. There is an element of disbelief in what they do, as well as an element of competing against the Creator, and conflicting with and blackmailing the Creator. What is the purpose of Me saying these words? There are some who say, "This is to give us a wake-up call, to frighten us, or to make us understand that those who wish to back away can just back away, that those who become weak or negative can just stay weak or negative, and that those who wish to live their own lives can just live their own lives. God's work won't take very long, and besides, God doesn't need that many people, so let's just go our separate ways!" Is this how things are? (No.) No matter what God says, or how He says it, what God makes people understand is His will and what He makes them comprehend is the truth. So what path should people follow? They should follow God's way. What should people reflect on and seek to resolve? All notions, imaginings and demands that are antagonistic toward God. These things are all contrary to the truth. You must give up these things, you must dispel these things from your heart, and you must no longer be affected or controlled by them. You must be able to truly come before God and accept the judgment, chastisement, pruning, and dealing of God's words, you must be cleansed of your corrupt dispositions, and achieve submission to God's orchestration and arrangements. In addition, you must constantly reflect on the things in yourself that are incompatible with God and contrary to the truth, and reflect on your corrupt dispositions, your incorrect views on various matters, and man's different notions and imaginings. Once you reflect on and understand these things clearly, and seek the truth to resolve them once and for all, you will have embarked upon the right track of faith in God, and only then will you be able to obey God and submit to His orchestration and arrangements.

We haven't yet finished dissecting the final part of the story "Who Do I Rely On?" that we just talked about. Once a person starts believing in God, they come before God to pray, seek God's will, accept God's enlightenment and illumination, accept God's guidance, and listen to every word uttered from God's own mouth. During this period, God uses clear words to tell people His will and everything they need to understand. God does not want you to understand doctrines and words, nor does He want you to learn theology. God does not use these words in order to educate you to be a wellbehaved person, or a good person, or someone with aspirations and ambitions—God does not want you to be such a person. God wants to use His words to make you understand where people come from, how they should live, and what kind of way they should follow. However, after hearing these words, people think nothing of them, and still hold fast to their own views, and to their own wishes, and even hold fast to their own principles of comportment. For example, some people say: "I was born wanting to be a good person, and I don't think I'm too far away from being a good person. I don't do any bad things, I don't harm or cheat people or take advantage of them, and I've become an even better person since I started believing in God. I always tell the truth, I deal with others in a genuine manner, and I obey God and the church's arrangements when performing my duty—is that not enough?" Do many people have this kind of thinking? Can believers actually meet God's requirements by relying on this way of thinking? There are many truths that God requires people to understand, and many lessons to be learned. In particular, truths regarding visions are truths that those who believe in God must possess and things that lay a foundation. If they do not even understand these truths, can they achieve salvation? If they only rely on imaginings and feel good about themselves, and do not pursue the truth, are they still qualified to accept God's judgment and chastisement or His trials and refinement? Can they obtain God's cleansing and be made perfect by Him? (No.) They surely cannot. The number of people in the church who do not pursue the truth may be more than half, or even more. When you consider this situation, would you think like this: "God has said so much, but people still don't understand, so why doesn't God enlighten these ignorant and foolish people? Why doesn't God say something more, do some more work, and put more effort into them? Why doesn't the Holy Spirit move them and discipline them so that these ignorant people are no longer ignorant, and the foolish people are no longer foolish? Why doesn't God do this?" This is wrong. Has God not said enough? Many people say that God says too much, that He speaks in too much detail, and even that He is too repetitive. So, does anyone know why God must speak this way? It's because people are too intransigent and rebellious, never accepting God's words and not putting effort into the truth—God won't force this kind of people. If people don't accept God's words, how does God treat them? God never does anything by force, this is the way He works. God has already said so many words that people can't even read them all, so how can He force people? Why don't people understand God's painstaking intentions? The protagonist in the story, who experienced a lifetime of pain, also read God's words and listened to His sermons, and even spent all her time performing her duty in the church, but in the end, she didn't understand who exactly she could rely on, or how her wish came about and whether it could come true or not—there must be a problem in that case. In fact, from God's point of view this is a very simple problem. You just need to change direction and move toward the direction God has given you and the path God has told you, and believe, accept, submit, and practice in a steadfast manner, without any doubts or misgivings. But people cannot do it. They hold on tightly to their own notions, imaginings and hopes, and the delusions concealed within their hearts. They even regard these things as their last straw to clutch at, or even worse, as the foundation on which they rely for their existence, putting aside God's words and the direction God has given them and ignoring them. So how does God deal with this? If you do not recognize and accept the good things given to you, God takes them away. What has a person gained once these things are taken away? Nothing. Therefore, deep in her heart, this protagonist no longer knew the answers to the questions, "Is God really the One I can rely on? Who can I actually rely on? Who can I rely on to survive, to gain blessings, and to gain my future destination?" She had already become increasingly confused about these questions. In the end, what was the regret that remained deep in her heart? That she had no one to rely on, no one to trust. How tragic and miserable her life was! She was confused about what the significance of the Creator's arrangements for people in this life is, she didn't know. After she had gone through life this way, and had reached old age and still could not understand it all, or come to an accurate conclusion, or come up with an accurate direction and goal in life—when she could not gain any of this, what did God do about it? He drew a line under this person's life. God had already done all that could have been done. God had arranged environments, enlightened and guided her, and even given her the motivation to carry on living when she was most in pain or when she faced desperate situations. God had enabled her to live to this point with the utmost love and support. And for what purpose? To make her turn herself around. What is the purpose of turning oneself around? To understand that there is no one you can rely on, and that you mustn't rely on anyone, and that you mustn't try to create a happy life on your own, and that you mustn't give rise to any wishes, and that, except for the Creator, no one can orchestrate or wield control over your destiny, not even yourself. What is the choice that you should make? Come before the Creator without any words of complaints or prerequisites, listen to what He says, and follow His way. Whether it be pain or illness, this is all part of human life that must be experienced. When a line is about to be drawn under a person's life and they don't understand all of this, what else does God do? He no longer does anything, which also signifies that God has given up on them. Why does God no longer do anything? Because the person has always lived in their own notions, and lived in their own desires and persistence, and they have treated everything God has orchestrated with an intransigent, stubborn attitude, and a self-righteous, competitive attitude. Therefore, when a person's life is about to end and they have passed step by step through these environments or processes that God has laid down, but their knowledge of the Creator has not changed at all, and they have no understanding whatsoever of the destiny of human life, then it is self-evident what their life amounts to, and the Creator will no longer interfere or do anything. This is the way in which God works.

When some people see God casting out others, notions arise in them and they say: "This person has experienced so much pain in their life, doesn't the Creator take pity on them?" What does taking pity represent? (The giving of grace.) Can the giving of grace determine the person's destiny? Can it change their destiny? Can it change their views? (No.) Therefore, no matter how many blessings, graces, and material pleasures the Creator bestows on a person, if these things cannot induce or help that person to understand God's will, or to take the right path in life, and ultimately to take the path that God points out to people, and to understand what all the things that people experience in their life are, then all the work God has done on them will be in vain, and clearly a line will be drawn under the period of life in which that person believed in God. What notions tend to arise in people? "God is tolerant and patient, and His love is powerful and vast. Why can't He love such a person?" How is God's love manifested? Does God truly love that person or not? Has God's love produced any results in that person? When there are no results, how is God's love manifested? How is God's disposition manifested? How does God go about His work? In fact, before God does anything, He has already chosen that person, worked on them, and put thought into preordaining their whole life and orchestrating it according to His way. God's will is behind all of this. Is this not God's love? (Yes.) This already is God's love. As that person goes through each process in their life, God shows them mercy and care, protects them, gives them motivation, and lays down some environments, constantly protecting them in completing their mission in this life. During this process, no matter how persistent, stubborn, arrogant, or intransigent they are, God continually helps them to smoothly pass through their life according to God's way, with the Creator's love and magnanimity, and God's responsibility. No matter how many perils and temptations they encounter in their life, or even how many times they feel desperate and want to commit suicide, God guides them through this life according to His way. Without God's guidance, their life would surely not pass smoothly, because they would be beset by all kinds of enticement, temptation, or peril. So, this is all God's love. In their notions, people think that God's love should be free of such pain, tribulations, and such things that are contrary to their feelings. In fact, God is constantly bestowing mercy, grace, and blessings on people in a loving and tolerant way. In the end, He also expresses the truth with great patience and love, so that people understand the truth and gain life. He uses various methods to achieve results, guiding people step by step so that they understand human life and know how to live meaningfully. What is God's purpose in doing His work this way? Speaking on a shallower level, His purpose is for people to be able to cast off all the pain that befalls them in life, as well as all the pain that they themselves cause; on a more profound level, God's purpose is to make people live happily, to live out life as normal people, real people, and to live under the Creator's guidance. However, everyone has freedom. God created free will and the faculty of thought for people. Later, people accepted many things from this world and this society, such as knowledge, traditional culture, social trends, family education, and so on. God has always loathed these things that come from Satan, and exposes them so that people know the absurdity and hypocrisy of these things, and their complete incompatibility with the truth. However, God never isolates people or keeps them away from these satanic things. Instead, He lets people experience them and discern them for what they are, and therein gain correct experiences of life and correct understanding. When the whole process is over and God has done all that He ought to do, people gain as much as they are able to gain. So in this final stage, what notions arise in people? That God has abandoned someone, which makes people feel that God is inconsiderate of their feelings. At which point, people feel that the modicum of warm hope which that person was able to place in God has been shattered, and people feel that this is somewhat cruel. When people feel this sense of cruelty, their notions are also exposed. You want to be a good person and help that person to be saved. Is this useful? That person has believed in God for so many years without pursuing the truth at all and has gained nothing. You want to pity them and help them, but can you supply them with the truth? Can you bestow life on them? You simply cannot do that, so why do you have notions about God? The work that God does is fair and reasonable to everyone. If they personally do not accept the truth and do not submit to God's work, how can you blame God for not saving them? There are certainly quite a few notions of people here. People harbor so many notions about God's work, such as: "Since God has done so much, why does He not fully accomplish this last stage? This doesn't seem to be what God wants to do, nor should it be done by God. Since God has done such great work, He should let all those who believe in Him be saved. Only such an achievement would be the perfect result of God's work. Why did God cast out this person? This contradicts God's love and mercy for people, and people are likely to misunderstand it! Why would God do things this way? Isn't it slightly inconsiderate of people's feelings?" This is just the way God's righteous disposition is. This is the righteous disposition of God. Just experience it and one day you will understand.

What we just talked about just now relates to some of people's notions and imaginings about God's work. Some of them are people's imaginings, and some are people's demands on God, that is to say, people think that God should do this and God should do that. When God's work does not conform to your notions and conflicts with your demands or imaginings, you will feel upset and sad, and think that "You are not my God, my God would not be like You are." If God is not your God, then who is your God? When these things are not resolved, people often live within these states and notions, and in their minds they often adopt these notions and demands to measure God's work, to judge whether they are doing things right or wrong, and to judge the correctness of the path they are taking—this will lead to trouble. You are following a path that has nothing to do with God's requirements, so even if you apparently follow God and apparently listen to His sermons and His words, will the final result be to attain salvation? No. Therefore, in order to attain salvation through believing in God, it is not the case that by accepting God's work and entering into church life, you are certain to be one person within God's management work, and one of those whom God will save and perfect, and that this means you have already been saved, or that you are sure to be saved. This is not the case. This is just human notions and imaginings, and human reasoning and judgment.

You summarize—what are the human notions involved in this story I just told you? Once you've summarized them, just read them out. (God, we have summarized four notions: Firstly, people feel that if they have a wish and pursuits that are reasonable and that do not go too far, God should fulfill them. Secondly, people feel that if God has paid such a great price working on them and yet they still don't understand, God should do some supernatural work to instantly enlighten them and let them know the right path in life, rather than making them suffer so much hardship in life, and making them grope around on their own and personally experience and put themselves through things. Thirdly, people have notions about God's righteous disposition. They feel that if God has paid such a great price working on them, ultimately there must be an end result, which is that they must be gained by God. Fourthly, behind people's belief in God there is something of a mentality of trying one's luck.) Are there any more? Who can tell Me? (Another notion is that since God has been working all these years and has done such a big job, He should gain some more people, and that if He gains only a few people, it is not God's work.) That's five notions. Are there any more? (I've thought of one, which is that when people have some special experiences, such as being arrested and persecuted, and in the process have some genuine interactions with God and genuine testimony, they regard it as a kind of capital and think that because they have such experiential testimony, they can win God's approval and so their chances of survival will be higher.) (Also, people think that the greater their work and the more of a price they pay, the more they will win God's approval and the more likely they are to be saved.) In other words, people think that the chances of them winning God's approval are based on how much of a price they pay, and that the two must be directly proportional, rather than inversely proportional or unrelated, and that they must be linked—this is a notion. That's seven. What else? (There is another aspect, which is that people think that if God wants them to understand the truth, He could enlighten them in order to make them understand, and that He shouldn't test people, deprive them, or make them suffer, because God loves people, and making them suffer is not love.) This is a notion about God's love. What other notions are there? (People think that it would be better if God gained everyone. Satan would be humiliated and God would also have gained humankind. But in fact, this is a selfish and despicable way for people to think, and it's for their own sakes.) They have a perfect imagining of the results of God's work. This is a notion. Besides that selfish and despicable aim of people, they believe that all of this which God does should have a beginning and an end, and that the ending must be perfect, and accord with their desires, and be in line with their imaginings, and in line with their longing for beautiful things. However, when God's work is finished, the facts are often not in line with people's imaginings, and the outcome of all this may not be as perfect as people imagine. Of course, people don't want to see that there won't be many people remaining when God's work is finished, just as in the Age of Law, when there were few believers like Job who feared God and shunned evil. People feel that the results of God's work should not be like this, because God is omnipotent, and this is how they define God's omnipotence. This definition of God's omnipotence is itself a notion, a concept of perfectionism imagined by people, and has nothing to do with what God wants to do and the principles by which God does His work. What other notions are there? (When people believe in God, they don't reflect on the path they are walking, nor how they can cast off corruption and attain salvation. Instead, they think that God is omnipotent and that, if God says He will make people change, they will change.) God tells people how to change, but people don't put His words into practice, and they do not change themselves, and even constantly want to save themselves trouble and want God to change them. This is a kind of hollow imagining, and a kind of notion. Are there any more? (People think that someone who has suffered a lot and hit a lot of walls in their life should have a good outcome in the end, and that God should not give up on them. In the end, when this person is not gained by God and He wants to give up on them, people will adopt the perspective of a "good person" in looking at all these things that God has done, and feel that God's actions are too inconsiderate of their feelings and too cruel.) What is the problem here? You only described some matters and some of your perceptual understandings, without mentioning that this is a problem of notions. What is people's main notion here? People think that God saves a person based on how pitiful they are and how much they have suffered. People think that when God finally decides the person's outcome, He should show His compassionate heart, and His magnanimity, tolerance, love, and pity, because this person has suffered so much and their life is so pitiful. No matter whether the person understands the truth or not, and no matter how much they obey God, people think that God should not consider those things, but that He should rather consider how pitiful the person is, and consider that they have suffered a lot of pain, and consider that they cling so tenaciously to their dream, and make an exception by allowing them to be saved—this is a notion of people. People have many "shoulds," and use all these "shoulds" to determine what God should do and to define God's actions. When the facts reveal that God has not done things this way, discord arises between people and God, and misunderstanding about God arises in people. So, is it only misunderstanding? People's disobedience also arises out of this. These are the ills and consequences that notions bring to people.

The focus we are discussing is notions. Through the story we just spoke about, people can see that the protagonist used many notions to measure everything that God had orchestrated, and as a result of everything that happened to the protagonist and the way that God treated her, people develop many thoughts and demands on God—all of which are notions. Tell Me, what other notions do people have? (People think that since God has done such a big job, He should gain more people. But God says that if He can only gain a few people, then that is all He will gain, so people feel that God doesn't like gaining that many people, and so they stop pursuing.) Notions impact people's pursuit. A correction must be made here. It's not that God doesn't like gaining that many people, He does like it. There is a question here. When God ultimately determines people's outcome, on what basis does God say that He will no longer work on them, and instead give up on them? God has a standard here, which is also a principle and a bottom line. If you have notions about this standard, principle, or bottom line, or cannot see it clearly, some conflicts with or imaginings about God will arise in you. Some people say, "God put so much effort into her and yet she didn't change and didn't let go of her wish, but even held fast to it, and didn't come before God, so God gave up on her." Is this the main reason He gave up on her? (No.) What, then, was the main reason? At the end of this story, when the protagonist grew old, although her appearance changed, and she aged

as the years went by, and the times changed, what remained unchanged was her wish, and these almost blurred delusions of hers. So what made her keep holding onto such a wish? (An intransigent, rebellious disposition.) That's right, it was the fact that she didn't love the truth, didn't pursue the truth, didn't accept God's words, and didn't practice the truth that caused such a result. Her corrupt dispositions of arrogance, intransigence, and stubbornness made her keep holding onto her own wish and ideals, and stopped her from letting go of her ideals. What caused this? It was caused by her corrupt dispositions. So, whenever God sees a person reaching the end of the road, and their disposition is still intransigent, arrogant and stubborn, what does this mean? In the course of God's work, although this person appears from the outside to be following God and performing their duty, they do not practice and experience God's words in everything they do, and in essence they do not have life entry at all. So, do people like this truly accept and submit to God's work? (No.) That's right. This results in them finally being abandoned by God. They went through their whole life's path, and although during life they came before God and comprehended that it was the Creator who orchestrated all of this, and that it is the Creator who arranges people's destiny, during the period in which they followed God and listened to God's words, their intransigent, arrogant, and stubborn disposition did not change at all, even at the very end, so this result is selfevident. This is God's final standard—God's principle—for giving up on someone. No matter what views people have, or what assessments they make about this principle and this standard of God, He will not be influenced by people and He will do whatever He ought to do. If you don't engage with this person and don't understand what this person's innermost essence is and what their disposition is, but only consider their appearance, you will never understand the principle and root of God's actions, and you will make judgments about God's actions and His verdict with regard to this person. Let Me ask you, why would God mete out this kind of treatment to such a pitiful person, someone who has experienced all kinds of pain in life, someone who has experienced a lifetime of pain? Why would God give up on them? This result is something that no one wants to see, but it is indeed a fact and it really exists. What is the reason why God treats them like this? If God had worked on such a person for another ten years, would that person change, judging by their pursuit, their disposition, and the path they take? (No.) If He had worked on them for another 50 years and let them live a little longer, would they change? (No.) Why wouldn't they change? (Their nature essence determines that they are not someone who pursues the truth, so no matter how many more years they believe in God, they will not change.) Who can say it in a more specific way? (The path they are taking is wrong, it's not the path of pursuing the truth. This means that no matter how many years they believe in God, it will be pointless. Even if they believe in God for 10 or 20 more years, the path they take and the direction of their life will not change.) That's exactly how it is. They have notions and imaginings inside them. They don't pursue the truth, or pursue understanding of the truth, or pursue entry into the truth. All they pursue is the appearance of continually following, but the essence remains entirely unchanged. They believe in God for 10 or 20 years without pursuing the truth, or for 30 or 50 years and still don't pursue the truth, and what they ultimately reveal and live out never changes. This is determined by their nature essence, and this is just the kind of disposition they have. It has never changed, and their notions and imaginings of God have never changed. So, does God have principles for dealing with such a person like that? Very much so. People always pretend to be good people, thinking how tolerant and great they are. But is your tolerance as great as God's tolerance? Is your love as great as God's love? (No.) So what is God's tolerance? How can you tell that God is tolerant and loving? God uses various ways that are beneficial to people to bring them before Him, to get them to listen to His words and understand His words, and to get them to walk through life and practice in the way He requires. But that person doesn't accept, and holds fast to their own views right to the very end. So does God give up on them during the course of their experience of life? (No.) God does not give up. In every stage of their life, in everything He does for them and everything He requires them to experience, God takes His responsibility seriously right to the very end. What is God's purpose in taking responsibility right to the very end? To be able to see a good result, to be able to see a result that is satisfactory and agreeable to the person, so that they can enjoy the true happiness they wish for—this is God's tolerance. But what is the result that God sees in the end? Does God see the result that He wants to see in the end? (No.) He doesn't see it, there is already no hope in sight. What does it signify when God sees no hope? It means that God no longer has any hope in this person. In the words of humankind, He is despairing. If there is a glimmer of hope, then God will not give up. This is God's tolerance and God's love. God actually exerts His tolerance and love on people, rather than just saying hollow words. In the end, what God sees in this person is that their corrupt disposition has not changed, their stubbornness still persists, and their wish remains at the bottom of their heart. Although the person wants to be blessed, when they come before God, they let go of nothing. Instead, they hold on to this paltry wish for their entire lifetime, and cling to it for their entire lifetime, and grasp it tightly for their entire lifetime. On the surface, the person delivers themselves over to God, and delivers their life and all their relatives to God. But what is the reality? They want to be in charge themselves, in charge of the people around them, in charge of their relatives, and in charge of themselves, and additionally they want them to rely on each other they don't really deliver all of this over to God at all. No matter which way you look at it, the path which this person takes is not that of following God's way, nor is it that of consciously meeting God's requirements. They do not take the path of following God's way at all. They have suffered so much and experienced so many extraordinary things in their life, but it still hasn't made them abandon the beautiful and happy picture of life which they have drawn, nor has it made them reflect in any way. What kind of person is this? People like this are too intransigent. If people don't pursue the truth and don't follow the right path in life, then this is the final result. In the end, what God did was already all that He could possibly have done. It has already exceeded people's imaginings and gone beyond what they can reach. God has given people too much. According to people's corruption, their disposition, and their attitude toward God, they don't deserve these things, and don't deserve these blessings. But does God give up? God does a lot of work before giving up. God unstintingly bestows His love, His mercy, and His grace and blessings on them. But after they have received these things from God, what is their attitude in return? They still avoid Him and stay away from Him, and often inwardly doubt Him, guard against Him, conflict with Him, and give up. Why does the person constantly want to rely on others to create a happy life? They can't bring themselves to believe in God. They don't believe that God can lead people onto the right path and make them happy. They always feel that their own path is right. If God could have helped them and led them to fulfill their goals according to the path they have chosen and according to their requirements, they would have accepted and submitted. However, God expresses the truth to make people return to Him, so that they can accept the truth and live out a meaningful life, and this is at odds with the person's notions. Therefore, they want to go their own way and live their own life. They think that they just have to rely on themselves and on others, and that they can't achieve their goals by relying on God. Because people don't understand God's will and only hold onto their own notions, they stray further and further away from God. Only those who see that God is the truth, the way, and the life, and who see that people are corrupt in the extreme and in need of God's salvation, and who see that only everything that God does is the truth, and that it is all for the sake of saving humankind from Satan's influence and bringing humankind to a beautiful destination—only such people can look up to God, rely on Him, follow Him to the end, and never leave Him.

What we just fellowshiped on was God's attitude toward a person, and also the various ways in which God works among people and on people. If people develop notions about these things, they should often examine, reflect, understand, and then turn themselves around. What is the purpose of turning oneself around? If people realize that these are notions and imaginings, and realize how God actually does things, are they still likely to develop some even more wrong and distorted notions about God? It's still possible, because people are rebellious and have active thoughts, so they are likely to develop all sorts of different notions about God. One notion gives rise to another, which in turn gives rise to others, and all sorts of notions constantly emerge. At the same time that they are developing notions about God, people are continually misunderstanding Him, as well as reflecting, and then continually understanding the truth, and in this process they gradually come to know God. What is the reason why people cannot achieve knowledge of God? They don't know what notions are, and don't recognize the notions within themselves, nor do they reflect on their notions, or ever let go of them. They only focus on holding onto them, and never make the effort to learn or understand how God works, or what the essence of God's work is. In this way, in addition to people's corrupt dispositions, yet another thing comes between God and people that also affects people's salvation. Therefore, while dealing with their own corrupt dispositions, people need to gain a finer and more detailed understanding of what human notions are. What is the purpose of understanding and resolving human notions? Is it to let go of them? It is so that people can enter the truth reality as quickly as possible, understand what exactly it is that God wants people to enter, and understand how God does things. If God did things in the way you imagine, could God's work on you be effective? No, it couldn't. For example, there are some things that God never enlightens you about. Instead, He stipulates in explicit terms how to do them, and you just need to go and do them. But you always wait for God to move and enlighten you, and as a result, this waiting delays the work, you don't fulfill your duty properly, and you end up getting replaced. What caused this? (Notions.) Looking at it now, do people's notions affect their entry? (Yes.) To what extent do they affect it? At the very least, they affect people's understanding of the truth and their entry into reality; at worst, they affect people's correct choices and easily lead them to take the wrong path. People are most likely to misunderstand God when they have notions. For example, God prunes and deals with people, and judges and chastises them entirely in order to achieve positive results, so that people gain a better understanding of themselves and truly repent. However, people think that God is intentionally standing against them, and that He deliberately wants to expose them and cast them out. No matter what God says or does, they always think the worst of Him, and believe that God has no love for them, and that they even treat those who practice the truth as fools. God shows people the right path and allows them to practice the truth and live in the light, but they choose instead to live in the darkness according to satanic philosophies and satanic logic. Thus, the path they are walking is not the path of salvation. If you insist on going against God, are you not straying further and further away from God's work? As you stray further and further away from the path of salvation, you will be utterly cast out. There is a saying in the Bible: "Fools die for want of wisdom" (Proverbs 10:21). Is death serious? In the context of the last days, dying is not serious, but perishing is serious. Dying doesn't mean perishing, whereas perishing necessarily means not having an outcome—being dead forever. In the past, it was said that people could die from foolishness. But nowadays, foolishness isn't a big deal. Who doesn't do foolish things? Dying isn't a big deal either, because dying doesn't necessarily mean perishing. So, why do people perish? People perish because of their stubbornness and obstinacy, which is much more serious than dying from foolishness, because there is no outcome. Why do I say that stubbornness and obstinacy can lead to people perishing? This relates to the issue of the path that people take. What kind of disposition is stubbornness? Intransigence. Having an intransigent disposition is very troublesome. Sometimes people don't understand and just want to do things this way, whereas sometimes they understand but still want to do things this way, without following God's requirements. In addition, obstinacy is also a kind of disposition—that is to say, imperviousness to reason—and it involves arrogance and viciousness. If these two dispositions do not change, they may eventually cause a person to perish. Is this a simple matter? Can you apply it to yourself? You should understand what arrogant and vicious dispositions can lead people to do. Everything that people do, no matter who they are, is done in front of God, the Creator, and God will pass verdicts on people according to His righteous disposition. So, for people with arrogant and vicious dispositions, what are the consequences of the things they do? Why could it be said that these are irreversible consequences? You should all understand that, right? Okay then, we will say no more about the notions involved in this story.

Regarding people's notions of God's work, can you think whether there are any others that we haven't talked about? Are the notions you have heard today the only ones people have regarding God's work? If we talk about judgment and chastisement, trials and refinement, pruning and dealing with, as well as exposing or perfecting people, what content does that relate to? What kind of people does God prune, deal with, judge, and chastise? What kind of people face trials and refinement? In doing these jobs and using these ways to work on people, God has a principle and a scope, which are based on people's stature, their pursuit, their humanity, and the degree to which they understand the truth—I won't talk in detail about this today. In summary, God deals with, prunes, and disciplines people, judges and chastises them, and subjects them to trials and refinement—God works on people according to these several steps. The principle of God's work on people and which step the work is done to are based on a person's stature. This term "stature" may seem somewhat empty to you all. It is mainly measured based on the degree to which a person understands the truth, whether the relationship between the person and God is normal, and also based on the extent to which the person obeys God. If we make a distinction based on this, have most people now faced judgment, chastisement, trials and refinement? For some people it may be still early for these steps, they can see them but cannot attain them, while for other people, such a sight is somewhat frightening. In short, these ways are the steps that God takes to save people and make them perfect, and God determines these several steps based on accurate definitions of all of a person's various aspects. None of the work that God does on people is arbitrary. God does His work in a step-by-step and principled manner. He looks at your pursuit and your humanity, as well as your perceptiveness, and the attitude by which you deal with all kinds of people, events, and things in your daily life, and so on. Based on these things, He determines how to work on people and how to guide them. God needs a period of time in which to observe a person. He doesn't come to a hasty verdict based on one or two things—God is never that rash in each of the things He does on any person. Some people say, "I'm afraid of that way in which God put Job to the test. If ever that actually happened to me, I wouldn't be able to bear witness for God. What if God really did deprive me of everything like that? What would I do?" Don't worry, God will never work on you so arbitrarily, you needn't be afraid. Why needn't you be afraid? Before being afraid, you must first convince yourself with a fact, and consider your stature. Do you have Job's faith, Job's obedience, and Job's fear of God? Do you have Job's degree of loyalty and absoluteness in following God's way? Take the measure of these things, and if you have none of them, then you can rest assured that God will not subject you to trials and refinement, because your stature does not measure up and falls far short. People also have some notions and imaginings—as well as suspicion, fright, or avoidance and guardedness—about God's trials and refinement. Once people have gained a thorough understanding of these things and of how God works, their notions of God's work will gradually disappear, and they will focus on pursuing the truth and putting effort into God's words. The purpose of Him saying these words is to achieve this aim. In following God, you must understand how God works and saves people. If you are truly a person who pursues the truth, then go and do things according to God's requirements. Don't look at God through colored lenses, and don't use your own petty mind to fathom the mind of God. You must understand what exactly the principles of God's work are, what the principles by which God treats people are, to what extent God works on a person, and what God's standard of measurement is. Once you understand these things, what should you do next? What God wants to see is not that you give up your pursuit of the truth, nor does He want to see the attitude of someone who writes themselves off as a lost cause. He wants to see that once you comprehend all these true facts, you can go and pursue the truth in a more steadfast, bold and assured manner, recognizing clearly that God is a righteous God. When you come to the end of the road, as long as you have reached the standard God has set for you, and you are on the road to salvation, God will not give up on you. As regards people's notions about judgment and chastisement, trials and refinement, and pruning and dealing, I will talk briefly about these now. There are still a great many detailed aspects, too many to explain clearly in this short talk. It would be necessary to give some examples of how people manifest and reveal these notions in daily life, and it would also be necessary to tell some brief stories and incorporate a few simple characters and plots, so that you could understand or interpret people's notions through these real-life examples, and so that you could realize that these things are notions that are discordant with reality, and completely at odds with the principles and standards of God. God does not even do that, so why do you keep thinking and speculating blindly? If you constantly live in your own notions and imaginings, you will never, ever follow the path of pursuing the truth according to God's requirements, and you will always be far away from God's requirements. If you go on like this, you will have no path to practice and you will always be subject to constraints. Wherever you go, you will hit a wall at every turn, leaving you at a loss as to what to do, and nothing will go smoothly in the slightest. As a result, in the end you will not even be entitled to receive God's judgment and chastisement. How lamentable that would be!

When it comes to believing in God, no one has been earnest with you before. Now is the time to be earnest, because this is the critical juncture! Time is running out, so don't treat faith in God as something to play around with. God has resolved to make people complete and to save people, and He wants to complete this work thoroughly. How does He go about doing it thoroughly? By telling people all aspects of the truth, so that they can clearly comprehend it and not go astray. God will discipline you when you go astray. If you often stray onto your own path, God will continue disciplining you until you return to the right path. In the end, if God has done all He can and you still haven't met God's requirements, who else is there to blame? You can only blame yourself. At that time, all that is left for people to do is to beat their breasts and cry bitterly. What is the most important thing when it comes to people's understanding of the truth? They must accept the truth and, after accepting it, be able to seek the truth and link it to their daily life. Only in this way can people gradually achieve a genuine understanding of the truth. When you listen to sermons and gain an understanding of their literal meaning, you think that you understand—this is not really understanding the truth. It is only an understanding of doctrine. Once you understand that when listening, you must link it in real life to your own state and your own entry, so that you can get to know yourself and be able to practice the truth. Only that means you enter into the truth reality. If you don't practice this way, the truth has nothing to do with you, God's words have nothing to do with you, and so God has nothing to do with you. If you don't practice the truth, you will gain nothing!

Today we continue to fellowship about the issue of notions. We've previously fellowshiped this issue twice, and today we will fellowship it once more to conclude. Regarding what was fellowshiped before, you should communicate among yourselves afterward, and then ponder and experience these things bit by bit. These topics can't be fully comprehended in just a day or two; one can only gradually come to understand them by experiencing and feeling them out in life. What you can now bring forth based on memory alone is merely rote learning. Eating and drinking God's words requires experience; only after undergoing real-life experience for some time can one have genuine understanding and appreciation. People's notions mainly consist of their notions about God and God's work. These two types of notions most affect people's pursuit, the way they view matters, their understanding of and attitude toward God, and even more so the path they walk in believing in God, as well as the direction and objectives they choose for their lives. From our previous two fellowships, can you now define exactly what is meant by notions? Imaginings about belief in God are a type of notion. These imaginings are primarily manifested in some superficial behaviors in people's speech and conduct, as well as details of their daily life, such as eating, clothing, housing, and transport. This is the most elementary level. Going a step further, there are some imaginings about one's pursuit in believing in God and the path one walks in doing so, as well as some of people's demands, imaginings, and misunderstandings involving God's work. What do these misunderstandings include? Why are they called misunderstandings? When we say misunderstanding, it's definitely not a proper thought. Rather, it is something that does not coincide with facts, is inconsistent with the truth, and incompatible with and contrary to God's work and God's disposition; or something of human will conceived out of people's notions, imaginings, and knowledge, having nothing whatsoever to do with God Himself or God's work. When these kinds of notions, imaginings, misunderstandings, and demands arise, it means that people's notions about God and God's work have reached their peak. What becomes of the relationship between people and God at this point? (A barrier forms between them.) There is a barrier between people and God; is this a serious issue? (Yes.) When such a barrier is formed, it means people's notions and imaginings are very severe. When a barrier forms between people and God, it means they are dissatisfied with some of the things God has done, they no longer want to confide in God, treat God as God, or submit to God. They begin to question God's righteousness and disposition. What manifestations immediately follow this? (Resistance.) If people do not seek the truth, this misunderstanding not only creates a barrier in their hearts but also immediately leads to resistance—resistance to the truth, to God's words, and to God's sovereignty. They become dissatisfied with what God has done, saying, "What You're doing is inappropriate; I neither approve nor agree with it!" The implicit message is, "I can't submit; this is my choice. I want to voice a dissenting view, I want to voice an opinion that is different from God's words, from the truth, and from God's demands." What kind of behavior is this? (They are clamoring.) Following resistance, clamor and opposition arise; this is an escalation. When one's corrupt disposition takes charge, a single notion can create a barrier and misunderstandings between them and God. If this is not resolved promptly through seeking the truth, the barrier grows larger, becoming a thick wall. You no longer see God or His true existence, let alone His divine essence. You start to doubt whether the incarnated God is really God, you lose interest in eating and drinking the word of God, and you no longer want to pray to God. In this way, your relationship with God becomes increasingly distant. Why can people exhibit such behaviors? Because they feel that what God has done has hurt their hearts, harmed their dignity, and humiliated their personhood. Is this really the case? (No.) What's actually going on then? (It's because people's desires have not been satisfied, and the situation they've encountered has touched upon their own interests.) It is because people have a corrupt disposition; when their extravagant desires are not instantly met, they become resistant to God and extremely dissatisfied that He has worked in a way that does not align with human notions. They do not admit, nor do they accept, that what God is doing is the truth, is God's love, and is for the purpose of saving people. They develop notions and misunderstandings about what God has done, which means their corrupt disposition is in control. After these barriers arise, what are the manifestations of all kinds of corrupt dispositions that people reveal when they live by notions? They do not seek, wait, or submit, much less do they fear God or repent. They first scrutinize and judge, and then they condemn, and finally comes the resistance. Aren't these behaviors the exact opposite of positive manifestations like seeking, waiting, submitting, accepting, and repenting? (Yes.) Then these behaviors are all obverse things. They are the revelation of a corrupt disposition; it is their corrupt disposition that is controlling their actions and thoughts, as well as their attitude, intentions, and views toward judging people, matters, and things. When people engage in scrutinizing, analyzing, judging, condemning, and becoming resistant, what is the next step they take? (Opposition.) Then comes opposition. What are some manifestations of opposition? (Passivity, giving up one's duties.) Passivity is one; they passively slacken at work, and give up their duties. What else? (Spreading notions.) (Making judgments.) Making judgments, spreading notions, these are all some manifestations of clamoring against and opposing God. What else? (They may betray God, and betray the true way.) That's the most serious of all; when someone reaches this point, their devilish nature surfaces completely, utterly denying and betraying God, and at any moment they could turn away from God.

Just now, what were the various manifestations of behaviors that clamor against and oppose God? (Passively slackening at work, giving up one's duties.) (Judging God.) Judging God and His work. (Then comes spreading notions, and finally, betraying God.) Let's go into more detail. Is there any complaining involved in spreading notions? (Yes.) Sometimes spreading notions is mixed with complaining, stuff like, "What God does is not righteous," "I believe in God, not in people," and "I believe that God is righteous." These words carry undertones of complaint. Passive slackening, spreading notions, and judging God are all rather serious behaviors, but the most serious is betrayal. These four are quite obvious, quite serious, and are of the nature that directly resists God. What are some specific manifestations within these behaviors that you can think of, have seen, or have even done yourselves? (There's also incitement; to vent dissatisfaction with God, some incite even more people to oppose Him.) This is a manifestation of spreading notions. Are there those who outwardly appear obedient, but during prayers say, "Let God expose it; what I am doing is right, all will be revealed in time; I know God is righteous"? These words may sound correct, even confidently justified, but they hide insubordination and dissatisfaction toward God. This is mental opposition, it is passive slackening and passive opposition. Are there other aspects? (In the case of passive slackening, there is also abandoning oneself to despair and throwing up their hands in frustration, believing that this is just how they are, that this is just their nature; they think no one can save them, so if God wants to destroy them, then so be it.) This is a form of silent opposition; their actual state is passive, thinking that God's actions are incomprehensible and that people cannot truly grasp them, so whatever God wants to do, let Him do it. On the surface, it seems like they have submitted to God's orchestrations and arrangements, but in actuality, deep down in their hearts, they profoundly resist God's arrangements, and are especially dissatisfied and insubordinate. They have already acknowledged that this is God's doing and don't make any further demands; why then say that this is an oppositional sentiment? Why characterize it this way? In fact, in their consciousness, they don't want to condemn this matter either, they don't want to make a determination that says, "What God has done is wrong; I do not accept it. I can submit to other things God has done, but not this. In any case, I will be passive and slacken at my work because of this." In their subconscious, their state is not like this, they don't have this awareness; in their heart, they are just somewhat defiant, dissatisfied, or indignant. Some people might even condemn God's actions as wrong, but from the depths of their hearts, in terms of their subjective desires, they do not actually want to condemn God in their consciousness, since, after all, what they believe in is God. So why say that this behavior is oppositional, that it is passive slackening, and that it carries elements of passivity? Passivity itself is a form of resistance and opposition, and it has several manifestations. Firstly, when people develop states like giving up in despair and passively slackening, can they be aware in their hearts that these states are wrong? (Yes.) Everyone can be aware of this, except those who have believed for only two or three years and rarely hear sermons; they don't understand these matters. But as long as one has believed in God for at least three years, frequently hears sermons, and understands the truth, they can have this awareness. When people realize that such states are wrong, what should they do to avoid being oppositional? First, they must seek. Seek what? Seek why God has orchestrated things this way, why such situations have befallen them, what God's intentions are, and what they should do. These are positive, these are the manifestations people should have. What else? (Accept, submit, and let go of one's own ideas.) Is it easy to let go of your own ideas? (No.) If you think you're right, you won't be able to let go of them. To reach the point of letting go, there are steps involved. So what practices are most appropriate and suitable for this? (Prayer.) If your prayer consists of only a few hollow sentences, and you're just going through the motions, the problem won't be solved. You pray, "Oh God, I wish to obey; please arrange and orchestrate my circumstances such that I can obey. If I still cannot obey then, then correct me." Does uttering a few empty sentences like this make your wrong state change? It doesn't change it at all. You need a method of practice to effect a turnaround. So how can you practice to turn things around? (One should actively seek God's intentions, internally admit that God is right and they are wrong, and be able to deny themselves.) These are two methods of practice: actively seeking God's intentions, and internally admitting God is right and oneself is wrong. Both of these methods are quite good, they both say the right things, but one is most practical. Which one is practical? Which is empty talk? (Actively seeking God's intentions is practical.) Often, God will not directly tell you His intentions. Furthermore, He will not suddenly shine a light of understanding on you. Nor will He lead you to precisely eat and drink the relevant words of God that you should understand. These methods are all too unrealistic for people. So, can this approach of actively seeking God's intentions be effective for you? An effective method is the best method; it is the most realistic and practical method. An ineffective method, no matter how good it sounds, is theoretical and only stays at the level of words and does not yield results. So which one is practical? (The second one, admitting that God is the truth and oneself is wrong.) Right, admitting your mistakes—this is having reason. Some people say they don't realize they are wrong. In this case, you should be reasonable and able to let go of and deny yourself. Some people say, "I used to think I was right, and I still think so now. Moreover, many people approve of and agree with me, and I don't feel any reproach in my heart. Besides, my intention is right, so how can I be wrong?" There are several reasons preventing you from letting go of and denying yourself. What should you do in this case? Regardless of whatever reasons you have for thinking you are right, if this "right" conflicts with God and goes against the truth, then you are simply wrong. No matter how submissive your attitude is, regardless of how you pray to God in your heart, or even if you verbally admit you are wrong but deep down still struggle against God and live in a state of passivity, the essence of this is still opposing God. This proves you still haven't realized that you are wrong; you do not accept the fact that you are wrong. When people develop misunderstandings and notions about God, they first must acknowledge that God is the truth and that people do not have the truth, and it is certainly they who are mistaken. Is this a kind of formality? (No.) If you only adopt this practice as a formality, superficially, then can you come to know your own mistakes? Never. Coming to know yourself requires several steps. First, you must determine whether your actions are in line with the truth and with principles. Do not look at your intents at first; there are times when your intents are correct but the principles you practice are wrong. Does this kind of situation occur often? (Yes.) Why do I say that your principles of practice are wrong? You may have sought, but perhaps you have no understanding at all of what principles are; perhaps you have not sought at all, and have based your actions solely on your good intentions and enthusiasm, and on your imaginings and experience, and as a result, you have made a mistake. Can you envision that? You cannot anticipate it, and you've made a mistake—and have you not then been exposed? If you keep contending with God after being exposed, where does the error in this lie? (It lies in not acknowledging that God is right, and insisting that I am right.) That's how you erred. Your greatest mistake was not that you did something wrong and violated the principles, thereby causing a loss or other consequences, but that, having done something wrong, you yet persist in your own reasoning, unable to admit your error; you still oppose God based on your notions and imaginings, denying His work and the truths He expressed—this was your greatest and most serious mistake. Why is it said that such a state in a person is one of opposition to God? (Because they don't acknowledge that what they are doing is wrong.) Whether or not people recognize that everything God does and His sovereignty are right, and what their significance is, if they cannot first recognize that they themselves are wrong, then their state is one of opposition to God. What is to be done to rectify this state? First, one must deny oneself. What we just said about needing to first seek God's intentions is not so practical for people. Some say, "If it isn't so practical, then does that mean seeking isn't necessary? Some things that can be sought and understood don't need to be sought—I can just skip that step." Will this do? (No.) Is one who acts in this manner not beyond saving? Such people are really skewed and erroneous in their comprehension. Seeking God's will is a bit distant and cannot be achieved immediately; for a shortcut, it's more realistic to first let go of oneself, knowing that one's actions are wrong and not in line with the truth, and then seek the truth principles. These are the steps. They may seem simple, yet putting them into practice presents many difficulties, for humans have corrupt dispositions as well as all manner of imaginings, all manner of demands, and they have desires as well, all of which interfere with people denying themselves and letting go of themselves. These are not easy things to do. We won't delve deeper into this topic; let's continue discussing the issue of notions, which we visited in our last two fellowships.

Just now, the main focus of our fellowship was how notions can lead to misunderstandings about God, which in turn form a barrier between people and God, and this barrier leads them to develop resistance to God. What is the nature of this resistance? (Opposition.) It is opposition, rebelliousness. Therefore, when people develop opposition toward God and clamor against Him, this is not something that happens overnight; it has roots. It's like when a person suddenly discovers they've become sick, and that the illness is very serious; they wonder how the condition progressed so quickly. In actuality, the illness was present in the body for a long time and already had roots—it was not contracted on the day it became apparent; rather, that was only the day when they discovered it. What do I mean by saying this? Is the ability to rebel against God, to oppose Him, to clamor against Him something everyone can predict when they first start believing in God? Absolutely not. Is this the initial intention in believing in God of every person who eventually clamors against and opposes Him? Has anyone ever said, "I don't believe in God for blessings; I just want to clamor against God and be oppositional after seeing Him, so that then I'll become famous and make a big name for myself, and my life will have been worthwhile"? Has anyone ever had such plans? (No.) No one has ever planned this way, not even the most foolish, stupid, or wicked person. People all want to believe in God sincerely, to be good, to listen to God's words and do whatever God asks of them. Although they cannot achieve absolute obedience to God, they can at least meet God's minimum requirements and satisfy God to the best of their ability. What a good wish that is—how did it end up with them clamoring against and opposing God? People themselves feel unwilling and don't know how this came about. When it comes to clamoring against and opposing God, they feel bad and upset inside, thinking, "How could people do this? Even if others act this way, I shouldn't have acted this way!" It's just like Peter said: "Though all men shall be offended because of You, yet will I never be offended" (Matthew 26:33). The words Peter spoke came from his heart, but his behavior could not live up to his wishes and aspirations. Human weakness is something people themselves cannot anticipate. When some situation actually befalls them, their corruption is exposed. One's nature essence and corrupt disposition can control and dictate their thoughts and behavior. With a corrupt disposition, various notions can arise, along with different desires and demands, leading to all kinds of rebellious behavior. This directly impacts one's relationship with God and directly influences one's life entry and dispositional transformation. These are not people's intentions when they first set out to believe in God, nor are they what people are willing and hoping to do in their hearts. Such consequences are attributed to people's notions about God. If these notions are not resolved, one's prospects, fate, and destination may all become problematic.

To resolve one's misunderstandings about God, one must resolve their notions about God, about God's work, about the essence of God, and about the disposition of God. To resolve these notions, one must first understand, know, and recognize them. So what exactly are these notions? This brings us back to the main topic. We must start with some practical examples to address these notions and manifestations of people, making God's will apparent from these instances, allowing people to see, deep within God's heart, what His disposition and essence are and how He treats people, as well as how people imagine He should treat them, and allowing them to distinguish, clarify, and compare these latter two perspectives, which can lead to an understanding and acceptance of the way God treats and rules over people, and an understanding and acceptance of God's essence and disposition. Once people have a clear understanding of the way God rules people and of His work, they will no longer conceive notions about God. The barrier between God and them will also disappear, and oppositional or clamoring states directed at God will no longer arise in their hearts. These issues of rebelliousness and resistance against God can be directly resolved through reading God's words and fellowshiping the truth. No matter which aspect of notions is being addressed, it must begin with reading God's words and fellowshiping the truth. Everything must be connected with the truth, everything involves the truth. So what are these notions that people have? Let us start by discussing God's work, using specific examples to make clear the principles behind God's work, and the principles and methods by which God treats and rules people. An example might touch on the method of God's work; it may also touch on the method by which God classifies an individual and His determination of their outcome; or it may touch upon God's disposition and essence. To clarify these points, if we were to speak in an empty way about what God is like, what God has done and how He's treated people over His six thousand years of work—do you think that would be appropriate? Could you easily receive that? Or if we talked about how, for instance, God has been working for six thousand years, and in the second phase of His work, He operated in Judea; and we discussed how God treated the Jewish people then, and how we can observe God's disposition from this—would that make it easy to understand? (No.) For instance, if we talked about how God rules this world: how He treats people of various ethnicities, what God thinks, how He demarcates their territories, and why He divides them in different locations—in particular, why some good people are located in less-than-ideal places, while some evil people are in much better places, and what principles God employs in allocating things this way, and saw God's methods for ruling humankind from this topic—would that make it easy to understand? (No.) Aren't these topics quite distant from people's dispositional transformations and life entry in daily life? Aren't they guite abstract? (Yes.) Why do we say they are distant and abstract? Because in real life, only understanding truths related to visions, such as the details of how God rules and guides humankind, seems a bit far removed from the problems we face in our day-to-day lives, and not particularly relevant. To address real-world problems, we must start from examples that you can hear, see, and feel in your lives, and then broaden your insight from there. Regardless of what stories I tell, or which people and events these stories involve—even if they may relate to things you have done in the past—the ultimate effect these stories have is to help you understand truths related to the topic being discussed today. Every story told serves a purpose, and is related to the value it's meant to convey and the truth it expresses.

Let us begin our story. This is Case One. A long time ago, a church sent over a bottle of cough syrup, explaining: "God always talks to us and preaches, and sometimes coughs when speaking too much. To make God's preaching smoother and to reduce coughing, we're sending some cough syrup." When the bottle arrived, a man saw it and said: "This is said to be cough syrup, but who knows what it really treats. We can't just give it to God to drink—it might be harmful. This is medicine; every medicine has some toxins. There could be side effects for drinking it!" Those who heard him thought, "He's being guite considerate. Well, we can't give it to God then." At the time, I didn't need it, so I thought to keep it for later, and the matter was left at that. But does the story end here? No, the story of this medicine began that day. One day, someone discovered that this same man had been drinking the cough syrup himself, and by the time he was discovered, only half of it remained. What happened next can be easily guessed; he finished it all. That's the story itself. Ponder what this has to do with the notions that we're discussing today. First of all, tell Me: Does the story shock you, trigger you? (Yes.) What are your thoughts after hearing it? What triggered you? Generally, those who are triggered will think, "Oh my, this was something offered to God; how could someone drink it?" That's the first thing that triggers them. The second thing is, "He kept drinking it. I can't believe he drank it all!" Besides being triggered, what else can you think of?

Regarding what this person did—all of these behaviors of his; that is, every single event in this entire story—do you consider what God's reaction might be? What would God do? What should God do? How should God treat such a person? And isn't this where human notions start to arise? Let's put aside the content of what triggered you, and talk about whether this experience of being triggered itself could be of any benefit. In being triggered, people merely feel a certain discomfort in their conscience, but can't speak clearly about the event in the story. Next, there may arise condemnation and reproach directed at the individual in the story which are rooted in ethics, morals, theological theories, or words and doctrines, but these things are not the truth. If we want to get at the truth, it's the human notions formed regarding the event itself, or the demands regarding what God should do—these are the issues that need resolving. In this story, the notions and thoughts people have about what God should do in such a situation are crucial. Don't just focus on your emotional reaction; being triggered by something can't resolve your rebelliousness. If one day you find something in God's offerings that you particularly like or need, and you're very tempted, you could take it for yourself too; in that case you wouldn't feel triggered at all. Your being triggered now is merely a function of conscience, a result of the moral standards of humanity; it is not a function of the truth. When you can resolve the notions that arise from this situation, you will understand the truth in this situation. You will have resolved any notions and misunderstandings you have toward God in such matters, and in these kinds of situations, you will understand the truth and gain something. So now, think about what kinds of notions people might develop in this situation. Which of these notions might lead you to misunderstand God, to form a barrier between you and Him, or even to oppose Him? This is what we should be fellowshiping. Tell Me, when this event took place, did this man feel any reproach in his conscience? (No.) How can you tell he felt no reproach? (He drank all of the cough syrup.) This is quite easy to analyze, isn't it? From the first sip to the last, he showed no restraint and didn't stop. If he had taken a taste and then stopped, that would have counted as feeling self-reproach, because he would have stopped, restrained himself and not continued. But this man didn't do that; he drank the whole bottle from beginning to end. If there was more, he would have continued drinking. This shows that he felt no reproach whatsoever in his conscience; this is looking at it from a human perspective. Now, how does God view this matter? This is what you should understand. From how God treats this situation, how He evaluates and defines it, you can see God's disposition, God's essence, and also discern the principles and methods by which God operates. At the same time, it might reveal some human notions, causing people to say, "So this is God's attitude toward people; this is how God handles people. I didn't think this way before." The fact that you didn't think this way reveals the barrier between you and God, that you can develop misunderstandings about God, and that you have notions about the way God works and operates in this regard. So, how did God handle it when faced with this situation? The man said, "This is medicine; all medicine has some toxicity. We can't let God drink it; there might be side effects." What was the intention, the purpose behind his words? Were these truthful or false words? They were not truthful; they were deceitful, false, and disingenuous. His subsequent actions and what he revealed made it clear what was going on in his heart. Did God do anything about his false words and actions? (No.) How do we know that God didn't do anything? When he spoke those words, he was not sincere; he was being false. God was just watching from the sidelines, neither performing the positive work of guidance nor the negative work of reproach. Sometimes, people feel reproach in their conscience—that is God at work. Did this man feel reproach at the time? (No.) Not only did he not feel reproached, but he also spoke in a high-sounding manner. God did not reproach him; He was simply watching. Why would God watch? Was He watching to see how the facts would unfold? (No.) Not necessarily. Right when a person faces a situation, before making a choice about what to do or forming any facts, does God understand that person? (Yes.) God understands not just their surface but the inner heart—whether their heart is good or wicked, genuine or false, what their true attitude toward God is, whether they have God in their heart, whether they have genuine faith—God has already known these things; He has conclusive evidence, and is ever observing. What did God do after this man said this? First, God did not reproach him; second, God did not enlighten him or make him aware that this was an offering, that humans should not carelessly touch it. Does God need to explicitly tell people to have this awareness? (No.) This awareness should be present in normal humanity. Some may say, "Some people just don't know. You wouldn't tell them? Won't they know if You just tell them? Not knowing exempts one from sin—right now, they don't know; if they knew, they wouldn't have made this mistake, right? Wouldn't this be protecting them?" Did God act this way? (No.) Why didn't God act this way? On one hand, that man should have known the concept that "this is an offering to God, humans cannot touch it." On the other, if he didn't know, why didn't God tell him? Why didn't God make him aware to prevent him from doing such a thing and facing such consequences? Wouldn't telling him better reveal God's sincerity in saving people? Wouldn't it better reveal God's love? So why didn't God do this? (God wanted to expose him.) Yes, God wanted to expose him. When you are faced with situations, it is not by accident that you are faced with them. A certain situation could mean your salvation, or it could mean your destruction. During these times, God is watching, remaining silent, not orchestrating any circumstances to prompt you, nor enlightening you with words like, "You mustn't do this; the consequences would be unimaginable," or "Doing it this way lacks reason and humanity." People have no such awareness. The lack of such awareness is, in one sense, because God didn't give them any prompting at that moment—God didn't act. In another sense, if a person does have conscience and possesses some measure of humanity, would God then act upon such a foundation? (Yes.) That's right. God would bestow such grace upon them. But why did God ignore this particular situation? One reason is that this man lacked conscience and reason, had no dignity, no integrity, and no normal humanity. He did not pursue these things; he did not have God in his heart and was not a true believer in God. So, God wanted to expose him through this situation. Sometimes God exposing someone is a form of salvation, and sometimes it is not—God intentionally acts this way. If you are someone with conscience and reason, God's exposing you serves as a trial and a form of salvation. But if you lack conscience and reason, God's exposing you will mean being cast out and destroyed. So, looking at it now, what did it mean for God to expose this man? It meant being cast out; it was not a blessing but a curse. Some people say: "He made such a big mistake, and it's quite shameful. From when he started secretly drinking the cough syrup, couldn't God have arranged some circumstances to get him to stop so that he wouldn't make this mistake and therefore wouldn't need to be cast out?" Is this what God did? (No.) How did God act? (He let the situation take its own course.) God let things take their own course—this is one of His principles. Once he opened the bottle of cough syrup, was there any difference in nature between the first sip he took and the last sip? (No.) Why was there no difference? (He is just that type of person in essence.) This situation thoroughly exposed his humanity, his pursuit, and his faith.

In the Old Testament age, Esau traded his birthright for a bowl of red stew. He was unaware of what was important and valuable: "What's the big deal about a birthright? If I trade it, it won't make a difference; I'll still be alive, won't I?" This is what he thought in his heart. It might seem that his approach to the problem was rather realistic, but what he lost was God's blessing, and the consequences of that are unimaginable. Now, in the church, there are many people who do not pursue the truth. They do not take God's promises and God's blessings seriously. Is this not the same in nature as forfeiting one's birthright? Is it not even more serious? Because God's salvation of people is a one-time opportunity; if someone misses this opportunity, it is all over. There was even one person who was ultimately cast out just for the sake of a bottle of cough syrup, something he traded for the outcome of being destroyed; this is simply unfathomable! Actually, though, there isn't anything unfathomable about it. Why do I say that? This event might seem like a minor thing. If such an event occurred among people, it wouldn't be considered much. Like committing a crime, such as stealing or causing injury to others, at most you'd be punished after death and then be reborn as a human through several cycles of reincarnation. It wouldn't matter much. But is the situation I'm talking about now as simple as this? (No.) Why do we say it isn't simple? Why is this situation worth discussing? Let's start with this bottle of cough syrup. Actually, this bottle of cough syrup was not something of great value, but once it was offered up to God, its essence changed; it became an offering. Some people say, "Offerings are consecrated; offerings do not belong to people; people should not touch offerings." Saying this is also correct. What is an offering? An offering is something a person devotes to God; no matter what it is, such things are all referred to as offerings. Since they belong to God, they no longer belong to man. Whatever is devoted to God-be it money or material things, and whatever its value—belongs entirely to God, and is not at man's disposal, nor is it his to use. How might God's offerings be conceptualized? They belong to God, only He may dispose of them, and, prior to obtaining His approval, none may touch those things or have designs on them. There are those who say, "If God isn't using something, why aren't we allowed to use it? If it were to go bad after a while, wouldn't that be a shame?" No, not even then; this is a principle. Offerings are things that belong to God, not to man; big or small, and whether or not they are valuable, once man has devoted them to God, their essence has changed, regardless of whether God wants them. Once a thing has become an offering, it is among the possessions of the Creator and at His disposal. What does the way one treats offerings involve? It involves one's attitude toward God. If a person's attitude toward God is one of impertinence and disdain, and of insouciance, then that person's attitude toward all the things God owns will certainly be likewise. There are some who say, "Some offerings have no one looking after them. Doesn't that mean they belong to whoever is in possession of them? Whether or not anyone knows it, it's 'finders, keepers'; whoever gets his hands on those things is their owner." What do you think of that view? Quite clearly, it is incorrect. What is God's attitude toward offerings? No matter what is offered to God, and whether or not He accepts it, once something has been designated as an offering, any person with further designs on it may wind up "stepping on a landmine." What does this mean? (It means offending God's disposition.) That's right. You all know this concept, but why don't you recognize the essence of this matter? So, what does this matter tell people? It tells them that God's disposition brooks no offenses by humans, and that they are not to fiddle with His things. God's offerings, for instance—if a person were to take them as their own, or to waste and squander them, then they would be liable to offend God's disposition and be punished. God's fury has its principles; it is not as people imagine it, with God lashing out at anyone who makes a mistake. Rather, God's fury is triggered when someone offends God in crucial, important matters. Especially when it comes to treating God's incarnation and God's offerings, people must demonstrate caution and have a God-fearing heart; only in this way can they be sure not to offend God's disposition.

Some people have faith in their belief in God and are able to expend themselves and pay the price, performing well in all aspects except for one. Seeing the abundant resources in God's house, and knowing that God's chosen people offer not just money but also food, clothing, and various medicines, among other things, such a person thinks, "God's chosen people offer so many things to God, and God alone can't use all of this. Although some are needed for spreading the gospel, it still won't all be used. How should these items be handled? Perhaps the leaders and workers ought to share in some of it?" He becomes anxious and agitated about this issue, feeling a "burden" inside, and begins to ponder, "Now that I am in charge of these items, I should use some. Otherwise, won't all these offerings go to waste when the world is obliterated? Distributing them to leaders and workers is fair. Everyone in God's house is equal; since we have dedicated ourselves to God, then God's things are also ours, and ours are God's. It's not a big deal if I enjoy some of God's offerings; it's part of God's blessing anyway. I might as well just go ahead and use some." With such thoughts, he becomes tempted. His desires inflate bit by bit and he begins to covet the offerings, starting to take items without feeling any reproach in his heart. He thinks no one will know, and comforts himself by saying, "I've expended myself for God; enjoying some offerings isn't a big deal. Even if God knows, He will forgive me. I'll just enjoy some now." As a result, he starts to steal the offerings, offending God's disposition. On the surface, he finds many excuses for himself, such as, "These things will go bad after a while if they're not consumed! God alone can't use all of these, and if they were distributed evenly, there would be too many people and not enough to go around. Why don't I manage it? Moreover, what if all this money can't be spent by the end of the world? We should each take on a share, which also reflects God's love and grace! Although God hasn't stated this, and there's no such principle, why not be proactive? This is acting according to principles!" He concocts many highsounding reasons and then starts taking action. But once he starts, things get out of hand, and there is less and less reproach in his heart. He may even feel that it's justified, thinking, "If God doesn't need it, I should use it. This is not a real problem." This is where things go wrong. What do you think, is this a big deal or not? Is it serious? (Yes.) Why do we say it's serious? Is this issue worth fellowshiping? (Yes.) What makes it worth fellowshiping? (It involves God's disposition and also concerns man's end and destination.) The issue is significant, its nature severe. Now, what is it that I should warn you about? Never entertain the idea of taking offerings. Some people say, "That's not right; offerings made by brothers and sisters are meant for God's house, for the church. This makes them everyone's communal property." Is this statement correct? How does such a statement come about? Out of man's greed, a theory like this is concocted. What else does this issue involve? There's something we haven't yet touched on—what is it? Some think, "God's house is a big family. To reflect a good family, there should be love and tolerance; everyone should share food, drink, and resources, and all of these things should be distributed equally. For instance, everyone should have clothing, and it should be distributed and enjoyed equally. God does not show favoritism; if someone can't even afford socks and God has some extra pairs, He should offer them relief. Furthermore, those offerings of God's come from the brothers and sisters; God already has so much, shouldn't some be distributed to the poor? Wouldn't this reflect God's love?" Do people think like this? Are these not human notions? People forcefully claim God's property while euphemistically labeling it as God's grace, God's blessings, and God's great love. They always want to evenly divide things with God, wanting to split everything equally, always pushing for egalitarianism. They think this is a symbol of universal unity, of human harmony, and a fulfilling existence, and consider this a state of affairs that ought to be manifested. Are these not human notions? Especially in God's house, they think nobody should go hungry. If someone is hungry, God should use His offerings for relief; God should not ignore the matter. Isn't this "should" that people believe a type of notion? Isn't it a human demand on God? Some people, after believing in God, say, "I've believed in God for so many years and have gained nothing; my family is still in poverty. This shouldn't happen; God should be kind to me, should bless me so that I can better glorify God." Because your family is poor, you don't pursue the truth; you hope to change your impoverished conditions through belief in God, and use glorifying God as an excuse to bargain with Him. These are human notions and imaginings; they are man's extravagant desires. Is believing in God with such motives not a form of bargaining with God? Do those who bargain with God have conscience and reason? Are they people who submit to God? Absolutely not. These people lack conscience and reason, don't accept the truth, are despised by God, and are unreasonable people who cannot attain God's salvation.

Some people think, "When humans have some improper thoughts or actions that violate God's administrative decrees and offend God's disposition, God should intervene to stop them. This is God's salvation, this is God's love." Is this not people's notions and imaginings? Is this how God works to save people? God saves people by expressing the truth. Whether one can be saved depends on whether they can accept the truth. Aside from this, there is one thing that God considers even more important, and that is people's conscience and humanity. If, within your humanity, there is no conscience, no integrity, and no reason—that is, when something befalls you, your conscience and rationality cannot function normally, cannot restrain and regulate your actions, cannot correct your intentions and views—then God will definitely do nothing. For God to change you, He first allows your conscience and rationality to function. When your conscience feels reproach, you will ponder, "What I am doing is wrong; how would God view me?" and this will lead you to further seeking and proactive, positive entry. However, if one lacks even this initial step, does not possess conscience, and there is fundamentally no reproach in their heart, then what will God do when they are faced with something? God will do nothing. So, what is the foundation upon which all these words God speaks, and all the demands and truths that God teaches people, are based? They are based on the premise that people have conscience and rationality. As for the man mentioned earlier, if he had had conscience and possessed a certain level of rationality, what actions would he have taken after seeing that bottle of cough syrup? What behaviors would he have exhibited? When he had this thought: "This was given to God, so it should be pretty good; instead of letting God drink it, why don't I drink it?" what would he have done then if he had conscience? Would he have opened the bottle and taken the first sip? (No.) How would this "no" have come about? (From having a sense of conscience.) Controlled by his conscience, it would come into play, and there would have been no next step to this matter; he would not have taken that first sip. The outcome of the situation would be completely reversed, and the ending would be entirely different. On the contrary, however, he did not have conscience or rationality—he lacked them absolutely—so what happened as a result? After conceiving such thoughts and with no restraint from his conscience, he unscrupulously opened the bottle and took the first sip. Not only did he feel no reproach or self-accusation afterward, but he actually enjoyed it. He thought he'd gotten away with it: "Look how clever I am, seizing the opportunity. You're all fools; you don't understand these things. Experience always trumps youth! None of you had this idea, none of you had the cheek to do this, but I did. What's the worst that can happen? I've already taken the first sip; who's to know?" He felt he'd come out ahead, and felt satisfied inside; he even thought he was being favored, that this was God's grace. Once he made this mistake, he kept repeating it, and it spiraled out of control, continuing until he finished the whole bottle. This whole time, his conscience never felt any selfaccusation or reproach. His conscience and rationality never told him, "This doesn't belong to you; even if God doesn't drink it, even if God throws it away, or gives it to a dog or a cat, as long as God hasn't said it's for you, then you shouldn't use it; it's not for you to enjoy." His conscience didn't tell him this because he had no conscience. What is a person with no conscience? They are defined as beasts. People with no conscience behave this way; they conceive such thoughts at the outset, and continue in this manner until the end, without a shred of reproach from their conscience. It may be that by now this fellow has long since forgotten the incident; or, if he has a good memory, he may still remember it and think he did the right thing at the time. He never thinks this was the wrong thing to do, and does not realize the severity and nature of what he did. He cannot recognize it. Is God's classification of such people accurate? (Yes.) When God classifies, exposes, and casts out such people, giving them this kind of outcome, on what principles and on what basis does He classify them? (On the basis of their nature essence.) Does a person lacking a sense of conscience and rationality possess the conditions to accept and practice the truth? Do they have such an essence? (No.) Why do we say they don't? When they start expressing their views on this matter, deep down in their heart, where is their God? Who is the God in their heart? Where does He stand? Do they have God in their heart? We can say with certainty that such a person does not have God in their heart. What is the implication of not having God in one's heart? (They are a nonbeliever.) That's right. They are not a genuine believer in God; they are not a brother or sister; they are simply a nonbeliever. What behaviors of theirs show they are a nonbeliever? Without God in their heart, they act and speak entirely according to their own whims, based on their own notions, imaginings, and preferences, without the influence of conscience. When they don't understand the truth, their conscience does not stir; they act purely based on their own preferences, solely for their personal advantage and benefit. Is there any room for God in their heart? None at all. Why do I say that? Because the motivation, origin, direction, and even the manifestations of their actions and words are all aimed at serving their own interests; they act and speak based on what they believe will be beneficial for themselves. Everything they consider is geared toward their own interests and objectives, and they operate without feeling any reproach and without exercising restraint. Judging by this behavior, what do they treat God as? (Air.) Exactly, that's spot on. If they could feel God's presence, that God scrutinizes the heart of man, that God is beside people, continually examining them, would their actions lack any restraint? Would they demonstrate such reckless audacity? Absolutely not. Here arises a question: Does the God they believe in actually exist? (No.) That's the essence of the issue. The God they believe in doesn't exist; their God is simply air. Therefore, no matter how they verbally claim what God is like, no matter how they pray to God, regardless of how many years they have believed or what they have done or how much they have sacrificed, their nature is fully exposed based on their speech and behavior, their attitude toward God, and their attitude toward all things related to God. They treat God like air; isn't this blaspheming God? (Yes.) Why is this considered blasphemy? They think, "They say God scrutinizes the heart of man—but where is God? Why haven't I felt this? They also say that stealing offerings will be punished by God, but I haven't seen anyone suffer retribution for stealing offerings." They deny God's existence; this is blaspheming God. They say, "God doesn't even exist; how could He be doing any work? How could He be saving people? How has He reproached people? Who has He ever punished? I've never seen it happen, so anything offered to God can be used freely. If I happen to come across it today, it's mine—I'll consider it God's way of favoring me. Whoever sees it or comes across it, it's theirs; that's who God has shown favor to." What kind of logic is this? This is the logic of Satan, of robbers; this is one's devilish nature coming out. Does such a person have genuine faith? (No.) After listening to so many sermons, they spout such a deluge of devilish words; do they have any foundation in the truth at all? (No.) So what did they get out of listening to all those sermons? They haven't accepted God's words, they don't regard God's words as the truth, and they do not treat God as God. That's all there is to it.

Some people do indeed believe in their hearts that there is a God and have not the slightest doubt about God's incarnation. But although they have followed Him for several years, suffered some hardships, and paid some price, they have not the slightest understanding of God deep within their hearts. In reality, what they believe in is still a vague God, an imagined God; their definition of God is merely air. How does God treat these people? He simply ignores them. Some people ask: "If God ignores them, why do they remain in the house of God?" They are rendering service. How should rendering service be conceptualized? One who renders service has no interest in the truth, or rather, they have such poor caliber that they cannot reach it. They treat God and the truth as something empty and vague, but in order to gain blessings, they can only rely on exerting some effort in exchange. Although outwardly they do not directly resist God, curse God, or oppose God, their essence is still that of Satan's ilk—that which denies and resists God. Anyone who does not love the truth is no good, God has decided in His heart not to save such people. For those whom God does not intend to save, would He still get serious with them? Would God say to them, "You don't understand this aspect of the truth, you need to listen carefully; you don't understand that aspect of the truth, you need to put in more effort and ponder it"? Furthermore, God knows these people do not understand the truth and do not treat God as God. Should God show them some miracles and wonders to make them aware of His existence, or enlighten and illuminate them more so they know there is a God? Would God act this way? (No.) God has principles for doing these things; He doesn't act this way toward just anyone. For those who can accept the truth, God is always working. What is God's attitude toward those who cannot accept the truth or are not able to reach it? (He ignores them.) According to people's notions, if God ignores someone, then this person wanders around like a beggar. One cannot see them pursuing the truth, nor can one see any action of God on them; they are merely rendering service, and they do not understand the truth. Is that all there is to it? In fact, these people can also enjoy some of God's grace and blessings. When they find themselves in dangerous situations, God will also keep them safe. When they are seriously ill, God will also heal them. He may even give them some special talents, or in some special circumstances, God may perform some miraculous acts on them, or do some special things. That is to say, if these people can really expend themselves for God and render service well without causing disturbances, God does not discriminate against them. What are people's notions regarding this matter? "God won't save these people, so He's just going to use them as He pleases and discard them afterward." Is this how God will act? It is not. Don't forget who God is; He is the Creator. Among all humankind, whether they are believers or unbelievers, from any denomination or ethnicity, in God's eyes, they are all His created beings. That's why the Lord Jesus said, "For He makes His sun rise on the evil and on the good." This statement is a principle for how God—the Creator—acts. Regardless of what outcome God ultimately bestows upon someone based on their essence, or whether God will save or not save them before giving them that outcome, no matter their essence, as long as they can do some tasks and render some service in God's house and for God's work, God's grace remains unchanged; He will still treat them according to His principles, without any partiality. This is God's love, the principle of His actions, and His disposition. However, according to the essence of these people, their views and attitudes toward God are always that they consider Him to be vague and nebulous, as if He exists and yet does not. They can neither recognize the real existence of God, nor can they experience it, and ultimately they are still not sure about God's true existence. So, all God can do for them is to extend as much benevolence and righteousness as possible, providing them some grace, giving them some blessings and protection in this life, allowing them to feel the warmth of God's house, and to enjoy God's grace, mercy and lovingkindness. And that's it—that's all the blessings they will receive in this lifetime. Some people say: "Since God is so tolerant and they also enjoy God's grace and blessings, wouldn't it be better to take it a step further and let them receive God's salvation too?" That is a human notion, God doesn't act like that. Why doesn't He? Can you put God into the heart of someone whose heart has no place for Him? You cannot. No matter how much truth you fellowship to them or however many words you say, it won't matter; it won't change their notions and imaginings about God. Therefore, all God can do for this kind of person is to provide some grace, blessings, care, and protection. There are some who say: "Since they can enjoy God's grace, if God further enlightens and illuminates them, won't they then recognize the real existence of God?" Can such people understand the truth? Can they practice the truth? (No.) If they can't practice the truth, this fixes them as those who cannot be saved. Therefore, God will not engage in pointless or useless work. Some people say: "That's not right. Sometimes they also encounter discipline or have some enlightenment from God and gain some truth from Him." This again relates to God's work. What must those whom God wants to save possess in order to be saved by God, in order to be an object of His salvation? People should understand this. God knows this too; He doesn't save just anyone. Even if God displays some miracles, wonders, and mightiness to make people acknowledge Him, can these people thus be saved? That's not how it goes. God has standards for saving people; one must possess genuine faith and also love the truth. Therefore, the work God does on people involving judgment, chastisement, trials, and refinement also has its standards. Some people say: "We often encounter judgment and chastisement. Is facing judgment and chastisement, trials and refinement a sign that we will be saved by God?" Is it so? (No.) How can you be sure it's not? Since some people don't meet the conditions for being saved by God, would God still impose judgment, chastisement, trials, and refinement on them? This raises a question about whom God imposes His judgment, chastisement, trials, and refinement on; it involves people's misunderstandings too. Tell Me, can a person who doesn't even know who God is, where God is, or whether God even exists, receive God's judgment and chastisement? Can a person who regards God as mere air receive God's judgment and chastisement? Can someone whose heart is entirely devoid of God receive God's trials and refinement? Definitely not. So, what might such people encounter at times? (Discipline.) That's right, discipline. Those who regard God as mere air, who fundamentally do not recognize or believe in the existence of God, will definitely not receive God's judgment and chastisement or His trials and refinement. It can be said that people with such an essence and with such behaviors are not the objects of God's salvation. They cannot receive God's salvation, but it's not that God does not save them—it is decided by their nature essence that is sick of the truth and hates the truth. They lack the correct attitude of loving and accepting the truth, and thus they don't meet the conditions for being saved. Then how does God treat them when they infiltrate God's household hoping for blessings? Apart from providing some blessings, grace, and offering care and protection, what methods does God use to fulfill His role as the Creator? God issues reminders, warnings, and exhortations through His words. Subsequently, He deals with, prunes, reproaches, and disciplines them; the work God does on them ends there, it is all within this scope. What is the effect of these acts of

God on people? It allows them to dutifully abide by restrictions, to behave decently while rendering service in God's house, without causing disturbances or doing evil. Can what God does make such people loyally fulfill their duty? (No.) Why not? Can the grace, blessings, care, and protection they receive—along with the reminders of God's words, being dealt with and pruned, the chastening and discipline, and so on—bring about a change in their disposition? (No.) They can't bring a change in their disposition, so what effect does God's work on them achieve? It makes them somewhat restrained in their behavior, helps them follow the rules, and makes them have some human likeness. Moreover, it makes them comparatively obedient; they will reluctantly accept being dealt with and pruned for the sake of God's grace and blessings, and they will be able to do things according to the rules and the administrative decrees of God's house, and that's all. Does achieving all this mean they are practicing the truth? They still fall short of that, because what they do is basically just according to the principles in the administrative decrees of God's house, as well as some rigid guidelines. It's just a change in behavior, nothing more. So can one say that, since these people have changed their behavior, it would be even better to allow them to change their disposition as well? (They aren't capable of that.) They aren't capable of that, they cannot achieve it—this is one reason. And what is the most major reason? It is that they fundamentally do not have God in their hearts; they don't believe in the existence of God. So, for such people, can they understand God's words? Some of them can, and they say, "God's words are good, but unfortunately, I can't put them into practice. Practicing them feels even more agonizing than undergoing open heart surgery." When their own interests are compromised, or when they have to act against their will, they feel utterly disoriented and cannot follow through. Even if they thoroughly exhaust themselves, they just can't put God's words into practice. Additionally, they never acknowledge or accept the fact that God's words are the truth. They can't absorb this; they don't understand why God's words are the truth. For instance, when God tells people to be honest, they say, "Fine, I'll be an honest person if You say so, but why is being an honest person considered the truth?" They don't know and can't accept it. When God says people should obey Him, they question, "Is there money to be made in obeying God? Does God grant blessings for obeying Him? Can it alter one's destination?" They don't think anything God says or does is the truth. They have no idea what the significance of God's words and requirements for man is and can't discern what actions are correct and in line with the truth principles. Everything that comes from God—the identity of God, the essence of God, God's words, God's demands—all these things, in their view, cannot be determined as God's possessions and being. They don't know that God is the Creator; they don't understand what the Creator is, or what God is. Isn't this problematic? But this is exactly how some people behave. Others say: "That can't be right. If they have these thoughts and views, how can they still willingly perform their duties in the house of God?" The term "willingly" should be in quotes here. How should this be explained? In one sense, they perform their duties because they are compelled by circumstances or because of their need for blessings; in another, they feel they have no other choice but to reluctantly go along with it for the time being, performing some duties and exerting a little effort. In their hearts, they believe that this is what they should do, but because they're not interested in the truth, they can only exert effort and perform duties in exchange for God's blessings. With this mindset, can they accept the truth? (No.) They don't even understand what the truth is, so how could they accept it?

God's work of judgment in the last days is to bring an end to this age. Whether or not one can be saved critically depends on whether they can accept God's judgment and chastisement, and whether they can accept the truth. Some people acknowledge that God's words are the truth, but they do not accept the truth. For them to accept the truth is as if they were to have a heart transplant; this is how agonizing they would find it. Given the way this kind of person treats the truth, refusing to accept it no matter what, God isn't the One to blame for not saving them—only they can be blamed for not accepting the truth; they do not have this blessing. God's saving people from Satan's influence is not as simple as people imagine. In one respect, those who believe in God must accept being chastened, pruned, and dealt with through God's words; this is one stage. In another, they must also accept God's judgment and chastisement, trials and refinement. Judgment and chastisement are one stage; trials and refinement are yet another. Some people can reluctantly accept being pruned and dealt with, thinking they've achieved submission, and then make no further progress and no longer strive toward the truth. Others particularly love the truth and can endure any pain to obtain the truth. They can not only endure the chastening and correction of God's words but can also enter into the stage of accepting God's judgment and chastisement. They feel that accepting God's judgment and chastisement is God's exaltation, God's love, and a glorious matter; they do not fear suffering. These people, after experiencing judgment and chastisement, can also accept trials and refinement and still pursue the truth. Regardless of how great the trials and refinement are, they can still see God's love, and can offer themselves to satisfy God. No matter how much they are pruned and dealt with, they don't consider it hardship; instead, they feel that this is an even greater love from God. After experiencing many more trials and refinement, they finally achieve thorough purification and perfection. This is to experience God's work to the highest phase. Now tell Me, is there a difference between those who believe in God and only experience the one stage of God's chastening and correction through His words, and those who experience two stages—God's judgment and chastisement, as well as trials and refinement? There is certainly a difference. For some people, God stops after only chastening and correcting them, leaving the rest to their own choice and awareness. If they do not accept the truth and do not choose the right path, what does this indicate? It can be said that God has no way of saving such people. Some people often talk about suffering work, suffering prospects, suffering a house, suffering a partner, suffering affections—everything for them is a matter of suffering, and what is the final result? (It is unrelated to the truth.) That's right, it is unrelated to the truth and unrelated to God's work. What you're doing in this case is just aimlessly suffering; you're merely struggling and letting time pass by, without any process of praying to God or seeking the truth. That's not the kind of "suffering" involved in refinement, because it is not God's work and has nothing to do with Him. You're just suffering yourself, not undergoing God's refinement. Yet you still think it's God refining you; you're being overly optimistic. That's just wishful thinking! You're not even qualified to be refined by God. You haven't even passed through the stage of chastisement and judgment, and you expect God to put you through trials and refinement? Is that even possible? Isn't that a pipe dream? Can ordinary people endure trials and refinement? Is it something an ordinary person can accept? Is it something God bestows upon an ordinary person? Absolutely not. After God corrects a person, if that individual, due to their arrogant disposition, their intransigence, deceit, wickedness, or any other disposition, is judged, disciplined, or explicitly chastened by God in one or many matters, making them realize why they're being disciplined by God—and, consequently, they develop a genuine understanding of God and of themselves, their disposition undergoes genuine change, and then gradually they gain true submission to the truth—only this process is the one by which God judges and chastises people. On what basis does God perform this work? There is a condition: A person who receives such work must be able to perform their duty adequately in God's house. This adequacy requires only two things: obedience and loyalty. Firstly, the individual needs to have conscience and reason; only people with conscience and reason meet the conditions for accepting the truth. When such people with conscience and reason receive God's chastening and correction, they are able to seek the truth and submit. Only after this does God proceed with the work of judgment and chastisement. That is the sequence of God's work. However, if someone in God's house can never perform their duty loyally, shows not the slightest submission to God's sovereignty, and fails to perform their duties adequately, then when they face adversities, exposure, or being dealt with and pruned, at most what they experience is God's correction and discipline. They are not subject to God's judgment and chastisement, let alone trials and refinement. In other words, they are fundamentally not involved in God's work of perfecting people.

The content we just fellowshiped pertains to God's work of saving and perfecting people, the methods and objects of God's work, as well as which people God performs His work of judgment and chastisement, trials and refinements on. It also touched upon the degree of people's life entry when subjected to this work of God, and the kind of essence and conditions people must at least possess to accept God's judgment and chastisement. So, what are people's notions here? People think, "As long as one is following God, as long as one has accepted this step of God's work, they are bound to be subjected to God's judgment and chastisement. Then the trials and refinements from

God will also come soon after. Therefore, we often face trials and refinements, being pruned and dealt with, and are deprived of family, affections, status, and prospects. Subsequently, we continually suffer in terms of affections, status, and prospects." Are these statements accurate? (No.) People can turn a single word from God's words and work into what they believe to be a spiritual term—why is that? In fact, the way they suffer is all just a struggle, it's just letting time pass by; it has no significance whatsoever. But they regard it as trials and refinements, saying that it is God's refinement. This is a grave mistake; it is something people forcibly impose upon God, and it does not represent God's intentions at all. Isn't this a misunderstanding of God? It is indeed a misunderstanding. And how does a misunderstanding like this develop? Because people don't understand the truth, they develop such misunderstandings based on their own imaginings. Subsequently, they brazenly propagate and spread them everywhere, which eventually leads to various statements about "suffering." Thus, I often hear some people say, "Someone got replaced and then became negative; they are 'suffering status'!" Suffering status is not experiencing trials and refinements; it is just a person losing status, suffering emotional frustration, and struggling with inner pain during failure. Since what people call "suffering" and what God calls refinement are different, what does real refinement actually refer to? First of all, understand that God performs a lot of preparatory work before subjecting people to trials and refinements. For one, He selects people; He chooses the right individuals. Earlier we discussed what kind of person is considered right in the eyes of God and which conditions they must meet: Firstly, they must at least have conscience and reason in their humanity. Secondly, they must be able to perform their duties adequately, performing them with loyalty and obedience. Then, they have to undergo years of being dealt with and pruned, disciplined, and chastened. You may not be very clear about what discipline and chastening mean, as the concepts might not be very strong for you. They may seem relatively intangible and abstract to people. But when it comes to being dealt with and pruned, that is something people can hear and feel; there's specific language and a definite tone involved, so people know what's going on. If someone does something wrong, goes against principles, acts recklessly, or makes unilateral decisions that harm the interests of the house of God or the work of the church, and they are dealt with, then this is what it means to be dealt with and pruned. What about correction and discipline, then? For example, if someone is not fit to be a group leader and lacks loyalty, and does things that violate the truth principles or church regulations, and is subsequently replaced, is that correction? It is indeed a form of correction. Whether they are externally handled by the church or replaced by some leader, in God's eyes, it is His doing and is part of His work; it is a form of correction. Also, when people are in a good state, they usually are filled with light and can have fresh insights; however, when their work falls apart due to some states or specific reason and they are exposed, isn't this a form of correction? This is also a form of correction. Do these count as judgment and chastisement? At this point, they don't yet count as judgment and chastisement, so they certainly cannot be considered as refinements and trials. They are merely corrections received during the course of performing one's duties. The manifestations of correction sometimes include encountering illness or repeatedly bungling tasks, or losing one's way in matters they were once proficient in and not knowing what to do. This is all correction. Of course, sometimes correction comes through clues from nearby people or through the exposure of an event that makes one embarrassed, causing them to retreat into deep self-examination and reflection. This is also correction. Is receiving God's correction a good thing or a bad thing? (It's a good thing.) Theoretically speaking, it's a good thing. Whether people can accept it or not, it's a good thing, as it at least proves that God is taking responsibility for you, that God has not left you, and that God is working on you, giving you prompting and guidance. The fact that God is working on you confirms that God has no intention to give up on you yet. One implication of this is that God may continue to correct and discipline you, or, if your performance is good and you're on the right path, He will subject you to judgment and chastisement. But let's not get too far ahead; for now, God will correct and discipline you multiple times. Then, because you pursue the truth, because you have submission, and because you are the right person, God will subject you to judgment and chastisement; this is the initial step. Most people have already experienced being simply dealt with and pruned; only newcomers have not experienced this yet. Most of the time people act based on the feelings of their conscience, feeling internal reproach, sensing God's words prompting them in their ears or hearts: "I shouldn't do this, this is rebellious"; these are God's words prompting, exhorting, and warning them. There are various forms of being pruned and dealt with that people experience: It can come from leaders and workers, from brothers and sisters, from the Above, and even directly from God. Many people have experienced these, but fewer have experienced God's correction and discipline. What does fewer imply here? It implies that many more people are far from receiving God's judgment and chastisement—and what about God's trials and refinements? They are even further from these; the gap is even larger, the distance even greater. Before, people have thought: "God has judged and chastised me, giving me a blister in my mouth," "God has judged and chastised me, I made a mistake, said something wrong, and had a headache for days; now I understand what God's judgment and chastisement are"—aren't these misunderstandings? This kind of misunderstanding of God is the most common; most people misunderstand God in this way. This misunderstanding also produces some negative effects, making people feel that saying a single wrong word will result in God's discipline. This is purely a misunderstanding of God, and is utterly inconsistent with what God does. With such misunderstandings about God, can one ultimately meet God's requirements? They will definitely fall short.

Now, most people have experienced God's correction and discipline, have experienced being dealt with and pruned, and have received prompting and exhortation from God's words, but that's all. Here arises a question: Why haven't people experienced God's judgment and chastisement even after experiencing up to this step? Why don't being dealt with and pruned, the prompting of God's words, or discipline and correction count as judgment and chastisement? From the perspective of the prompting of God's words, being dealt with and pruned, and the correction and discipline that people have experienced, what result has been achieved? (They've gained constraints on their outward behavior.) Some changes have occurred in their behavior, but does this indicate a change in disposition? (No.) It does not represent a change in disposition. Some people say: "We've believed in God for so many years and listened to so many sermons, yet our dispositions have still not changed. Haven't we been wronged? We've only had a little change in behavior; isn't this so pitiful? When will God begin to save us? When will we receive salvation?" Let us discuss, then, what gains and changes have been made by those who have experienced these various aspects of God's work. Just now someone mentioned behavioral changes; this is a general statement. To be more specific, on first coming to the church and taking up their duties, people have not been dealt with or pruned, and they are as prickly as a pear, wanting to have the final say on things. They think to themselves: "Now that I believe in God, I have rights and freedom in the church, so I'll act as I see fit." Eventually, once they have undergone a round of being dealt with, pruned, and disciplined, and once they've read God's words, listened to sermons, and heard fellowshiping on the truth, they no longer dare to behave in this way. Actually, they haven't become completely compliant; they've just gained a smidgeon of sense and have come to understand some doctrines. When others say things that align with the truth, they can acknowledge their correctness, and though they may not understand those things well, they can accept them. Are they not then much more compliant than they were? That they are able to accept these things demonstrates that their behavior has undergone some changes. How have these changes come about? They have arisen due to the exhortation and prompting, as well as the comfort, of God's words. Sometimes, such people need some discipline, to be dealt with and pruned, as well as some fellowship on principles, telling them that a thing must be done a certain way and cannot be done otherwise. They think: "I have to accept it. The truth is laid out there; who would dare object to it?" In God's house, God is great, the truth is great, and the truth reigns; with this theoretical foundation, some people have been awakened and gained understanding of what having faith in God is all about. Take someone who was originally barbaric and dissolute, completely unrestrained, and ignorant of rules, of belief in God, of God's house, of the church, and of the principles of performing one's duty: When such a person—who knows nothing—comes to God's house with kindness and enthusiasm, brimming with "great" aspirations and hopes, and is there prompted and exhorted, watered and fed, and dealt with and pruned by God's words, and is chastened and disciplined time and time again, gradually, some changes will occur in that person's humanity. What changes are those? They come to understand something of the principles of human conduct, and come to know that, in the past, they rather lacked human likeness; they were barbaric, arrogant, defiant, and indignant; they spoke unlike an actual human and acted without rules, and did not know to seek the truth; they thought having faith in God was a simple matter of doing whatever God asks and going wherever He says; that is, they carried with them a barbarous vigor, all the while believing that this was loyalty and love for God. Now, this person denies all those things and knows they were the products of human imagining, mere good behavior, and some even originated from Satan. God's believers should heed His words and place the truth above all else, letting the truth wield power in all things. In short, all people have already theoretically understood and acknowledged, and in the depths of their hearts accepted that these words God has spoken are correct—that they are the truth, the reality of positive things—regardless of how deeply these words have taken root in their hearts and no matter how great a role these words have played. Afterward, after undergoing a degree of intangible chastening and discipline, a measure of true faith arises in their consciousness. From their initial vague imaginings of God to the feeling that they have now—that there is a God, and that He is quite real—once people have had these feelings in their faith in God, then their thoughts and viewpoints, ways of looking at things, and moral standards, as well as their ways of thinking, will gradually begin to change. For instance, God requires people to be honest. Even though you can still lie and be deceitful, deep down you know that deceit is wrong, and that lying to and deceiving God is a sin, a wicked disposition—but you cannot help yourself. For instance, let's say you still currently have an arrogant disposition. Sometimes you cannot restrain yourself, you often reveal this disposition, and you often rebel against God, always wanting to be dominant and act unilaterally, having the final say. But you also know that this is a corrupt disposition, and you can pray to God about it. Even though there is no noticeable transformation, your behavior has gradually begun to change. Even without undergoing judgment and chastisement, and even though your disposition has not changed, the truth and the words of God are gradually brightening the depths of your heart, while also guiding and altering your behavior, making you live more and more like a human, gradually awakening your conscience. If you do something that betrays your conscience, you will feel uncomfortable in your heart. Bringing up that matter makes you feel something; you are not as numb as before, you feel regretful, and are willing to correct yourself. Even if you cannot immediately change your disposition in this regard, if it touches upon your state, you can be aware that you have this state; you have an awareness within, and this awareness is changing your behavior. Such a change is solely a change in behavior. Though it is happening and continues to happen, it does not represent a change in disposition; it is absolutely not a change in disposition. Some people might feel uneasy after hearing this, saying, "Such a significant change and it's still not a change in disposition? Then what is a change in disposition? What changes belong to dispositional change?" Let's leave that aside for now; let us continue discussing the changes that people have already achieved, which are the effects and results of God's words and all that He has done in people. People are working hard to change their thoughts and views that do not align with the truth. When faced with matters, they will have an awareness; they will compare the matter to the truth, saying, "This matter is not in line with the truth, but I cannot yet let go of my view; it is still there." You have only become aware and learned that your view does not align with God's words; can this prove that your view has already changed or been let go of? It cannot. Your view has not changed and has not been let go of, proving that your corrupt disposition remains intact and has not begun to change; it's only that your consciousness, your inner heart, has already accepted God's words and regarded them as the truth. But this is merely theoretical and a subjective wish—God's words have not yet become your life and not yet become your reality. When God's words become your reality, you will let go of your views, and you will treat all people, events, and things, as well as all that is happening around you, using the views of God's words.

What stage is your life entry at now? You have already come to know your views are wrong, but you still rely on your views to live, and you use them to measure God's work. You use your thoughts and views to pass judgment on the circumstances He puts in place for you, and you treat God's sovereignty by means of your thoughts and views. Is this in line with the truth principles? Is this not absurd? People only understand a tiny amount of doctrine, yet they wish to evaluate God's actions. Is this not incredibly arrogant? You now merely acknowledge that God's words are good and right, and, to look at your outward behavior, you do not do things that obviously go against the truth, much less do you do things that pass judgment on God's work. You are also able to submit to the work arrangements of God's house. This is going from being an unbeliever to a follower of God with the decency of a saint. You go from someone who lives decidedly by Satan's philosophies, and by Satan's concepts, laws, and knowledge to someone who, having heard God's words, feels they are the truth, accepts them, and pursues the truth, becoming someone who can embrace God's words as their life. It is that sort of process—nothing more. During this period, your behavior and ways of doing things will certainly undergo some changes. No matter how much you change, what manifests in you is, to God, no more than changes in your behavior and methods, changes in your innermost desires and aspirations. It is nothing more than changes in your thoughts and views. You may now be able to offer your life to God when you summon your strength and have the impulse, but you cannot achieve absolute obedience to God in a matter you find particularly distasteful. This is the difference between a change in behavior and a change in disposition. Perhaps, your kind heart enables you to lay down your life and everything for God, saying, "I'm ready and willing to give up my life's blood for God. In this life, I have no regrets and no complaints! I've given up on marriage, on worldly prospects, on all glory and riches, and I accept these circumstances that God has laid out. I can withstand all the ridicule and slander of the world." But the moment God lays out a circumstance that does not fit your notions, you can stand up and clamor against Him and resist Him. This is the difference between a change in behavior and a change in disposition. It is also possible that you can lay down your life for God and give up the people you love most, or the thing you love most, with which your heart can bear least to part—but when you are called to speak to God from the heart, and be an honest person, you find it guite difficult and cannot do it. This is the difference between a change in behavior and a change in disposition. Then again, perhaps you do not crave fleshly comfort in this life, neither eating fine food nor wearing fine clothes, each day working yourself ragged and to exhaustion in your duty. You can withstand all manner of pain brought to you by the flesh, but, if God's arrangements do not accord with your notions, you cannot understand, and grievances against God and misunderstandings about Him arise in you. Your relationship with God grows increasingly abnormal. You are always resistant and disobedient, unable to submit completely to God. This is the difference between a change in behavior and a change in disposition. You are willing to give up your life for God, so why can you not say an honest word to Him? You are willing to lay aside everything outside of yourself, so why can you not be singularly loyal to the commission God has given you? You are willing to give up your life for God, so when you rely on your feelings to do things and uphold your relations with others, why can you not reflect on yourself? Why can you not take a stand to uphold church work and the interests of God's house? Is this someone who lives before God? You have already made a vow before God to expend yourself for Him your whole life and to accept whatever suffering comes your way, so why does one instance of dismissal from your duty make you sink so much into negativity that you cannot crawl back out for many days? Why is your heart full of resistance, grievance, misunderstanding, and negativity? What is going on? This shows that your heart loves status the most, and this is connected to your vital weakness. Therefore, when you are dismissed, you fall down and cannot get up. This is sufficient to prove that although your behavior has changed, your life disposition has not. This is the difference between a change in behavior and a change in disposition.

Most people now exhibit some good behavior, but very few are seeking the truth or accepting it, and almost none have true obedience. From this perspective, many people are merely experiencing changes in behavior and shifts in their thoughts and views; they have the willingness and aspiration to accept and submit to God's sovereignty, and harbor no resentment in their hearts. Tell Me, have these people experienced God's judgment and chastisement? (No.) Unfortunately, the experiential testimonies you've previously shared don't involve God's judgment and chastisement; they all fall short of God's requirements. As long as you haven't yet experienced God's judgment and chastisement, then your disposition hasn't begun to change. If your disposition hasn't begun to change, then the changes you perceive are merely behavioral. Such behavioral changes are attributable to your own cooperation, they're due in part to your good humanity, and they are the effects of God's work. Do you really think that God will only go this far in saving people? (No.) Then what will God do next? What is the main work God engages in when saving people? (Judgment and chastisement.) The primary method God uses to save people is judgment and chastisement. But unfortunately. almost no one has yet been able to accept God's judgment and chastisement. Therefore, God's work of saving people, of perfecting them, and of changing their dispositions has not yet officially begun. Why hasn't it officially begun? Because this work of God can't yet be carried out upon people. Why can't it be carried out? Because, given people's current state, stature, and what they are currently capable of, they still fall far short of the standards required by God, so God can't proceed with His work. Does that mean God will cease His work? No, God is waiting. What is He also doing while waiting? He is purifying the church, cleansing it of disruptors and disturbers, antichrists, evil spirits, evil people, nonbelievers, those who do not truly believe in Him, and those who cannot even render service. This is called clearing the field; it is also called winnowing. Is clearing the field God's main work during this period? No, during this period, God will continue to work on you through the means of prompting with words, watering, nurturing, dealing with, pruning, correcting, and disciplining you. To what extent? Only once people possess the basic conditions to accept judgment and chastisement will God begin the work of judgment and chastisement. Now tell Me, based on your speculations and judgments, what conditions must people meet before God begins the work of judgment and chastisement? You can see that God does everything in its time. He does not work haphazardly. His management work follows the plan He has made, and He does everything in a step-by-step fashion, not haphazardly. And what of those steps? Each step of work God does on people must take effect, and when He sees it has, He does the next step of work. God knows how His work may take effect, what He must say and do. He does His work according to what people need, not haphazardly. Whatever work will be effective on people, God does it, and whatever is immaterial in terms of effectiveness, God assuredly does not do it. For instance, when there is need of negative object-lessons on which God's chosen people may develop their discernment, false Christs, antichrists, evil spirits, evil people, and disturbers and disruptors will appear in the church, on which others may develop their discernment. If God's chosen people understand the truth and can discern such people, then those people have rendered their service, and there is no longer value in their existing. At that time, God's chosen people will rise up to expose and report them, and the church will immediately cleanse them away. All God's work has its steps, and all those steps are arranged by God on the basis of what man needs in their life and their stature. What do people really need, and why do antichrists and evil people appear in the church? People are generally confused about these matters and don't understand what's going on with them. Some people, not understanding God's work, harbor notions, and even complain, saying, "How can antichrists appear in God's church? Why doesn't God attend to this?" Only when they read God's words stating that these occurrences are intended for people to learn lessons and develop discernment do they have an epiphany and understand God's intentions. Initially, people lack discernment toward evil people. When the church expels such individuals, people entertain notions; they think those who were expelled made many contributions and were capable of enduring hardship, and think they should not have been expelled. They then become resistant to what God has done. But after a period of experience, people gain an understanding of the truth and develop the ability to discern evildoers. Now, when an evildoer is expelled, they no longer entertain notions or resist. When they see an evildoer committing wicked deeds again, they can identify them, and everyone collaborates to report the individual and clear them out before any significant harm has been done. These evildoers then no longer have a foothold in God's house. How is this achieved? How does this discernment come about in people? It is God's doing. Without God's work, people couldn't understand these things. God's work follows a sequence, and the steps of this sequence are determined by what human life requires. But people themselves are unclear about what they actually need, they are muddleheaded. Therefore, God can only continue His work, arranging numerous lessons for people to learn from, enabling them to enter into the truth reality and achieve the results that He demands. Whether people understand or not, God tirelessly continues His work—this is God's love. It's just like how God prunes and deals with someone: If they make a mistake, God deals with them; if they make the mistake again, He deals with them again. If they are exposed again, God deals with them once more. He works patiently until the person truly gains understanding, is no longer numb, and becomes as sensitive as if they were touching a live wire when encountering similar situations again, no longer making mistakes. Then that is sufficient, and God will cease His work. When, upon encountering these matters again, you can handle them independently and in accordance with principles, God no longer needs to worry. This proves that you have understood God's words and God's truth, have embraced them in your heart, and they have become your life. At that point, God ceases His work. These are the steps of God's work, and after you've experienced them, you will see God's essence and wisdom; this is undeniable and 100 percent certain.

Just now, it was mentioned that the steps of God's work are related to people's dispositional change. God's work is not about letting people undergo a bit of behavioral change, understand some rules, and have some human likeness, and then declaring that a great success. If that were the case, the work would have already been concluded in the Age of Grace. What does God want? (People's dispositional change.) Correct, dispositional change is what people who are truly saved should possess. What God wants is not merely a change in people's behavior, but more importantly, a change in their disposition; this is the standard for being saved. Some behavioral changes were also mentioned just now, such as being able to forsake things and lay down one's life for God—these are clear behavioral changes. But if there isn't loyalty to God's commissions, if one can still act carelessly and perfunctorily, and there is still deception, this means that there hasn't yet been a change in disposition. People now are only commendable in behavior; they appear to better match the demeanor of a saint, they behave with more humanity, and they have some dignity and integrity. However, no matter how much someone demonstrates good behavior, if it is not related to practicing the truth, and not lived out from their conscience, reason, and normal humanity, then it has nothing to do with a change in disposition and is not what God wants. Looking at it this way, in terms of your current behavior, no matter how much you abide by the rules, no matter how compliant you are, no matter how you might lay down your life, or how great your aspirations are, have you been able to make God content? Have you met God's requirements? (No.) Is it that God's requirements are too high? Some people think, "People are so compliant now, how come they haven't met God's requirements yet?" What do you think, is this compliance genuine obedience? (No.) That's right. This compliance now is just having a bit of rationality, all of which is the result of God's discipline. It is entirely the effect achieved by God's discipline; it is only after God painstakingly spoke so many words that people's conscience was awakened, people's sense of conscience was stirred, and they began to live out some semblance of humanity, have some rules in doing things, know to inquire in whatever they do, and feel a bit of reproach when acting against principles. In short, changes in behavior do not meet the conditions for receiving God's judgment and chastisement; God does not want people's behavioral change. So, what does God want? He wants their dispositional change. And just what are the manifestations of dispositional change? To what extent must they change in various aspects to be qualified for God's judgment and chastisement? They must change to the extent that God can see this person's performance in all aspects—they especially can perform their duties adequately, and they can accept being pruned and dealt with, can seek the truth in everything, can follow God when faced with tribulations and trials, and fundamentally can accept and obey whatever God says; even when others do not supervise them, and when faced with temptations, they can refrain from doing bad things, not committing a bit of evil. In God's eyes, such people are up to standard; they are qualified to formally receive His judgment and chastisement, which is the further step of God's work of saving and perfecting them. What kind of signal, what kind of standard, is here—do you know? (What I thought of is, through God's correction and discipline, a person can gradually recover their conscience and reason and, coupled with some changes in their behavior, they can eventually be able to perform their duties loyally. God might then begin the work of judgment and chastisement on that person.) Do you all agree with this statement? (Yes.) Good, but this is only one condition. Before God carries out the work of judgment and chastisement on someone, God will evaluate this person. How does He evaluate them? God has several standards. First, He observes what attitude they have toward His commissions; that is, what attitude they have toward the duties they should perform, whether they can perform their duties wholeheartedly, to the best of their ability, and with loyalty. In short,

He observes whether people can meet the standard for adequate performance of duty this is the first aspect. This directly relates to the life of believing in God and the daily work people engage in. Why does God set this aspect as a condition, as a standard for evaluation? What is the reason behind it—do you know? When God entrusts a task to someone, the attitude of that person is crucial—it is how He evaluates them. This task is entrusted to them by God; how would a person with conscience treat it as opposed to a person without conscience? How would a rational person treat it as opposed to an irrational one? There is a distinction between these. Conscience and rationality are traits that one's humanity should possess. Aside from this, having just a bit of a sense of conscience or a bit of rationality is not sufficient. If people recover their conscience and rationality, do they then resemble humans? Have they thus attained the truth reality? No, it's still not enough; God also observes the path people walk during the period of performing their duty. What kind of path people walk can meet God's required standard? Firstly, to not commit evil and to have submission while performing duty is the minimum standard. If one is capable of committing evil, this person is completely done for; they are not the type of people God wants to save. Furthermore, in treating God's commissions, aside from handling them with conscience and rationality, there is a greater need to seek the truth and understand God's will. No matter the circumstances, regardless of whether the matter confronting you aligns with your notions and imaginings, you should maintain an attitude of submission. At this juncture, what God desires is your submissive attitude. If you merely acknowledge that God's words are all the truth and correct, is that an attitude of submission? Absolutely not. What is the practical side of an attitude of submission? It is this: You must bring yourself to accept God's words. Although your life entry is shallow, and your stature is insufficient, and your knowledge of the practical side of the truth is not yet deep enough, you are still able to follow God and submit to Him—that is an attitude of submission. Before you can achieve total submission, you must first adopt an attitude of submission, that is, you must accept God's words, believe they are right, take God's words as the truth and as the principles of practice, and be able to uphold them as rules even when you do not have a good grasp of the principles. That is a kind of attitude of submission. Because your disposition now still has not changed, if you want to achieve genuine submission to God, you first must have a mentality of submission and aspire to submit, saying, "I will submit no matter what God does. I do not understand much truth, but I know that when God tells me what to do, I will do it." God sees this as an attitude of submission. Some people say, "What if I was wrong to submit to God?" Is God capable of being in error? God is truth and righteousness. God does not make errors; there are just many things God does which do not line up with people's notions. You should say, "No matter whether what God does lines up with my own notions, I will just focus on listening, submitting, accepting, and following God. This is what I should do as a created being." Even if there are people who judge you as submitting blindly, you should not care. Your heart is sure that God is truth, and that you should submit. This is right, and that is the sort of mentality with which one should submit. Only people possessed of such a mentality can gain the truth. If you do not have a mentality like this, but say, "I don't suffer others irritating me. No one's going to fool me. I'm too shrewd and cannot be made to submit to anything! Whatever comes my way, I have to look into it and analyze it. Only when it aligns with my views, and I can accept it, will I submit"—is that an attitude of submission? It is not an attitude of submission; it is a lack of a submissive mentality, with no intention in one's heart to submit. If you say, "Even if it is God, I'll still have to look into it. Even kings and gueens get the same treatment from me. What You're saying to me is useless. It's true that I am a created being, but I'm no dummy—so don't treat me like one," then it is over for you; you lack the conditions to accept the truth. Such people lack any rationality. They do not possess normal humanity, so are they not a beast? Without rationality, how can a person achieve submission? To achieve submission, one must first be possessed of a submissive mentality. Only with a mentality of submission can a person have any rationality to speak of. If they do not have a mentality of submission, then they do not have any rationality. People are created beings; how can they see the Creator clearly? All of humanity has not been able to decipher one of God's ideas for 6,000 years, so how can people instantly understand what God is doing? You cannot understand. There are many things which God has been doing for thousands of years, and which God has already revealed to humanity, but if He did not spell it out for people, they would still not understand. Maybe you understand His words in a literal sense now, but you will only truly understand a little twenty years later. This is how big a gap there is between people and what God demands. In light of this, people should possess rationality and a mentality of submission. People are just ants and maggots, yet they wish to see the Creator clearly. This is a most unreasonable thing. Some people always complain that God does not tell His mysteries to them, and does not explain the truth directly, always making people seek. But saying these things is not right, and is unreasonable. How many of all these words that God has told you do you understand? How many of God's words can you put into practice? God's work always happens in steps. If God had told people 2,000 years ago about His work of the last days, would they have understood? In the Age of Grace, the Lord Jesus became the likeness of sinful flesh, and was a sin offering for all humanity. If He were to tell people at that time, who would understand? And now, people like you understand some conceptual theories, but as for truths like God's real disposition, God's will in loving humanity, and the origin of and plan behind things God did at that time, people will never ever be capable of understanding. This is the mystery of the truth; this is the essence of God. How can people see it clearly? It is completely unreasonable for you to wish to see the Creator clearly. You are too arrogant and overestimate your abilities. People should not wish to see God clearly. It is already good if they can understand some of the truth. As far as you are concerned, understanding a bit of the truth is already a sufficient accomplishment. Therefore, is it rational to have a mentality of submission? This is absolutely a rational thing to do. A mentality and attitude of submission is the minimum of what every created being should possess.

Achieving adequate and loyal performance of one's duty, and possessing a mentality of submission—how long does this take? Does it require a set number of years? There isn't a set time frame, and it depends on one's pursuit, their aspiration, and the degree of their longing for the truth. It also depends on their inherent conscience, reason, caliber, and insight. Upon acquiring an attitude of submission, immediately thereafter, there will be further changes in one's speech, actions, and behavior. What are these changes? In God's eyes, you are basically an honest person now. What does being basically an honest person mean? It means that the component of intentional lying in your speech and behavior has diminished; eighty percent of what you say is truthful. Sometimes, due to scumminess, circumstances, or some other reason, you inadvertently lie, and it feels as uncomfortable as having swallowed a dead fly; you feel uneasy for several days. You admit your mistake and repent before God, and afterward, there are changes—your lies become fewer and fewer, and your state improves. In God's eyes, you are basically an honest person. Some people say, "If someone is basically honest, hasn't their disposition changed?" Is that the case? No, this is just a change in behavior. In God's eyes, being able to be an honest person involves more than just a change in conduct and behavior; it also involves essential changes in one's mentality and views on matters. They no longer have an intention to lie or deceive, and there's absolutely no falsehood or deception in what they say and do. Their words and deeds become more and more truthful, with more and more honest words. For instance, when asked if you have done something, even if admitting it would lead to getting slapped or being punished, you are still able to tell the truth. Even if admitting it entails bearing significant responsibility, facing death or destruction, you are able to tell the truth and are willing to practice the truth to satisfy God. This indicates that your attitude toward God's words has become quite firm. No matter when, choosing any one of the standards of practice required by God has become hardly an issue for you; you can naturally attain and put it into practice without the constraints of external circumstances, the guidance of leaders and workers, or the sense of God's scrutiny beside you. You are able to do these things quite effortlessly on your own. Without the constraints of external circumstances, and not out of fear of God's discipline, nor fear of the reproach of your conscience, and certainly not out of fear of others' ridicule or supervision—not because of any of these—you can proactively examine your own behavior, measure its correctness, and evaluate whether it complies with the truth and satisfies God. At that point, you have basically met the standard of being an honest person in God's eyes. Being basically an honest person is the third basic condition for accepting God's judgment and chastisement.

We just discussed the three conditions for accepting God's judgment and chastisement: The first is performing one's duty adequately, the second is having an attitude of submission, and the third is basically being an honest person. How is this third condition evaluated? What are the criteria? (One intentionally lies less frequently, and tells the truth more often.) It means being able to tell the truth most of the time; you should all be able to evaluate this one, right? Being an honest person is the third condition for accepting God's judgment and chastisement. The second is having an attitude of submission, which includes some details, mainly not scrutinizing or analyzing God's work, but only having a submissive mentality. Furthermore, it entails pursuing being an honest person, reaching a point where your lies decrease, and most of the time you can speak truthfully, expressing your true feelings. The most important aspect here is people's subjective cooperation, which means making progress actively, and striving to reach for the truth. Having a submissive mentality is a result achieved on the subjective front; being able to become an honest person—being basically honest—is also a subjective matter, and is the result of one's diligent pursuit. Accepting God's judgment and chastisement has one more primary condition. I'll first provide you with a clue, and if you think along the lines of what I'm saying, you'll be able to grasp it. From the beginning of believing in God to the end, have people made many mistakes in this life? Have there been many acts of rebelliousness against God? (There have been many.) So what should someone do when they make a mistake, or when they are rebellious? (They must have a repentant heart.) Having a repentant heart is a sign of a person with conscience and reason. Having conscience and reason are the minimum qualities a recipient of God's salvation should possess; those lacking conscience and reason cannot attain God's salvation. If someone never knows to repent after making mistakes, what kind of thing are they? Can a person who never knows to repent follow God to the end? Can they have real change? (No.) Why not? (Because they lack a repentant heart.) Exactly, and this brings us to the final condition: One must have a repentant heart. While following God, because of their foolishness and ignorance and due to their various corrupt dispositions, people often reveal themselves to be disobedient, and sometimes misunderstand or complain against God. They go astray, and some even form notions about God, become negative and slacken in their work for a time, and lose their faith. Disobedient behaviors arise in every stage of people's lives. They have God in their hearts and know He is at work when something happens, yet they sometimes cannot get their heads around that fact. Though they are able to submit superficially, they simply cannot accept it deep down. What makes it evident that deep down they cannot accept it? One way this manifests is that, despite knowing everything, they are simply unable to put aside what they have done and come before God to admit to their mistakes and say, "God, I was wrong. I won't act like that anymore. I will seek Your will and do as You'd have me do. I didn't use to heed You; my stature was small, I was foolish and ignorant, and frequently disobedient. I know that now." What attitude do people have if they can admit to their mistakes? (They want to make a turnaround.) If people have conscience and reason, and yearn for the truth, yet they never know to selfreflect and make a turnaround after making mistakes, believing instead that the past is past and feeling certain that they are not wrong, then what sort of disposition does this show? What sort of behavior? What is the essence of such behavior? (Being intransigent.) Such people are intransigent and, come what may, that is the path they will follow. God does not like such people. What did Jonah say when he expressed God's words to the Ninevites? ("Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown" (Jonah 3:4).) How did the Ninevites react to these words? When they saw that God was going to destroy them, they hastened to take up sackcloth and ashes, confess their sins to Him, and leave the path of evil. This is what it means to repent. If man is able to repent, it presents man with an enormous opportunity. What opportunity is that? It is the opportunity to keep on living. Without real repentance, it would be hard to continue forward, whether in your performance of duty or in your pursuit of salvation. At every stage—whether when God is disciplining or correcting you, or when He is reminding and exhorting you—as long as a conflict has occurred between you and God, yet you do not make a turnaround, and continue to cling to your own ideas, viewpoints, and attitudes, then even though your steps are headed forward, the conflict between you and God, your misunderstandings of Him, your complaints and rebelliousness against Him are not rectified, and your heart does not turn around. Then God, for His part, will cast you out. Although you have not let go of the duty at hand, and you still keep to your duty and have a bit of loyalty for what God has commissioned, and people see this as acceptable, the dispute between you and God has formed a permanent knot. You have not used the truth to resolve it and gain a true understanding of God's will. As a result, your misunderstanding of God deepens, and you always think that God is in the wrong and you are being treated unjustly. This means you have not made a turnaround. Your rebellion, your notions, and your misunderstanding of God still persist, which leads you to have a disobedient mentality, to be always rebellious and oppose God. Is this kind of person not someone who rebels against God, resists God, and stubbornly refuses to repent? Why does God place such importance on people making a turnaround? With what attitude should a created being regard the Creator? An attitude that acknowledges that the Creator is right, no matter what He does. If you do not acknowledge this, that the Creator is the truth, the way, and the life will be but hollow words to you. If that is the case, can you still attain salvation? You cannot. You would be unqualified; God does not save people like you. There are some who say, "God asks that people have a repentant heart, and that they know to make a turnaround. But there are many things where I haven't made a turnaround. Do I still have time to do it?" Yes, there is still time. Additionally, some say, "In what things do I have to turn around? Things in the past are gone and forgotten." If your disposition does not change even for a single day, and if even a single day goes by without your coming to know what in your actions does not accord with the truth and what cannot accord with God, then that knot that exists between you and God has not yet been untied; the matter has not been resolved. This disposition is within you; the idea, viewpoint, and attitude that disobeys God is inside you. As soon as the right circumstances appear, this viewpoint of yours will once again emerge, and your conflict with God will flare up again. Thus, though you may not rectify the past, you must rectify things that will happen in the future. How are they to be rectified? You must make a turnaround and put aside your ideas and intentions. Once you have this intent, yours will naturally also be an attitude of submission. However, to speak a bit more precisely, this refers to people making a turnaround in their attitude toward God, the Creator; it is a recognition and affirmation of the fact that the Creator is the truth, the way, and the life. If you can turn yourself around, this demonstrates that you can put aside those things you think are right, or those things that mankind—which is corrupt—thinks collectively to be right; and, instead, you are acknowledging that God's words are the truth and positive things. If you can have this attitude, it proves your recognition of the identity of the Creator and of His essence. This is how God views the issue, and He therefore considers man's turnaround especially important.

There are some who say, "If a person has done nothing wrong, what do they need to turn around for?" Even if you have not done anything wrong at the moment, you must first understand the truth of repentance. This is something you should possess. Once you understand the truth, you will discover that some things you did were inappropriate, and you will uncover problems which have to do with your intentions and mentality—that is, problems with your disposition. These things will float to the surface without you realizing them and make you see that your relationship with God is actually not a simple one between humans and God. God is still God, but you are a created being who does not meet the standard. In those matters in which people have failed to stay in their proper places, and have failed to accomplish what they ought to—that is to say, when they fail in their duty—it will become a knot within them. This is an exceedingly practical problem, and one that has to be resolved. So how to resolve it? What kind of attitude should people have? Before all else, they must be willing to turn themselves around. And how should this willingness to make a turnaround be put into practice? For example, a person is a leader for a couple years, but because they are of low caliber they do not do their job well, cannot see any situation clearly, do not know how to use the truth to solve problems, and cannot do any real work; therefore, they are dismissed. If, after being dismissed, they are able to obey, continue performing their duty, and are willing to turn around, what should they do? First of all, they should understand this, "God was right to do as He did. My caliber is so very poor, and for so long I've done no real work and instead only held up the work of the church and the brothers' and sisters' life entry. I'm lucky that the house of God did not expel me outright. I've really been pretty shameless, hanging onto my position all this time and even believing myself to have done such great work. How senseless of me!" To be able to feel self-loathing and a sense of remorse: is it or is it not an expression of the willingness to make a turnaround? If they are able to say this, it means they are willing. If they say in their hearts, "For so long, in my position as leader, I have always striven for the benefits of status; I was always preaching doctrine and equipping myself with doctrine; I did not strive for life entry. Only now that I've been replaced do I see just how inadequate and lacking I am. God did the right thing, and I must obey. In the past, I had status, and the brothers and sisters treated me well; they would surround me wherever I went. Now no one takes any notice of me, and I am forsaken; this is my due, it is the retribution I deserve. Moreover, how could a created being have any status before God? No matter how high someone's status, it is neither the end nor the destination; God gives me a commission not so that I can throw my weight around or enjoy my status, but so I can perform my duty, and I should do whatever I can. I should have an attitude of obedience toward God's sovereignty and the arrangements of the house of God. Although obedience may be hard, I must obey; God is right to do as He does, and even supposing I had thousands, tens of thousands, of excuses, none of them would be the truth. Obeying God is the truth!" these are exact expressions of the willingness to turn around. And if one were to possess all of these, how might God appraise such a person? God would say that this is a person of conscience and reason. Is this assessment high? It is not overly high; having conscience and reason alone falls short of the standards of being made perfect by God—but as far as this kind of person is concerned, it's already no small accomplishment. Being able to submit is precious. After this, how the person seeks to make God change His view of them depends on which road they choose. If they have not truly repented, and because they have no status, they are not loyal in their duty and always careless and perfunctory, then it is completely over for them; they will be cast out. If they still harbor grievances, complaining, "During my time as a leader, I suffered so much, and even if there were no merits, there was hard work. They say I didn't do practical work, but I did quite a lot. Regardless of whether or not I achieved any results, at least I wasn't idle. Just because I wasn't idle, God shouldn't cast me out so casually. Even without status, I'm still being made to do this and that—isn't this toying with me?"—if after being replaced, they don't have any enthusiasm left to perform any duty, is there any loyalty or obedience here? They have no loyalty, no obedience, and no willingness to turn around; they have none of these. Isn't this pitiful? It's all too pitiful; they believed in vain all these years. Having listened to sermons for so many years, yet not practicing any truth, always lecturing others on words and doctrines, but unable to do anything themselves—this is how they believed in God; they preached guite a lot of doctrine to others, but in the end, they can't even resolve their own issues. It's so pitiful! And they still wish to receive God's judgment and chastisement? After being replaced, they still contend with God and suffer torment, showing no obedience whatsoever. Isn't this just blindly suffering? Your suffering is worthless! Putting aside everything else, and just looking at the fact that you became furious and confrontational when the church removed you from your position—just based on that alone, you're not worthy to be a human, not worthy to be a created being of God. So just what are you arguing for then? Whatever arguments you have are useless. You've believed for so many years, yet you lack even this modicum of obedience; where

are the fruits of your faith over the years? Pitiful, detestable, disgusting! You were given status and you treated it like an official role; does having status mean your disposition has changed? Isn't it just God's grace? God graced you with this commission, yet you took it as an official role—isn't that disgusting? Are there any officials in the house of God? Among the saints through the ages, none were officials. For two thousand years, people have worshiped Paul, but no one ever said Paul held any official title. Therefore, the term "official" does not hold up; it's neither a reward nor a commission from God, and you need to let go of it. If you constantly pursue being an official, will God approve of this? Will it allow you to achieve salvation? Definitely not. Just now we mentioned that to accept God's judgment and chastisement, one must have a willingness to turn around. Is this important? (Yes.) It's extremely important to have such an attitude! If you wish to establish a relationship of the Savior and the saved between you and the Creator, and you wish for God to save you, you must correct your position, and must ascertain the place and status of God in your heart. What is your position, then? (A created being.) Who is a created being? It's man, not a beast. At any time, you must remember that you are a created being, an ordinary human, and you mustn't forget your rightful place. When God gives you a bit of grace, a bit of blessing, you then lose sight of who you are. When, in His humbleness and hiddenness, God shares some heartfelt words to comfort you, He is elevating you; and yet you want to stand on equal footing with God, raising yourself up—what thing would do this? Would a human? (No.) God does not recognize a created being such as you—you can step aside! If God doesn't recognize you, will He perfect you? You don't meet the conditions to be made perfect by God. Hasn't the crux of the discussion been conveyed clearly by this point? Thus, having the willingness to reverse course is very important; it is a state of mind, and, at the same time, it's an attitude. This attitude is an important principle of practice that one should possess to receive God's salvation and perfection. Don't think of yourself as so great, so noble, nor assume that you are absolutely correct and infallible. You are not great, glorious, or correct; you are minuscule, lowly, a created being of mankind corrupted by Satan. You need to accept the Creator's salvation. You are not already saved, you are not perfect; you must possess this sense.

There are four conditions for accepting God's chastisement and judgment: adequate performance of duty, having a mentality of submission, being basically honest, and having a repentant heart. Remember these four conditions and compare yourselves against them when you encounter situations. If a situation involves submission, then practice submission. God's word requires people to have a submissive attitude; if you compare yourself to God's words and find a big disparity, what should you do? Do as God says, follow God's words without analyzing or arguing. If you try to argue, God will be disgusted with you. What will you do if God is disgusted with you? There's one remedial measure, which is to immediately reverse course. Don't hurt God's heart over a trivial matter and then continue to hurt God's heart and ignore Him. Humans are nothing; if you ignore God, He will not want you anymore. What do you do if God ignores you and does not want you? You say, "I'll reverse course. Don't abandon me, God, I can't make it without You." But just saying this is useless. God doesn't need your sweet talk; He'll look at your attitude, your practice, the path you'll walk afterward, and your performance. Don't think God is an ordinary person, whom you can move with a few sweet words; God isn't like that, He looks at your attitude. Once you've reversed course, God sees that you've gone from being intransigent to submissive, and can accept the truth, no longer contending with God. Your intransigence has undergone a change, you know who you are, and you recognize your God; closely following this, God will start to carry out some work on you. Some people say: "I haven't felt that God intends to do anything." Don't rely on your feelings. Are your feelings accurate? God has done so much work on you—have you felt any of it? Did you feel it when God was heartbroken? You didn't know anything—perhaps you were even feeling happy somewhere else. So, don't interpret God's feelings based on your own feelings, and don't measure God's feelings by your own feelings; it's useless. If God ignores you, and you feel nothing, and don't receive enlightenment or acknowledgment, what should you do? Remember one thing: You must continue to fulfill the responsibilities and duties a created being should fulfill, and you must still speak truthfully as you should. Don't revert back to your previous lies just because God ignores you or doesn't want you anymore, speaking now as you spoke back then; if you do this, you're completely done for. This is contending with and opposing God. You need to hold fast to your duty, and submit as you should. What's the benefit in this? When God sees you've reversed course, His heart will soften, and His wrath and anger toward you will gradually withdraw. Isn't the withdrawal of God's wrath a good sign for you? It means your turning point has arrived. When you stop living based on feelings, stop trying to scrutinize God's expressions, and stop making extravagant demands of God to make His position known, but instead live according to the words spoken by God, the duties and the principles of practice God has entrusted to you, and according to the path God has told you to practice and walk; if you live according to all of these, and regardless of how God treats you or whether He pays attention to you, you continue to do as you should—then God will approve of you. Why will He approve of you? Because no matter what God does to you, whether or not He pays attention to you, whether or not He grants you grace, blessings, illumination, enlightenment, care, or protection, and no matter how much of this you feel, you can still follow Him to the end. You have held fast to the position that a created being should hold without any change; you've taken God's words as the goal and direction of your life, and taken God's words as the truth and as the highest words of wisdom in your life. What is the essence of such behavior? It's recognizing in your heart that the Creator is your life, that He is your God. In this way, God is reassured, and you become a normal person living in the presence of God; one such as this possesses the basic conditions for a change in disposition. On this basis, can the understanding and changes achieved by people be considered a change in disposition? They still fall short. Therefore, you must possess an acknowledgment of the identity of the Creator, and also have a responsible attitude toward your own duty. Additionally, you need to have an attitude that can accept and submit to the truth. After possessing these qualities, God will then begin the work of judgment and chastisement on you. Being saved starts from this point. Some people say: "If we possess these qualities, does it mean our disposition has already changed? Having changed so much, what else is there for God to judge and chastise?" What does God judge and chastise? It is people's nature essence, which is their corrupt disposition. If one possesses these four conditions and is able to satisfy them, which aspect of their corrupt disposition has thoroughly changed? None of them. There has merely been a slight behavioral change, but it's not enough. There has not been a fundamental change. That is to say, before God begins His work of judgment and chastisement on you, your self-knowledge will always be superficial and surface-level. It will not match your corrupt essence; it is far from it, the gap is guite significant. Therefore, before God starts His work of judgment and chastisement, no matter how good, guileless, rule-abiding you think you are, or how submissive an attitude you think you have, you must know one thing: Your disposition has not yet formally begun to change. Your ways of practice and those methods of yours only indicate behavioral change, and constitute the basic humanity that a person who will be saved by God ought to possess. Honesty, submission, the ability to reverse course, loyalty—these are things that should exist within one's humanity. Of course, this also includes conscience and reason; you must possess these qualities before God carries out His work of judgment and chastisement. Once someone has all these four conditions—adequate performance of duty, a submissive mentality, being basically honest, and a repentant heart—God will commence His work of judgment and chastisement on that person.

Now, you should have some concept in your mind about how God specifically carries out the work of judgment and chastisement on people. For example, concerning wickedness, people often probe God, inexplicably want to scrutinize Him, and harbor suspicions, doubts, and questions about God's words. They speculate about what God's attitude toward people truly is, always wanting to know this. Is this not wicked? Do people currently know which of their states or behaviors display this kind of disposition? People are not clear. During the period of judging and chastising you, God will make you open up and lay bare yourself and your various states so that you gain clarity about them in your heart. Of course, when laying yourself bare, you may not feel too ashamed; at the very least, it will let you know why God is judging and chastising you. You will see that God's words of judgment and His revelations are factual, convincing you completely and making you see they are accurate without exception. Then, it will be clear to you that all these are things that exist within yourself; they are not just behaviors or momentary outpourings, but your very disposition. Next, during the period when God is carrying out His work of judgment and chastisement, you will be exposed continuously and be dealt with due to your corrupt disposition, causing you to suffer and endure refinement. For instance, being suspicious of God is an expression of wickedness. People are often suspicious of God but never realize that this is wicked; this issue must be resolved. When God judges and chastises you, if you are suspicious of God, He will let you know that this is wicked. You live within a wicked disposition, using that wicked disposition to treat the God you believe in, to compete against your God, and to cast suspicion on your God—and your heart will feel agony. You don't want to do this, but you can't help it. Since you have this corrupt disposition, God will arrange circumstances to refine you, making you unknowingly abandon your notions and imaginings, your logical thinking, and your thoughts and ideas. At that point, you will suffer; this is true refinement, and it is due to this corrupt disposition that you are refined. How does refinement come about? If you think it is not a corrupt disposition, believe you don't have such manifestations or states, and are not that kind of person, and if you feel this aspect of a corrupt disposition does not reside within you, then when God judges you, will you be refined? (No.) When you admit that you've revealed a corrupt disposition, and you know that God has judged you, and you can match your corrupt disposition up to His judgment, but you still rationalize and still live within that corrupt disposition, unable to break free—this is how refinement comes about. You know that God dislikes and loathes your corrupt disposition, and you are far from meeting God's requirements; you clearly know that you're wrong and God is right, but you cannot put the truth into practice, nor can you follow God's way—your pain arises at that moment. Do you now have such pain? (No.) Then at the very least, you haven't endured refinement in terms of your corrupt disposition; you only experience some pain from being reproached and disciplined when you make mistakes or transgressions, but this is absolutely not refinement. Suppose you can enter into such a life, embark upon such a path, and you say: "I am no longer suffering affections or status, but am truly enduring refinement. I have realized that I really am incompatible with God, my corrupt disposition is deeply rooted, and I can't shed it. Let God refine and expose me." When you live within such a state, you are on the path to being saved. Saying this now, you may all yearn for and look forward to the arrival of that day, but I don't know how many of you can actually be blessed enough to enjoy such treatment. This is a monumentally good thing and an enormous blessing. Being saved is not easy. If the Creator truly values you, chooses you, and lets you be His follower, that's only the first step to being saved. If the Creator values you and says that you are qualified to receive His judgment and chastisement, that's only the second step. If you can emerge from God's judgment and chastisement, reach a state where your disposition changes, and become compatible with the Creator, taking up the path of fearing God and shunning evil, that is the final outcome. Now, who among you will be blessed enough to reach that day, who will be blessed to receive such salvation? Can it be discerned from one's appearance? From one's caliber? From one's level of education? (It cannot.) Can it be determined by what duties one performs now? Or the family one was born into? None of these factors can reveal it. Some people say, "My family has believed in the Lord for three generations; I believed while still in my mother's womb, so I will surely be saved." This is foolish talk and incredibly ignorant; God does not look at such things. The Pharisees believed in God for generations, and what has become of them now? God does not even want them as His followers; they have been thoroughly cast out; they are irrelevant to God's work of salvation and have no part in it.

Whether or not one can accept God's judgment and chastisement is directly related to the key issue of dispositional change. However, people tend to have many notions about God's judgment and chastisement. It is essential to frequently fellowship the truth according to God's words to resolve these issues. This is most necessary. Why does God judge and chastise people? To what extent has humankind become corrupt? What issues do judgment and chastisement aim to resolve, and what outcomes do they achieve? What are the standards that God demands of people? If these truths are not understood, it is not easy for one to accept judgment and chastisement; they will easily develop notions about God, as well as rebelliousness and resistance, and they may even blaspheme God and become hostile toward Him. How does God save people? Who can accept God's judgment and chastisement? Who can embark on the path of pursuing the truth and being perfected? Who will be cast out by God's work of the last days? If these truths are clearly fellowshiped, won't people's notions about judgment and chastisement be resolved? At the least, they will be basically resolved—any issues that remain can only be resolved through one's own experience; they will naturally be resolved when the truth is understood. Some people say: "Our sins have been forgiven, so why do we still need to experience judgment and chastisement?" Being forgiven of sins is God's grace; it qualifies people to come before God. However, judgment and chastisement aim to thoroughly save people from sin and from Satan's influence; the two are not contradictory. In the Age of Grace, God redeems people and forgives their sins; in the Age of Kingdom, God judges people and purifies their corrupt disposition. These are two stages of God's work. Many ridiculous individuals in religion always have notions about judgment and chastisement; they rigidly cling to the phrase "justification through faith once sins are forgiven," and absolutely refuse to accept God's judgment and chastisement. Should one argue with such people? If you encounter such people, and if they can accept God's words and the truth, you can fellowship the truth with them and read God's words to them. If they absolutely refuse to accept the truth, there's no need to bother with them; they are absolutely not the recipients of God's salvation. God only saves those who can accept His words and the truth; for those who absolutely cannot accept God's words and the truth, God will absolutely not save them. Those who can accept the truth can easily resolve their notions, no matter how many they may have; they just need to read more of God's words and seek the truth more. People who can accept the truth are those with humanity and those with conscience and reason. Before people accept God's judgment and chastisement, they will develop many notions and many incorrect thoughts, as well as some negative states. The most common negative state is, "I have expended myself for God and performed my duties; I should be protected and blessed by God in all things. Why have calamities befallen me?" This is the most common state. There is also another kind of state: Upon seeing others living in good conditions and enjoying themselves, while finding oneself living in difficulty and poverty, they blame God for being unjust. It could even be that they see others achieving better results in performing their duty, and they become envious and negative. They are also negative if others' families are harmonious and united, if others have a higher caliber than them, if performing their duty is tiring, or if something does not go as they wish. In short, under any circumstances that do not align with their notions and imaginings, they become negative. If this person has some caliber and can accept the truth, they should be helped. As long as they understand the truth, the issue of their negativity can be easily resolved. If they do not seek the truth and remain negative, always harboring notions about God, then God will set them aside and pay them no mind, for the Holy Spirit does not do futile work. Such people are too self-willed, do not accept the truth, always have notions about God, and always have their own demands; this is highly lacking in sense and makes them somewhat impervious to reason. They can understand the truth but do not accept it. Is this not a bit like knowingly committing offenses? Therefore, God pays them no mind. Some people say: "I am often negative, and God ignores me. This means God doesn't love me!" Such a statement is absurd. Do you know whom God loves? Do you know how God's love is manifested? Do you know whom God does not love and whom God disciplines? God's love has principles; it's not as humans imagine, constantly enduring people and showing mercy and grace to them, saving everyone no matter who they are, forgiving everyone regardless of the sins they commit, and ultimately bringing everyone into the kingdom of God without exception. Are these not just people's notions and imaginings? If it were so, there would be no need for God to perform the work of judgment. There are principles to how God behaves toward people who are often negative. When people are constantly negative, there is a problem here. God has said so much, expressed so many truths, and if a person truly believes in God, then after reading God's words and understanding the truth, the negative things in them will grow ever fewer. If people are always negative, it is certain that they do not accept the truth at all, and so as soon as they encounter something at odds with their own notions, they will become negative. Why do they not seek the truth in God's words? Why do they not accept the truth? It is surely because they have notions and misunderstandings about God, and furthermore never seek the truth. So will God still pay them any attention when they approach the truth in this way? Are such people not impervious to reason? What is God's attitude toward those who are impervious to reason? He casts them aside and ignores them. Believe in whatever manner you wish; whether or not you believe is up to you; if you truly believe and pursue the truth, then you shall gain the truth; if you do not pursue the truth, then you shall not obtain it. God treats every person fairly. If you do not have an attitude of acceptance of the truth, if you do not have an attitude of obedience, if you do not strive to meet God's requirements, then you may believe however you wish; also, if you would rather leave, you may do so at once. If you do not wish to do your duty, the house of God will not force you to; you can go wherever you like. God does not urge such people to stay. That is His attitude. You are clearly a created being, yet you never want to be a created being. You always want to be the archangel, unwilling to submit to God, and you always desire to be on equal footing with God. This is brazenly resisting God; this is something that offends God's disposition. You are obviously just an ordinary person, yet you always wish for special treatment, to have status and to be someone, wanting to be better than others in every way, receive great blessings, and surpass everyone. This shows a lack of reason. How does God view people who lack reason? How does God appraise them? Such people are impervious to reason. Some say: "If You say I'm impervious to reason, then I won't render service anymore!" Who asked you to render service? If you are unwilling to do it, God won't force you; hurry up and leave— God's house won't keep you. Even if you are willing to render service, God's house has requirements. If your service is substandard and your performance of duty brings too much trouble to God's house, doing more harm than good, God's house will certainly cast you out; even if you wish to render service, God's house will not want you. If people are willing to render service, can accept the truth, and accept being pruned and dealt with, then they are qualified to stay in God's house. If they can pursue the truth, accept God's judgment and chastisement, and are able to be saved and perfected, this is an immense blessing. Don't think God is begging you and that He needs to judge and chastise you; God will not beg you. God saves and perfects people selectively, with a specific target in mind, and with principles; not all who believe in God can achieve being saved by Him—many are called, but few are chosen. You have to meet several of God's standards—performing your duty adequately, having a submissive mentality, being basically honest, and possessing a repentant heart—and only then will God formally begin to judge and chastise, purify and perfect you. Some say: "Experiencing judgment and chastisement means suffering!" While it's true that you will suffer, you have to be qualified for it. If you're not qualified, you're not even fit to suffer! Do you think God's work and His perfecting of people are that simple? Those who refuse to accept judgment and chastisement, or who flee from judgment and chastisement, will ultimately be held accountable for their actions. Regardless of who someone is or what their attitude toward God is, if this attitude doesn't align with what God requires, God will not intervene and will let them go their own way. God's words are all right there; if you can do what He says, then do it. If you're willing to do it, then do it. If you're unwilling to do it or can't do it, God won't force you. Do you think God will beg you? Do you think God will discipline you? Rest assured, God absolutely will not do that. God will say: "If you do not like accepting the truth, if you are sick of God's judgment and chastisement, then fine. You have already enjoyed some grace, so hurry back to the world, hurry up and leave; you won't be forced. You are not qualified to enjoy the blessings of the kingdom of heaven, and you can't obtain them even if you wish to." What does it mean that God does not force people to accept His judgment and chastisement? It means that if people do not accept God's judgment and chastisement, God neither disciplines, chastens, reminds, nor admonishes; there will be no enlightenment or illumination from the Holy Spirit. On the surface, these people appear to live quite comfortably. They aren't disciplined for performing their duty carelessly and perfunctorily, nor for their passive slackening at work, nor for their casually judging God. Even for misunderstanding God, complaining about God, and resisting God, they feel nothing in their hearts, until they commit a great evil like stealing or misusing offerings, yet they remain unaware. People who commit such great evils go for years without reflecting on themselves, without the slightest bit of repentance, without any premonition of what punishment or outcome will come their way. A normal person should have some kind of premonition, but they do not because God does absolutely nothing in them. God's inaction is a kind of attitude. What does it represent? Can you imagine what God is thinking in His heart? He has utterly given up on such people. Why does God give up on such people? He despises such people; they are less significant than a feather, than an ant, they are not worth mentioning, and their end is thus decided. One day, when such a person says, "I want to be a created being of God, I accept You as my Lord, my God," will God want them? God will not. Some say, "I regret it, I am turning back now." Is it too late for them? It's too late. Because their nature is that of a devil and will never change, God does not save such people. No matter how regretful they are, no matter how pathetically they cry, can they change? Can they truly repent? Absolutely not. So, whether or not you pursue the truth, as long as you genuinely believe in God, you should understand the administrative decrees of God's house. You absolutely cannot have designs on God's offerings; even having thoughts of stealing or using them is unacceptable. Once you take such actions, you will bring about great calamity, affecting your ultimate outcome. Once your outcome is determined, thinking back on what God has said or what God's requirements are, and feeling regretful will be useless. Right now, God's work has not yet concluded, but some people's outcomes have already been determined. God has not proclaimed this matter, nor has He told anyone. These people still think they are doing well, still idling away their time. Even with death knocking at the door, they are completely unaware; they are a pack of muddled people and good-for-nothings.

I'll proceed with another two cases. The previous case discussed a man, while the two main characters in these cases are two female leaders. Upon hearing this appellation, one can immediately understand that their statuses are not low; and yet, people of such status can commit great evils. One of these two women had dealings with an unbeliever whose business was on the brink of collapse due to insufficient capital. Since this woman served as a leader in the church and had control over financial resources, the unbeliever asked to borrow money from her. Without seeking from the Above, she unilaterally agreed to lend out hundreds of thousands of yuan. Money belonging to people can be loaned, but God's money is an offering, and anyone who touches God's offering must face punishment. She privately misappropriated the offerings, and the sum was not insignificant. Following the misappropriation, the church took action against her, requiring her to work to repay the money. This is how the church handled it; it was a human method. She was able to repay the money and outwardly appeared to have a decent attitude. Does this signify that she turned herself around? (No.) Her actions were quite audacious, much like a reckless blockhead, indicative of her disposition and her attitude toward God. Can such a person comprehend the truth purely? Can she be able to act with reason? She dared to tamper with God's offerings, treating it as her own money. Without God's instruction on how to allocate the funds, or stating that it should not be touched, she had neither principles nor boundaries in her heart. She believed that as a leader, she had the right to control this money, and dared to misappropriate it. After the misappropriation, how did God handle it? God didn't even have to lift a finger; the church punished her. Just these hundreds of thousands of yuan determined her ultimate outcome: She was forever cut out by God and cast aside. Why would God do this? This represents God's wrath; of course, it is also an aspect of God's disposition. God tolerates no offense; if you offend God's disposition, you have crossed a line. Is this stipulated in the administrative decrees? (Yes.) God's chosen people are clear on this: Misappropriating offerings is an offense against God's disposition. When this woman misappropriated the offering, did God intervene? God did not intervene, did not stop her, and did not say anything; nor did He restrain, reprimand, or warn her when she was taking action—the money was loaned out just like that. She was feeling quite pleased with herself before the issue was exposed, and the church handled her. She began to cry and snivel, and then immediately started working to repay the money. In fact, was it the money that God cared about? No; what He cared about was not the money, but the attitude the woman revealed to Him in this matter. This was what God cared about. Offending God's disposition precisely because of money—is this not deserving of death? This is called getting what you deserve! If you're a bit negative or weak, or sometimes have some adulterations while performing your duty, or sometimes stand in the position of a certain status and indulge in its benefits, God sees this as a revelation of a corrupt disposition. But when you tamper with God's offerings without consulting Him, or misuse it without obtaining His permission, what kind of problem is that? This is stealing offerings. And what kind of disposition does this indicate? It's the disposition of the archangel, the disposition of Satan. Is it not betrayal to steal God's offerings? (It is.) What did Satan do that God deemed betrayal? (It sought to become God.) As for the woman we're discussing, she wanted to control God's offerings. Who did she think she was? (She thought she was God.) Exactly, she saw herself as God, and that was where she erred. That's why we say she offended God's disposition. Is the nature of this serious? (Yes.) Is our characterization accurate? (It is accurate.) She no longer has an outcome. She has no outcome—that's how it appears now. In terms of God's definition, in terms of what punishments she will experience afterward, these are matters for the future. This is the story of the first woman. She was truly audacious, capable of deceiving those above and below her, acting recklessly without considering the consequences, both foolish and insolent. Did she possess any modicum of submission or desire to seek? (No.) She wanted to control God's offerings, God's possessions, without anyone's consent and without discussing or fellowshiping the matter with anyone else. She took it upon herself to handle this matter unilaterally, and these were the consequences. Some may say: "Does merely touching God's offerings mean one is offending His disposition?" Is that so? No. The church has principles for allocating God's offerings, and if you act according to those principles, God will not intervene. If you already have the principles and you don't follow them, but rather insist on acting recklessly and doing things your own way, privately handling these matters yourself, then you are offending God's disposition. That is the story of the first woman.

The story of the second female leader also pertains to offerings. Here's how it goes: The church bought a house to serve as a place of worship, which required some renovation. Renovation involves designing and buying materials, which costs money. Since this is the work of God's house, involving God's management, the money spent is naturally from God's house, and it is God's offering. This money is used legitimately and rightfully according to the principles of God's house. At the time, this woman was a leader and was responsible for this project. She chose a new believer, unfamiliar to anyone, to come and oversee the project. This man was like an unbeliever. Later on, she colluded with this unbeliever, buying many high-end items and wasting a lot of money. Isn't this swindling money from God's house? This is defrauding and squandering God's offerings! This unbeliever made guite a bit of money from it. Did this have anything to do with the woman? (Yes.) She facilitated this, allowing the unbeliever to do such things. When someone discovered the issue and wanted to report it, she vehemently obstructed and threatened them. She betrayed the interests of God's house, harming these interests and causing considerable loss of the offerings as well. During this period, did God reprimand her? (No.) She was unaware. How can we tell she was unaware? There are some facts that prove it; she could clearly see what the unbeliever was planning to do from the beginning but did not stop him, instead indulging and tacitly approving of it, continuously pouring money in. As a result, the costs ballooned, and the final work was subpar. She saw this clearly but kept sinking in more money. Did God act at this time? God didn't. What are people's notions and imaginings about this matter? People think that God should be responsible for His own money and should have stopped her. This is a human notion, but God didn't act this way. After the renovation was completed and upon investigation, God's house discovered that much of the offerings were lost. What should be done with this woman? God did nothing; the church took care of her, and another woman began to repay the money. What was the nature of her actions? As a leader, she was not only irresponsible and failed to check the expenditures of offerings but also colluded with an outsider to deceive God's house and embezzle God's offerings. This case is even more severe than the previous one. So what is such a person's outcome in the eyes of God? Destruction; whether she is punished or not is a matter for the future. Such a person may one day be placed by God in a dwelling of evil spirits and filthy demons, her physical body destroyed in this life, and her soul defiled and desecrated by filthy demons and evil spirits; as for the next life, that's too far off to speak of. This is the outcome. Why does God handle such a person in this way? Because she offended God's disposition. Having offended God's disposition, could God still love her? No love remains, nor compassion, nor lovingkindness—only wrath. When her actions are mentioned, God hates and detests her. Why does He detest to this extent? It's because she knowingly committed sins despite being aware of the true way. Not only is there no more sin offering for her, but she must also face the punishment of God's wrath. No outcome, destination, or chance at salvation—she has none of these. This is what it means to offend God's disposition; this is what happens when one offends God's disposition.

Tell Me, is it easy to offend God's disposition? In reality, there aren't that many opportunities, nor that many situations where this can happen. The opportunities are few, the chances slim; yet why can people still manage to offend God's disposition with such scarce opportunities and low probabilities? These two women each believed in God for more than twenty years, listened to many years' worth of sermons, and long served as leaders and workers. Why could they make such serious mistakes? From the perspective of humanity, they lacked humanity, conscience, and rationality; from the perspective of their faith in God, they didn't possess genuine faith, they didn't have God in their hearts. How was this absence of God in their hearts manifested? In their actions, there was no sense of fear, no bottom line; they didn't consider, "What will happen to me after I do this? Will there be repercussions? People may not know about it, but what will happen if God knows? I must take responsibility for this matter, as it concerns my outcome." They didn't think about these things—isn't that troublesome? If they didn't think about these things, did they have conscience or reason? (No.) Thus, they were capable of offending God's disposition, capable of making such major mistakes. If one possesses normal human thinking, they will have this mentality; when someone asks to borrow money, they would consider: "Borrow money? This is God's money. If I lend out God's money just to win a moment's esteem, what if they can't pay it back? How will I make up for this money? Even if I can, what kind of behavior is it to lend out this money? Can God's money be touched so casually? It can't be touched casually; if I touch it, what would the nature of this action be?" They would consider these things, and wouldn't lend the money out on an impulse just because someone asks. If they don't consider it, or even if they do but haven't considered the consequences, what does that say about their view of God? How do they believe? They fundamentally do not acknowledge the existence of God, which is terrifying! Since they don't acknowledge God's existence, they don't acknowledge that God will determine their outcome, and don't acknowledge that God will mete out retribution upon them; they are not afraid of this, they don't believe in retribution. Generally, if someone has fifty to sixty percent belief, they would act cautiously and demonstrate restraint. If they have thirty percent belief, they might also be somewhat restrained, but once the opportunity presents itself they will still go through with it; or, if the opportunities are few or not mature, they will be able to restrain and limit themselves a bit. However, those who lack any component of belief would dare to do all sorts of bad things, acting recklessly without considering the consequences; this is akin to a beast. On the surface, they appear human, but what they do is not what humans should do; at the least, it can be said they are beasts, and more seriously, they might be filthy demons and evil spirits who come to disrupt and disturb God's work, who specialize in sabotaging the work of God. Is God's classification of such people accurate? (Yes.) It's extremely accurate; there's nothing wrong in what God does, everything God does is precise. Moreover, God's actions, God's determination of people's outcomes are not based on a moment's performance. These two women believed in God for twenty years and yet somehow ended up at this point, sealing their own ends in this manner. How did this come about? It's not something that happened overnight. From the perspective of their pursuit in faith and the path they chose, they were not people who pursued the truth; that's one aspect. The other is that they had no interest whatsoever in the truth. If they had had even a modicum of interest, their humanity would have undergone change. And what would such change in humanity have brought them? It would mean they would act with restraint and observe boundaries, have a standard for evaluation, and gauge things with the reason and thought processes of a normal human. If they saw that doing something was inappropriate, they would abstain. However, these two women never pursued the truth; they lacked even this basic boundary and way of thinking. They dared to do anything, and it was this very nature that led them to their ruin, even to their death. This is the reason why their journey of believing in God ended in such a way.

After hearing these two cases, what are your thoughts? Some people say: "I've gained a lot today. I've obtained the highest truth, which is don't mess with God's things; don't even entertain the idea, don't go tampering with them. If you tamper with them, nothing good will come of it." Is this really the case? Is this the truth? (No.) What matters is not whether you tamper with God's things, but what your attitude toward God is in your heart. If you fear God and feel a sense of dread toward Him, truly believe in His existence, and genuinely consider your own end, there are things you won't do; you won't even think about them. Therefore, you won't be subjected to this kind of temptation; it will never come upon you. Is fright useful? Fright is useless. What did God do while these two women were doing these things? God let things take their course, placing these two devils—these two non-humans whose hearts were not frightened of God whatsoever—into Satan's temptation, so that they could be completely exposed and destroyed. Isn't this God's attitude? This is the righteous disposition of God, and it is not to be taken lightly! People make use of human means for handling others and meting out retribution toward others, reciprocating evil with evil. But God doesn't do that; God has His own bottom line, principles, and His own ways. When God metes out retribution upon someone, He makes it so that they feel nothing; they're unaware, but in God's eyes, the issue has already been resolved. Years later, the subsequent suffering will surface bit by bit. After God has stripped that person of His grace, blessings, enlightenment, illumination and all the treatment that God affords to a normal human, they are thoroughly dehumanized; in God's eyes, they are no longer a created being but a beast, they are something else entirely. God says, "He makes His sun rise on the evil and on the good." Are these people good or evil? They are neither. In God's eyes, in His records, these kinds of people have been removed; they are gone, they are non-human. What is the definition of non-human? (Brutes, beasts in human clothing.) Some may even envy them, saying, "They work and make money outside, living with unbelievers; their lives are much more comfortable than suffering in the church, performing duty from dawn to dusk." I tell you, their days of suffering are yet to come. If you envy them, you're welcome to emulate them; God's house imposes no restrictions. Suffering is not limited to physical pain from illness; if one's internal suffering reaches a certain extent, it's indescribable, such as blows to one's psyche, especially when subjected to God's punishment—it's worse than death, it's more agonizing; it's a kind of mental anguish. These two women ended up in such a situation because they offended God's disposition through their reckless actions. In people's notions, it seems that no matter what mistakes people make or what they do, as long as they can come back before God to confess and repent, God can forgive them; this would prove that God's love is vast, that He truly loves humankind. This is a human notion, and it shows that people's understanding of God is filled with too many imaginings and too much human will. If God were delimited by human notions, then God's actions would be without principles and God would be without any disposition; such a God does not exist. It is precisely because God truly exists, is living and vibrant, and is undeniably and concretely real, that He has different manifestations. These manifestations are apparent in His various deeds and attitudes toward people, and they stand as evidence of His genuine existence. Some say: "These people themselves are not aware when they are being handled, so how can we see God's existence?" Just the cases I've mentioned allow people to see God's attitude and disposition, and also let people see God's principles in doing things and handling people. Isn't this evidence of God's real existence? (Yes.) If this God didn't exist, if He were really just air, then whatever He does would be without principles or boundaries; it would be undetectable, untouchable, hollow, not implemented in people's lives, and irrelevant to people's lives, actions, and any of their manifestations. It would only be a theory, an argument, empty talk. Precisely because this God exists, the many things He does allow people to see His attitude.

The main part of the various notions and imaginings people have about God's work has basically been covered in our fellowship. What is the main part focused on? It's about the various notions, imaginings, and ideas people have concerning God's judgment and chastisement, as well as their various notions and imaginings about what constitutes dispositional change. In addition, people also have numerous imaginings about the principles behind God's work of judgment and chastisement and the standards God requires of people. For people, these concepts are generally muddled and unclear. What does this lack of clarity represent? It means that people still do not understand the truth, nor do they understand the truths involved in the work that God is doing upon them. Through the fellowship today, do you now basically have an outline definition of judgment and chastisement, as well as the standards God requires of people? (Yes.) With this understanding, what should you do next? First of all, you need to recognize that God has such standards. Are these standards flexible? Can they be higher or lower than they actually are? (No.) Why not? From the Age of Grace up to now, we can see from those whom God has perfected that these standards are strict and well-defined; God will never change them. He didn't change them two thousand years ago, and He hasn't changed them up to now. It's just that now there will be more people who are perfected because God has spoken so much. Back then, He worked on a smaller scale and didn't explicitly tell people more truths. Now, He has told people more truths and made them aware of more of His intentions, and God has expressed all of the standards He requires and the truths for people to know. At the same time, God's Spirit is also working in concert among people in this way. These two aspects combined prove that during this period, God intends to perfect more people—it's a group of people, not just one or two. Judging from this information, do most of you have hopes of being perfected? Some say they are not certain, but even if we are uncertain, let's try; it's better to fail than to beg for mercy now. What kind of behavior is it to beg for mercy at this moment? It is cowardly, worthless, incompetent, despicable behavior, it is disgracing God. You mustn't be cowards! The conditions and standards for being perfected have been clearly and plainly told to people; what remains is how to practice and how to cooperate with God's work. No matter how many times you fail during this period, as long as you do not offend God's disposition, you should not get discouraged or give up; keep striving upward. Some say their caliber is poor. Doesn't God know that their caliber is poor? Their admission of their poor caliber is already good in God's eyes because corrupt humankind is arrogant and self-righteous, and very few admit that their caliber is poor. Acknowledging this is a good thing, a good expression. Some talk about their experiences, realizing that their humanity is poor and bad. Why do others not have this realization? Acknowledging your poor humanity, your bad humanity, indicates that you've understood God's words and linked them to yourself; it shows that you have faith in God's work of salvation, that you have the resolve to satisfy God—at the very least, you were able to admit this truthful statement. Who among the unbelievers says they are bad now? Even when they are bad, they claim to be good; they claim their evil deeds are grand good deeds and virtuous behavior, blatantly distorting right and wrong. Therefore, no matter what setbacks you encounter, no matter what failures or stumbles, you must be able to see that hope lies ahead. Who is ahead? It is God! With God's words guiding and leading, people can embark on the right path.

Today, three case studies were fellowshiped, clarifying people's various notions and imaginings about God's work. Did you all understand what was conveyed? (Yes.) Your ability to understand demonstrates that you possess the caliber and faculties to accept the truth—there is hope for you to understand and obtain the truth. Why can't these truths be explained clearly in just one or two hours, or two or three hours? It's because a lot of preliminary content must be laid out in order to talk about the details that follow. Without laying some groundwork beforehand, you won't be able to keep up with the subsequent content. If I were to speak concisely without any preliminary content, it would be difficult for you to follow. So I talk about some examples, then discuss them from both positive and negative perspectives to help you understand and discern, know what exactly is going on with these matters, and how one should purely comprehend them. If you can achieve this, then My speaking has not been in vain. From the moment you begin to have some concept of these truths upon hearing them, to a point where you have a thorough understanding, where you realize from deep within your heart why God says these things, which part of your own corrupt disposition is involved in these truths spoken by God, and why God wants to tell you these things, a certain stage is required to reach this level of understanding. You need to link these truths with your own corrupt disposition, speech, behavior, thoughts, and ideas—that is, apply them to your actual situation—and, unconsciously, you will gradually come to understand and grasp these truths. If you don't compare them to your own case, but take notes today, review and memorize them tomorrow, and then proclaim them to those who have never heard them, you might think you have obtained them, but you actually haven't. From the day you can spout doctrines, these truths are no longer truths for you, and it becomes difficult for you to grasp the truth, as if the truth has completely disappeared. Once the truth turns into mere doctrine for you, it becomes difficult for it to produce effects on you. You have to turn the truth into your own reality, gradually implement the practical aspect of each truth on yourself by means of seeking and fellowship, and finally come to understand which states this truth includes, and what it encompasses, to understand the intentions behind God saying these words. This is the beginning of understanding the truth. What do you understand now? (Doctrines.) When people first come into contact with the truth, what they understand is a kind of doctrine. However, understanding doctrine is not simple; it also requires a certain caliber and ability to comprehend. It also requires you to have a quiet and focused heart, so you can listen to sermons with undivided attention. I have found that some people, when listening to sermons, think, "What You're talking about is worthless, I'm not willing to listen. I want to listen to sermons, not hear about events."

They believe that it's right and wrong that I'm talking about. Because they carry this viewpoint, they can't take in what they hear; they get drowsy, can't understand, and can't keep up. Such people don't possess the ability to comprehend the truth; their caliber is lacking. Some who call themselves spiritual, when they hear Me recounting stories, are unwilling to listen. They drink water or yawn, and are always fidgeting. They think, "The stories You're telling are about external matters; it's too shallow, I can't take it in. You should talk more about the spiritual world; that would suit my taste." This is the exact attitude some people have. When they've acted as a leader for many years, they like to talk about lofty sermons, grand theories, and words of the third heaven; the more they talk, the more enthusiastic they get. But if we talk about matters in the church, practical experiences, or especially dissecting the dynamics of the human psyche, they always find it shallow and boring. What kind of disposition is this? Do these people have the truth reality? Can such people solve real problems in their work? Do you like such people? Fellowshiping the truth cannot be detached from reality. Can people who aren't interested in the reality love the truth? I don't think so; such people are sick of the truth, and that's very dangerous.

What Is the Adequate Performance of Duty?

During the last gathering, the main topic of fellowship was the four basic conditions for a person to be perfected through accepting judgment and chastisement. What are these four basic conditions? (The first condition is adequate performance of duty. The second is having a mentality of submission to God. The third is being basically an honest person. And the fourth is having a repentant heart.) There are some details within each of these four conditions, as well as concrete practices and specific references. In fact, these four topics have been discussed for years. If we talk about them again today, would that be considered retreading old ground? (No.) Why would it not be considered that? Because the contents of each of these four conditions involve the reality of the truth and life entry, which are inexhaustible topics. Most people have not yet reached the point of entering the reality of the truth; they only understand the surface meaning of the truth, they only understand some simple doctrines. Although they are able to fellowship some realities, they fall short of entering the truth realities. So, no matter which aspect of the truth is involved, it must be frequently fellowshiped and frequently listened to. In this way, people's understanding of various truths will deepen through their real experience, and their experiences will become increasingly precise.

We just summarized the four basic conditions for being made perfect through accepting judgment and chastisement. Next, let us begin our discussion from the first condition: adequate performance of duty. Some people say: "The discussions these past two years have all been about performing duty; specifically, how to perform duty, how to perform it well, which principles to abide by while performing it—in my heart, I know these things like the back of my hand, they could not be any clearer. And over the past few years, my daily life has been all about the truths related to performing my duty. Ever since I began performing my duty, I've sought, eaten and drunk, and listened to truths related to it, and even now this topic is still being discussed. I've understood it in my heart for a long time already; isn't it really just doing your duty well? Isn't performing duty adequately just about following those principles mentioned before? Love the Lord your God with all your heart, with all your soul, with all your mind, and with all your strength; seek the principles, do not rely on your own inclinations, and coordinate harmoniously while performing your duty; synchronize performing your duty with life entry—that's all there is to it." The things you encounter and experience in your daily lives are just these topics, so that is all you understand. No matter how much you understand, we still need to discuss this truth today. If anything gets repeated, that will be of benefit to you as well, and you can contemplate it again; if it's something that hasn't been discussed before, then take it in. Whether it's repetitive or not, you should listen carefully. Consider what truths are involved here, whether these truths have any benefits for your life entry, and whether they can help you perform duty adequately. So, it is indeed necessary to revisit the topic of adequate performance of duty.

Regarding adequate performance of duty, let us first put aside the meaning of "adequate" and instead talk about what duty is. By the end, you will know what duty is, what is considered adequate, and how duty should be performed; you will have a path of practice for performing duty up to standard. So, what is duty? (Duty is what God entrusts man to do, it is what a created being should do.) This statement is only halfcorrect. In theory, there is nothing wrong with it, but upon closer examination, this explanation is incomplete; there should be a precondition. Let's delve into this topic. For every believer and unbeliever, how they live their lives, what they do in this human world, and the destiny of their life—are these not all things that God has preordained? (Yes, they are.) For instance, some people engage in music in this world. Making music is their mission in life; can this mission be considered their duty? (No.) Some people have done extraordinary things in the world, impacting all of humankind, making contributions, and even changing an era; this is their life's mission. Can this life's mission be called their duty? (No.) But isn't this life's mission and what they have done in their lifetime something entrusted to them by God? Isn't it something a created being should do? (Yes.) That's correct. God has given them a mission, entrusted them with this commission, and, within the entirety of humankind, as a part of humankind itself, they have something they should do, a responsibility they should perform. Regardless of the field they are involved in—be it arts, business, politics, economics, scientific research, and so on—these are all predestined by God. There is one point of difference, however;

no matter how God has ordained it, these people are outside of God's management work. They are considered unbelievers, and that which they do is external to God's management work. So, can their responsibilities, the commission they've accepted, and their life's mission be called duty? (No.) They are not performing duty, because that which they do is unrelated to God's work of saving humankind. All humans in this world passively accept the Creator's commission and the mission He has given, but the mission those who do not believe in God accept, and the responsibilities they fulfill, are not duty, because they are unrelated to and have no part in God's management plan of saving humankind. They do not accept God, and God does not work on them, so no matter what responsibilities they undertake, and no matter what commission they accept or what mission they accomplish in this life, it cannot be said that they are performing their duty. So just what is duty? What kind of prerequisites should be added in order to clearly, accurately, and comprehensively explain this concept and the truth in this regard? Have you understood a concept from our fellowship just now? What concept? That for any individual among humankind, regardless of how great a mission they've accepted, or the level of change they've effected, or the extent of their contribution to humankind, such mission and commissions cannot be called duties. This is because they are unrelated to God's management plan of saving humankind; they are merely missions. Whether they act actively or passively, all they're doing is completing a mission; this is preordained by God. In other words, as long as their actions have nothing to do with God's management plan, and nothing to do with God's work of saving humanity, then the fulfillment of such missions cannot be called performing duty. This is certain beyond all doubt. So what is duty? This is how it should be understood: Duty is the commission and mission given by God within the scope of His management work to save humankind. Isn't putting it this way complete and precise? Only what's precise is the truth; what's imprecise and one-sided is not the truth, but mere doctrine. Without fully comprehending and thoroughly recognizing what duty is, you won't know just what the truths related to duty are. Previously, people may have had many misconceptions in their understanding of duty. That is because they did not understand the truth, which led to all sorts of notions and ambiguities. People then used these notions and ambiguities to explain duty, and subsequently treated it based on these ideas. For example, some people think that since one's entire life is preordained by God—that what kind of family one is born into, whether one is rich or poor in life, and what career one pursues are all preordained by God—then whatever one does in one's lifetime and the things they accomplish are all commissions given by God and are one's mission. Just because it involves a mission, they think it is therefore duty. This is how they haphazardly stumble along in their conception of duty. Isn't this a misunderstanding? Some people, who get married and have children, say: "Having kids is God's commission that He entrusted to us, it's our mission. It is our duty to raise our kids to adulthood." Isn't this a wrong understanding? And there are others who say: "We were put on this earth to farm. Since that is our fate, we'd better do a good job of it, because it is our God-given commission and mission. No matter how poor we become or how hard it gets, we can't complain. Farming well in this lifetime is our duty." They equate one's fate with their mission and duty. Is this not a misunderstanding? (It is.) It is indeed a misunderstanding. And there are also some people who do business in the world, who say: "I didn't succeed in anything before, but after doing business, life has been pretty good and stable. It seems that God has destined me to do business in this lifetime, to support my family through it. So, if in this lifetime I do well in business and expand my operations, providing for every member of my family, then this is my mission, and perhaps this mission is my duty." Isn't this a misunderstanding? People consider their everyday affairs, the way they make a living, the lifestyle they attain, and the quality of life they enjoy—all things related to their mission—as their duty. This is incorrect; it is a distorted understanding of what duty is.

So just what is duty then? Most people have some warped and erroneous comprehension of this matter. If the house of God arranges for you to go plant grains and vegetables, how do you treat this arrangement? Some people might not be able to understand it, saying: "Farming is for supporting one's family; it's not duty. The concept of duty does not include this aspect." Why do they comprehend things this way? It is because they do not understand the truths related to performing duty, and they do not understand what duty is. If one does understand this aspect of the truth, they will be willing to go and work the land. They will know that in God's house, farming is not done for the sake of supporting their family, but for the sake of allowing those who perform duty full-time to continue performing it normally. In fact, this is also a God-given commission; the work itself might not be any more significant than a sesame seed, or perhaps even a speck of sand, but regardless of its significance, it is a job produced within the scope of God's management work. God says now that you are required to complete this job—how do you receive it? You should accept it as your duty, and you should accept it without making any excuses. If you just obey in a passive manner and go do farmwork because that's what was arranged for you, that won't do. There is a principle here that you must understand: The church arranging for you to do farmwork and plant vegetables is not so you can become wealthy, nor is it so you can get by and support your family; it's to meet the needs of work in God's house during times of disaster. It is to ensure that all those who perform duty in God's house full-time have their daily sustenance, so they can perform their duties normally without holding up the work of God's house. So, some of the people farming at a farm church are considered to be performing their duty; this is different in nature from ordinary farmers farming. What is the nature of farming for ordinary farmers? Ordinary farmers farm to provide for their families and survive; this is what God has ordained for them. This is their destiny, so they farm generation after generation; it has nothing whatsoever to do with their duty. Now, you've come to God's house and are also farming, but this is a requirement of the work in God's house; it's a form of expenditure for God. This is different in nature from farming on your own land. This is about fulfilling your responsibilities and obligations. This is the duty a person should perform; it is the commission and responsibility entrusted to you by the Creator. This, for you, is your duty. So, when comparing this duty to your worldly mission, which is more important? (My duty.) Why is that the case? Duty is what God requires you to do, it is what He has entrusted to you—this is part of the reason. The other, primary, reason is that when you take up duty in God's house and accept God's commission, you become relevant to God's management work. In God's house, whenever something is arranged for you to do, be it a hardship or tiring work, and whether you like it or not, it is your duty. If you can consider it a commission and responsibility that God has given you, you are then relevant to His work of saving man. And if what you do and the duty you perform are relevant to God's work of saving man, and you can earnestly and sincerely accept the commission God has given you, how will He regard you? He will regard you as a member of His family. Is that a blessing or a curse? (A blessing.) It is a great blessing. Some people complain when they face a little hardship while performing duty, blithely unaware of the immense blessings they've received. Isn't it simply foolish to complain about God after having gained so many advantages? At this point, it's crucial to understand the truth, to recognize that this is your duty and it must be accepted from God. Now, do you have a new understanding or a new insight into what duty is? Have you deeply understood it? Is duty important for receiving salvation? (Yes.) How important is it? It can be said that there is a direct connection between performing duty and receiving salvation. Regardless of what missions you complete in this life, if you did not perform your duty, you have nothing to do with receiving salvation. In other words, no matter how grand the feats you've accomplished in this life among other humans, you were simply completing a mission; you haven't fulfilled the duty of a created being, so you have nothing to do with receiving salvation or God's work of managing humankind.

In the house of God, there is constant mention of accepting God's commission and performing one's duty properly. How does duty come into being? To speak broadly, it comes into being as a result of God's management work of bringing salvation to humanity; to speak specifically, as God's management work unfolds among mankind, various work appears that requires people to cooperate and complete it. This has given rise to responsibilities and missions for people to fulfill, and these responsibilities and missions are the duties God bestows upon mankind. In God's house, the various tasks that require people's cooperation are the duties they should fulfill. So, are there differences between duties in terms of better and worse, lofty and lowly, or great and small? Such differences do not exist; as long as something has to do with God's management work, is a requirement of the work of His house, and is required by spreading God's gospel, then it is a person's duty. This is the origin and definition of duty. Without God's work of management, would people on earth—regardless of how they live—have duties? No. Now you see clearly. What is one's duty related to? (It is related to God's management work of the salvation of mankind.) That is right. There is a direct relationship between the duties of mankind, the duties of created beings and God's management work of the salvation of mankind. It can be said that without God's salvation of mankind, and without the management work the incarnate God has launched among man, people would not have any duties to speak of. Duties arise out of God's work; it is what God demands of people. Looking at it from this perspective, duty is important for every person who follows God, is it not? It is very important. Speaking broadly, you are taking part in the work of God's management plan; more specifically, you are cooperating with the various types of jobs of God that are required at different times and among different groups of people. Regardless of what your duty is, it is a mission God has given you. Sometimes you may be required to look after or safeguard an important object. This might be a comparatively trivial matter that can only be said to be a responsibility of yours, but it is a task God has given you; you accepted it from Him. You accepted it from God's hands, and this is your duty. Speaking to the root of the matter, your duty is entrusted to you by God. It includes mainly spreading the gospel, bearing testimony, making videos, being a leader or worker in the church, or it might be work that is even more dangerous and more important. Regardless, as long as it has to do with God's work and the necessity of the work of disseminating the gospel, people should accept it as a duty from God. Duty, to put it in even broader terms, is a person's mission, a commission entrusted by God; more specifically, it is your responsibility, your obligation. Given that it is your mission, a commission entrusted to you by God, and is your responsibility and obligation, performing your duty has nothing to do with your personal affairs. Duty has nothing to do with personal affairs—why is this topic being brought up? Because people must understand how to treat and how to comprehend their duty. Duty is the commission created beings accept and the mission they must complete within God's management work. People know the overall premise, but what about the finer details? How should one approach their duties to be considered as having correct understanding? Some people treat their duty as their personal affairs; is this the right principle? (No.) Why is it wrong? Doing things for yourself is not fulfilling your duty. Fulfilling your duty is not about doing things for yourself, but rather doing the work that God entrusted to you—there is a difference between the two. What's the principle when it comes to doing things for yourself? It is doing whatever you feel like without consulting others, and without praying to or seeking God; it is acting according to your own whims and without regard for consequence as long as it benefits you. Is this principle acceptable for fulfilling your duty in God's house? (No.) Some people say: "I don't even take my own affairs as seriously or put in as much effort. I treat my duty as if it's my own business, and this principle is surely appropriate." Is this the correct way to receive duty? Definitely not. What should one's attitude toward duty be then? (Accept it from God.) "Accept it from God." These four words are easy to say, but how to actually put the truth contained within them into practice depends on how you treat your duty. Just now, we defined what

duty is. Duty comes from God, it is a commission entrusted by God, it is related to the work of His management plan and man's salvation. From this point of view, does duty have anything to do with your personal principles of conduct? Does it have anything to do with your personal preferences, your life habits, or your life routines? Not in the slightest. So what is duty related to then? It is related to the truth. Some people say: "Since this duty is assigned to me, then it is my own affair. And I have the highest principle for performing duty, which none of you have. God demands people fulfill their duty with all their heart, soul, mind, and strength. But, in addition to this, I have an even higher principle, which is to treat my duty like it's my own major concern, and to do it diligently and strive for the best result." Is this principle correct? (No.) Why is it wrong? If you accept your duty from God and in your heart you are clear He entrusts it to you, how should you treat this commission? This relates to the principles of performing duty. Isn't it much loftier to treat one's duty as God's commission rather than as one's own business? These are not the same, are they? If you treat your duty as a matter of God's commission, as fulfilling your duty before God, and as satisfying God through the fulfillment of duty, then your principle for performing duty is not merely to treat it as your own business. What is the attitude you should have toward your duty, that can be called correct and in line with the will of God? First, you cannot scrutinize who it is arranged by, which level of leadership it is assigned by—you should accept it from God. You cannot analyze this, you should accept it from God. This is a condition. Furthermore, whatever your duty, do not discriminate between high and low. Suppose you say, "Though this task is a commission from God and the work of God's house, if I do it, people might look down on me. Others get to do work that lets them stand out. I've been given this task, which doesn't let me stand out but makes me exert myself behind the scenes, it's unfair! I will not do this duty. My duty has to be one that makes me stand out in front of others and allows me to make a name for myself—and even if I don't make a name for myself or stand out, I still have to benefit from it and feel physically at ease." Is this an acceptable attitude? Being picky is not accepting things from God; it is making choices according to your own preferences. This is not accepting your duty; it is a refusal of your duty, a manifestation of your rebelliousness against God. Such pickiness is adulterated with your individual preferences and desires. When you give consideration to your own benefit, your reputation, and so on, your attitude toward your duty is not submissive. What attitude should you have toward your duty? First, you must not analyze it, trying to ascertain who it was that assigned it to you; instead, you should accept it from God, as a duty entrusted to you by God, and you should obey the orchestration and arrangements of God, and accept your duty from God. Second, do not discriminate between high and low, and do not concern yourself with its nature, whether it lets you stand out or not, whether it is done in public view or behind the scenes. Do not consider these things. There is also another attitude: obedience and active cooperation. If you feel you can fulfill a certain duty, but you also fear making a mistake and being cast out, and so you are timid, stagnant, and can't make progress, then is that a submissive attitude? For example, if your brothers and sisters choose you as their leader, then you may feel obligated to perform this duty because you were chosen, but you don't regard this duty with a proactive attitude. Why are you not proactive? Because you have thoughts about it, and feel that, "Being a leader isn't a good thing at all. It's like walking on a knife's edge or treading on thin ice. If I do a good job then there will be no reward, but if I do a bad job then I will be dealt with and pruned. And being dealt with isn't even the worst of all. What if I get replaced, or cast out? If that were to happen, isn't it all over for me?" At that point, you start to feel conflicted. What is this attitude? This is being guarded and misunderstanding. This is not the attitude that people should have toward their duty. It is a demoralized and negative attitude. So, what should a positive attitude be like? (We should be open-hearted and forthright, and have the courage to take up burdens.) It should be one of obedience and proactive cooperation. What you say is a bit empty. How can you be open-hearted and forthright when you are so afraid like this? And what does it mean to have the courage to take up burdens? What mentality will give you the courage to take up burdens? If you're always afraid that something will go wrong and you won't be able to handle it, and you have many internal hindrances, then you will fundamentally lack the courage to take up burdens. The "being open-hearted and forthright," "having the courage to take up burdens," or "never retreating even in the face of death" you speak of, sounds a bit like the slogans shouted by angry young people. Can these slogans solve practical problems? What is needed now is a correct attitude. To possess a correct attitude, you must understand this aspect of the truth. This is the only way to resolve your internal difficulties, and allow you to smoothly accept this commission, this duty. This is the path of practice, and only this is the truth. If you use terms like "being open-hearted and forthright" and "having the courage to take up burdens" to address the fear that you feel, will this be effective? (No.) This indicates that these things are not the truth, nor are they a path of practice. You may say, "I am openhearted and forthright, I am of indomitable stature, there are no other thoughts or contaminants in my heart, and I have the courage to take up burdens." Outwardly you take up your duty, but later, after pondering it for a while, you still feel that you cannot take it up. You may still feel afraid. In addition, you may see others being dealt with, and become even more afraid, like a whipped dog terrified of the strap. You will increasingly feel like your stature is too small, and that this duty is like a vast, uncrossable abyss, and ultimately you will still be unable to take up this burden. This is why chanting slogans cannot solve practical problems. So how can you actually solve this problem? You should actively seek the truth and adopt a submissive and cooperative attitude. That can completely solve the problem. Timidity, fear, and worry are useless. Is there any relationship between whether you will be revealed and cast out and being a leader? If you are not a leader, will your corrupt disposition disappear? Sooner or later, you must resolve the problem of your corrupt disposition. In addition, if you are not a leader, then you will not have more opportunities to practice and will make slow progress in life, with few chances to be perfected. Although there is a bit more suffering in being a leader or worker, it also brings about many gains, and if you can walk the path of pursuing the truth, you can be perfected. What a great blessing that is! So you should submit and actively cooperate. This is your duty and your responsibility. No matter the road ahead, you should have a heart of obedience. This is the attitude with which you should perform your duty.

The topic of fulfilling one's duty is not unfamiliar to anyone; it is not a new subject. However, for those who believe in God, this topic is very important; it is a truth that must be understood and entered into. Created beings must perform their duty well before being commended by the Creator. Therefore, it is very important that people understand what it means to perform duty. Performing duty is not a kind of theory, nor is it a slogan; it is an aspect of the truth. So what does it mean to perform duty? And what problems can be solved by understanding this aspect of the truth? At the very least, it can resolve the matter of how you should accept and treat God's commission, and what sort of attitude and resolution you should have when completing the commission God entrusted to you. You can also say that it will resolve some abnormal relationships between people and God at the same time. Some people see fulfilling their duties as capital, some see fulfilling their duties as their own personal tasks, and some see fulfilling their duties as their own work and enterprises, or see a duty as a sort of pastime, entertainment, or hobby to kill the time. In short, no matter what sort of attitude you have toward your duty, if you do not accept it from God, and if you do not treat it as a task that a created being within God's management work should do or with which they should cooperate, then what you are doing is not fulfilling your duty. Is it right for you to treat your duty as your family business? Is it right for you to treat it as part of your own job or hobby? Is it right to treat it as a personal matter? None of these are right. Why is it necessary to mention these topics? What problem will be solved by fellowshiping on these topics? It will solve the problem of people having incorrect attitudes toward their duty, and the myriad ways they perform their duty carelessly and perfunctorily. Only by understanding the aspect of truth which pertains to performing one's duty will people's attitude toward their duty change. Their attitude will gradually become compatible with the truth, and meet God's demands and His will. If people do not understand the aspect of truth which pertains to performing one's duty, problems will come up in their attitude toward their duty and the principles behind their duty, and they will be unable to achieve the result of performing duty. Duties are tasks entrusted to people by God; they are missions for people to complete. However, a duty is certainly not your personal management, nor is it a stepping stone for you to stand out from the crowd. Some people use their duties as opportunities to engage in their own management and form cliques; some to satisfy their desires; some to fill the voids they feel inside; and some to satisfy their trust-to-luck mentality, thinking that as long as they fulfill their duties, they will have a share in God's house and in the wonderful destination God arranges for man. Such attitudes about duty are incorrect; they disgust God and must be urgently resolved.

Regarding what duty is, how people should treat their duty, and the attitudes and views they should have toward duty, these matters have been largely fellowshiped already. You all should carefully ponder these; understanding the truths in these aspects is most crucial and urgent. What is the truth that you most need to understand right now? In one respect, you need to understand the truths related to the visions in this aspect; in another, you need to understand where you have misunderstandings and misconceptions about these truths in practice and in real life. When you encounter issues involving the truths of performing duty, if these words and truths can resolve your inner state, this proves that you have truly and thoroughly understood the content that has been fellowshiped; if they can't resolve the difficulties you face daily in matters of fulfilling your duty, it shows that you have not entered into these truths. After listening to these truths, have you summarized and reflected on them? Is it that each time you take notes you understand at the moment, but as time passes you forget, as if you have never heard them? (Yes.) This is because you yourselves lack even the slightest bit of entry; what you practice fundamentally has nothing to do with these truths and is completely unrelated to the truth. In fact, these truths about fulfilling duty are the most basic truths that one should understand and enter into in the process of believing in God. If after hearing the words of truth you are still confused and muddled, then your quality is simply too poor, and you lack all stature. You can only read God's words, only pray and attend gatherings; you do whatever you are asked to, just like one engaged in religious belief. This means you have no life entry and no stature whatsoever. What does having no stature mean? It means that in the process of believing in God and fulfilling your duty, as soon as someone misleads you, you follow them and stop believing in God; if you do something wrong and someone prunes and deals with you a little bit, speaking to you in a somewhat stern manner, you might give up your belief; if you encounter setbacks or various difficulties in your life, you might complain about God, and seeing that He is not granting you grace or resolving your difficulties, you could turn away and leave God's house, ceasing to believe. If you have entered into some aspects of the truth of fulfilling duty—this most fundamental of truths—it proves that you are already connected with the truth; you are already connected with the truth reality, and have made some entry. If you have nothing of this truth reality, not even a bit, it proves that the truth has not yet taken root in your heart.

I just fellowshiped about what duty is, as well as the origins and generation of duty, to let people understand what exactly duty is. What benefits are there in knowing this? Once people understand the truth about what duty is, they'll know the importance of duty. At the very least, deep down inside, they will feel that they should have a correct attitude toward duty and that they cannot act arbitrarily. At least this concept will be there in their minds. Though duty is what you should fulfill, and is the commission and mission given to you by God, it is not your personal affair, nor is it your own work. This may sound contradictory, but it is indeed the truth. Whatever is the truth has its practical side, related to people's practice and entry, as well as God's requirements. It is not empty. This is how the truth is; only through experiencing and entering into the reality of this truth can you increasingly understand this aspect of the truth. If you always question the truth, keep raising doubts, and keep scrutinizing and analyzing, then the truth will never be truth to you. It will be unrelated to your real life and won't be able to change anything about you. If one accepts the truth from the depths of their heart and takes it as a guide for living and acting, as a guide for conducting themselves and believing in God, then the truth will change their life. It will change their life's goals, their life's direction, and the way they interact with the world. This is the effect of the truth. Understanding what duty is will certainly be of great benefit and help to people in fulfilling their duty. At the very least, one will know that duty is very important for everyone who believes in God, and that it holds even greater importance for those who are interested in or have specific requirements or aspirations for being saved and perfected. This is the most fundamental truth that anyone should understand to be saved, and it is also the most fundamental truth into which one should enter. If you do not understand what duty is, then you won't know how to fulfill your duty properly, nor will you know the right attitude with which to receive and regard your duty. This is dangerous—on the one hand, you won't possibly be able to fulfill your duty well, and you will act arbitrarily, in a careless and perfunctory way; on the other hand, you might do things that disrupt and disturb the work of the church, or even commit evil deeds that violate God's administrative decrees. To put it somewhat conservatively, you might be isolated for reflection, and in severe cases, you could be cast out. Therefore, understanding what duty is, although a very basic aspect of the truth, is related to one's salvation; it's not irrelevant—this is very important. After understanding what duty is, it's not just about being familiar with a doctrine; the intended result is to allow people to comprehend God's intentions and to treat their duty with the correct attitude. In performing any duty, no result can be achieved by simply exerting effort; always thinking that duty can be properly fulfilled just by exerting effort shows a lack of spiritual understanding. In fact, fulfilling duty involves many details, including having the right mindset, principles of practice and genuine obedience, as well as possessing spiritual wisdom. Only when someone has these aspects of the truth can they fulfill their duties well and fully resolve the problem of performing duty in a careless and perfunctory manner. Those who do not have the right attitude toward their duties are people lacking in the truth reality; they are people who lack a God-fearing heart, and are devoid of conscience and reason. Thus, to follow God, one must understand the significance of fulfilling duty; this is crucial for following God.

After understanding what duty is and its origins, you will differentiate between the nature of duty and the nature of work in society. What is the distinguishing point between treating the work entrusted to you by God's house as a duty and treating it as worldly work? If you treat it as a duty, then you need to seek God's will and the truth. You will say, "This is my duty, so how should I go about it? What does God require? What are the church's regulations? I need to be clear about the principles behind it." Only practicing this way is the correct attitude toward treating your duty; only this is the attitude people should have toward their duty. But what kind of attitude should people have when dealing with worldly work or matters in their personal lives? Is there any need to seek the truth or principles then? You might also seek principles, but those would only be about making more money, living a good life, accumulating wealth, achieving success, and gaining both fame and fortune—only principles such as these. These principles are entirely worldly, belonging to current trends; they are the principles of Satan and this wicked humankind. What are the principles of fulfilling duty? They must definitely meet God's requirements; they are intimately related to, and inseparable from, the truth and God's requirements. In contrast, the professions or jobs that people engage in in the world have nothing to do with the truth or God's requirements. As long as you are capable, willing to endure hardship, and diligent, evil, and audacious enough, you can stand out in society and may even build a major career. However, these principles and philosophies are not needed in God's house. In God's house, no matter what kind of duty you perform, no matter the nature of that duty, whether it is seen as high or low, noble or humble, whether it's high-profile or low-key, whether it's entrusted to you by God or assigned to you by a church leader—no matter what work the house of God assigns to you, the principles you adhere to in doing your work should not exceed the principles of the truth. They should be connected with the truth, connected with God's requirements, and connected with the regulations and work arrangements of God's house. In short, duty and the work one engages in the world should be distinguished from each other.

Why are we fellowshiping about the difference between performing duty and engaging in worldly work? Is this important? (Yes.) Where does the importance lie? It relates to the attitude people have toward performing their duty. Do not bring the attitudes and principles you have in your worldly work into the realm of performing duty. What are the consequences if you do so? (Acting according to one's own wishes.) Acting according to one's own wishes is a common issue; it means not wanting to confer with others when carrying out tasks, wanting to have the final say, and doing whatever one wants, feeling that acting this way brings comfort and contentment free of any sense of oppression or unhappiness. Additionally, it often leads to intrigue, jealousy, disputes, and the forming of cliques, as well as seeking rewards and recognition, showing off, acting carelessly and perfunctorily, irresponsibility, deceiving those above and below oneself, and setting up one's own kingdom. In short, performing duty is different from engaging in worldly work; performing duty is a requirement from God and an arrangement by God—this is the greatest difference between performing duty and engaging in worldly work. Performing duty must be done according to God's requirements and based on the truth principles. It is not one's personal management, nor their personal business, and it is certainly not anyone's private affair. It has no relation to personal interests, pride, status, influence, or future prospects; it only relates to people's life entry and dispositional change, and it relates to God's management work. In contrast, when you are engaged in worldly work, you are entirely focused on personal management. Whether you are performing a job or operating a business, no matter how great of a cost you pay, no matter how much you can cast away or how much suffering you endure be these emotional or physical aspects—or whether you're bullied and humiliated or misunderstood, or even face tremendous public pressure, all that you do revolves around your personal will, aspirations, ambitions, and desires. It is of this nature alone. This nature is just engaging in personal management and running a personal enterprise. Among humankind, there is not a single person who steps forward to say, "I am doing a public service for the sake of humankind; I want to act according to the divine tenets and principles given by Heaven." There is no such person. Even if someone does step forward to say, "I want to carry out the most altruistic and greatest endeavor for humankind, to create welfare and do good deeds for people," their goal is not so pure; they are doing it for the sake of fame. Is this not engaging in personal management? It's all for the sake of personal management. No matter how good their words sound, no matter how much suffering they've endured, how great the cost they've paid, how big a contribution they've made, or whether they've changed humankind, transformed an era, or inaugurated a new epoch, whatever they do, their purpose is not for others but for themselves. Corrupt human beings all do things in this way. Whether someone does something big or small, their intent is either for fame or for profit. What is the nature of their actions? It's engaging in personal management. Does personal management have anything to do with God's management? It has absolutely no relation. Some people say, "That's not true. Some people come into this world and change an era; isn't that also preordained by God? Doesn't that also have to do with His management?" Are these things related? (No.) Why do you say there's no connection? (Because it has nothing to do with God's management work of saving humankind.) Well said; if it has nothing to do with God's work of saving humankind, then it's unrelated to God's management. However, this statement is only half-true; there's another precondition here, an issue of essence. If it's unrelated to God's management plan, then it is all just human management. That's one aspect, but let Me add something for you: The nature of what they're doing is for personal fame and benefit; the ultimate beneficiary is themselves. The nature, principles, and ultimate outcome of all they do are for the sake of whom? (Themselves.) It's for themselves—and, in a more covert sense, for whom? (Satan.) Correct, it's for Satan. What is the nature of doing things for Satan? (Being an enemy of God.) And what is the underlying essence behind being an enemy of God? Why do we say this is being an enemy of God? (The starting point, origin, and principles of their actions all go against God's words.) This is one aspect, and it is a fundamental issue.

The starting point, origin, and principles of what they're doing are all of Satan and are evil, so what is the ultimate result? Who are they bearing witness to? (Satan.) Correct, they're bearing witness to Satan. Throughout human history, has there been any historian or writer who has attributed the accomplishments of what humans have done in each era to the Creator? (No.) They will only say that these are the legacies or great achievements left behind from humankind's grand undertakings. Whom do these great people and famous figures who leave these things behind represent in the eyes of humankind? Any famous figure or great person, or those who have made significant contributions to humankind, are all worshiped by corrupt humans. The place they occupy in people's hearts is the place that people consider as the position of God. Isn't this the essence of the issue? (Yes.) We just discussed that the origins, motives, starting points, and principles behind people's actions are all rooted in satanic logic and are not in line with the truth. People accomplish something through human means or through their gifts and become famous among others, and the ultimate consequence is that humankind attributes all of this to Satan; just the same way as many people now worship famous figures and great people from history like Confucius and Guan Yu. No matter how great the deeds these people have done, fundamentally speaking, it is actually God who arranged for these various characters to come into this world and perform specific deeds in different eras. However, in all recorded human history, whether ancient or modern, there is not a single instance that bears witness to the Creator's deeds. Only the Bible records some elements of the two stages of God's work in the Age of Law and the Age of Grace, but even the words of God recorded there are quite limited. In actuality, God has spoken many words and performed numerous deeds, but what has been recorded by humans is extremely limited. In contrast, there are countless books that record, witness, or praise famous and great people. Doesn't this clarify the essence of the issue we just discussed? We just mentioned that the famous and great people throughout history have acted for themselves; acting, in essence, for Satan. This shows that they were not fulfilling their duties, but were rather conducting their own management or engaging in their own enterprises. What is the nature, the essence, of any work that people undertake in the world? (Engaging in personal management.) Why is it considered engaging in personal management? What is the root cause? Because it is Satan they bear witness to; their principles and motivations for acting all come from Satan, and have nothing to do with the truth or God's requirements. But what is the nature of duty? It refers to work carried out according to God's requirements, meaning that the work must be grounded in the truth, conducted according to the truth principles, and done in line with God's demands. The result is that people can bear witness to God, and possess obedience toward God and have knowledge of Him; they have a deeper understanding of and more genuine submission to the Creator, and even more so they can do what created beings should do. This is the biggest difference between the two. When people take up their duties according to God's requirements, their relationship with God becomes increasingly normal. And can any work that people engage in in the world achieve this effect? Definitely not, the result is precisely the opposite. The more years one spends doing worldly work, the more they rebel against God and the farther they drift away from Him. The better one's personal management goes, the farther away they get from God; the more successful one's personal management becomes, the farther they stray from God's requirements. Therefore, performing duty and engaging in worldly work have two entirely different natures.

Just now, the difference between a person's duty and a person engaging in worldly work was discussed. What aspect of the truth is this discussion meant to help people understand? No matter what duty you receive, you should perform it as God asks. For example, when you are selected as leader of a church, your duty is to perform the work of a church leader. And what should you do once you have taken this work as your duty? Firstly, know that only the accomplishment of your work as a leader is the performance of your duty. You are not serving as some official in the outside world; if you become a leader and then think of yourself as an official, you've gone astray. But if you say, "Now that I have become a church leader, I must not be condescending, I must put myself below everyone else, I must make them higher and more important than me," then this mentality is wrong, too; putting on any pretense is useless if you don't understand the truth. Nothing but a correct understanding of your duty will do. First off, you must appreciate the importance of the work of a church leader: A church could have several dozens of members, and you must think how to lead these people before God, how to allow most of them to understand the truth and enter the truth reality. You must also spend more time watering and supporting those who are negative and weak, to stop them from being negative and weak and enable them to perform their duty. You must also guide all who are capable of performing their duty in understanding the truth and entering the reality, acting according to principles, and performing their duty properly and thus to greater effect. There are certain people who have believed in God for several years but are of guite wicked humanity, who always disrupt and disturb the work of the church—these people should be dealt with as required; those who stubbornly refuse to repent should be cleared out. They should be handled according to principle and arranged properly. There is also the most important thing of all: Some in the church possess relatively good humanity and a bit of caliber, and are capable of undertaking a certain aspect of work; all such people must be nurtured without delay, sooner rather than later; it will take training for them to become competent, and they won't be able to do anything well if they never receive any training. Are these not the jobs that a leader or worker urgently needs to perform well? If you have become a leader and do not keep these matters in mind, and do not perform work in this way, can you fulfill your duty well? (No.) As a leader, it is essential to sort out each and every aspect of the church's work: First, the most important matter is to cultivate talented people. Elevate those who are of good humanity and who possess caliber, and cultivate and train them. Second, lead the brothers and sisters to enter into the truth reality, and enable them to engage in introspection, know themselves, discern heresies and fallacies, discern people, and fulfill their duties well—this is a part of life entry. Third, enable the majority of those who can fulfill their duties to actually do so (excluding those of inferior humanity), and ensure that they achieve results in fulfilling their duties rather than just acting carelessly and perfunctorily. Fourth, promptly handle those who disrupt and disturb the work of the church. If they reject the truth upon fellowship, they must be pruned and dealt with. And if they remain unrepentant all the while, they should be isolated for self-examination, and even cleared out or expelled. Fifth, enable God's chosen people to discern nonbelievers, false leaders, and antichrists, ensuring they are not misled and can enter onto the correct path of believing in God as soon as possible. All five of the above points are important and are the inherent tasks of leadership. Fulfilling these five aspects of work is what makes someone a qualified church leader. Additionally, special circumstances must also be handled properly. For example, some people's negativity and weakness may be temporary, and you should treat them appropriately. You cannot make sweeping judgments; if someone is temporarily negative and you label them as a "negative Nancy" or "chronically negative" and say that God no longer wants them, then that is not appropriate. Moreover, everyone should fulfill their individual roles and contribute according to their abilities. Arrangements for performing duty should be made appropriately based on individuals' gifts, talents, caliber, age, and the length of time they have believed in God. This approach must be tailored to fit different kinds of people, allowing them to fulfill their duties in God's house and maximize their function. If you keep these considerations in mind, then you will develop a burden, and you'll always have to be focused on observing. Observing what? Not who looks good so you can interact more with them; not who you think is ugly so you can exclude them; not who seems to have capability and status so you can ingratiate yourself with them; and certainly not who doesn't bow down to you so you can try to punish them. Not any of these things. So what should you observe? You should discern people based on God's words, on His attitudes and requirements toward various types of people, and treat them based on principles; this aligns with the truth. First, categorize all kinds of people in the church: those with good quality and an ability to accept the truth as one category, those with poor quality and an inability to accept the truth as another, those who can fulfill their duties as another, and those who cannot as yet another. Finally, those nonbelievers who always complain, spread notions, fall into negativity, and cause disturbances should also be placed in the same category. Once you have categorized everyone, and have thoroughly perceived the true state of each group according to God's words, seeing clearly who can be saved and who cannot, then you will be able to see through all sorts of people; you will understand God's intentions, and know whom God wants to save and whom He wants to cast out. Does all this not arise because of your burden? Is this not the correct attitude to have toward duty? If you possess this correct attitude and a burden arises in you, then you can do your work well.

If you do not treat your duties this way and instead view performing your duties as if you're in an official position, always thinking, "Being a leader is like holding office; this is a blessing from God! Now that I have status, people have to listen to me, and that's a good thing!"—if you think being a leader is the same as being an official, then you're in trouble. You will definitely lead in the manner of an official and based on how officials operate; can you perform the church's work properly then? With such a view, you will undoubtedly be exposed and cast out. You'd always be picturing yourself as an official, where you'd be surrounded by people wherever you went, and people would comply with whatever you said. Also, you'd get first dibs on any benefits in the church. Whatever work the church had, you'd only need to give orders and not have to do anything yourself. What kind of mindset is this? Is this not indulging in the benefits of status? Is this not a corrupt disposition? All of those who do not pursue the truth perform their duties based on a satanic disposition. Many leaders and workers have been exposed and cast out because they always performed their duties based on a satanic disposition, without accepting even a hint of the truth. Presently, some leaders still behave this way. After becoming a leader, they feel somewhat elated inside, and a bit self-satisfied. It's hard to describe the feeling, but in any case, they think they've done quite well. However, they then ponder, "I can't be cocky. Cockiness is a sign of arrogance, and arrogance is a precursor to failure. I should be low-key." On the surface, they act low-key and tell everyone that this is an elevation and commission from God, that they have no choice but to do it. Inside, however, they secretly rejoice: "Finally, I've been chosen. Who says my caliber isn't good? If my caliber were poor, how could I have been chosen? Why wasn't someone else chosen? It looks like I do have advantages over others." When this duty comes upon them, these are the things they first think about in their hearts. They do not ponder, "Now that this duty has come upon me, how should I fulfill it? Who has done good work in the past that I should learn from? What are God's requirements for fulfilling this duty? Are there any such requirements in the work arrangements of the church? I never used to worry about these aspects of the church's work, but now that I've been chosen to be a leader, what should I do?" Actually, as long as you have the resolution and can seek the truth, there is a path. If you treat the work as your duty, it will be easy to do it well. Some people become leaders and say, "These people are now entrusted to me? How they gather and what work is arranged for them will be up to me? Oh my, I feel a heavy weight on my heart right now." What do these words imply? It's as if they can accomplish great things; it's all empty talk and doctrines. Isn't this kind of person a bit hypocritical? Have any of you ever said such things? (Yes.) Then you all are quite hypocritical too. However, such behavior is normal for people. Even those who become minor officials have to show off a bit. They suddenly feel their personal value has risen and, as soon as they get a taste of some status and fame, their hearts are overturned like a surging sea, and they become like a different person. Their corrupt dispositions and extravagant desires all emerge. Everyone has these negative, passive behaviors. This is a commonality among corrupt humankind. Whoever is a corrupt human being has it. Some people, after becoming leaders, aren't sure how they should walk anymore; some aren't sure how they should talk to people. Of course, it is not because of timidity that they're not sure how they should talk, but rather uncertainty about how a leader should conduct themselves. Others, after becoming leaders, are unsure what to eat or wear. There are all kinds of behaviors. Do any of you exhibit these behaviors? To varying degrees, you all certainly do. So how long will it take to move past these states and behaviors? One or two years, three or five years, or ten years? That depends on one's resolve and the degree to which they pursue the truth.

In the process of pursuing the truth, some people's understanding of the truth is directly proportional to their entry; the two are equivalent. They can enter into as much truth as they are able to understand; the depth of their understanding of the truth is also the depth of their entry, as well as the depth of their comprehension, feelings, and experiences. However, some people understand a lot of doctrines, but their practice and entry amount to zero. Therefore, no matter how many sermons they have listened to, they are never able to solve their inner difficulties. When faced with a small matter, their ugly side immediately comes out, and they cannot control it no matter how they try; no matter how they disguise it, their corruption still manifests. They remain unable to accept the truth or seek the truth for solutions. They even learn to put on a facade, to deceive, and to pretend to be good. Their corrupt dispositions remain unshed and unchanged; this is the outcome of not pursuing the truth. So, when all is said and done, it all comes back to that same phrase: Pursuing the truth is very important. The same applies to fulfilling one's duties. No matter what duty you receive, no matter what duty has come upon you, whether it is a duty that entails great responsibility or a simpler one, or even if it's not very prominent, if you are able to seek the truth and treat the duty according to the truth principles, then you will be able to fulfill your duty well. Moreover, in the process of performing your duties, you will experience varying degrees of growth in both your life entry and dispositional change. However, if you do not pursue the truth and merely treat your duty as your own management, your own task, or treat it as your own preference or personal work, then you've got trouble. Treating your duty as your own business and treating it according to the truth principles are different. When you treat your duty as your own management, what are you pursuing? You are pursuing fame, profit, and status, expecting others to meet your demands. What will be the end result of performing your duty in this manner? In one respect, performing your duty in this manner will not meet the standard; it amounts to futile effort. Even if you have exerted great effort on the surface, you haven't sought the truth, so the fruits of your duty will be poor, and God will not be pleased. In another respect, you will often commit transgressions, often disrupt and disturb, and often make mistakes that result in adverse consequences. Now many people fall far short in performing their duties. They act willfully and arbitrarily, achieving basically no results, and sometimes even causing losses to the work of the church.

Performing your duty in such a way is truly disrupting and disturbing the work of the church; it's the behavior of a downright evildoer. Those who consistently take a careless and perfunctory approach to fulfilling their duties must be exposed, so they can reflect upon themselves. If they can truly reflect, recognize their mistakes, and hate themselves, they can stay and continue performing their duties. But if they never admit to their mistakes and still defend and justify themselves, claiming that there is no love in God's house and that they are being treated unfairly, then this is a sign of being stubbornly unrepentant, and they should be cleared out from the church. What is the root cause of these people's disruptions and disturbances? Is it because they intentionally planned to disrupt and disturb? No, the main reason is that they have no love for the truth at all, and their humanity is very bad. Some of these individuals have some caliber and can understand the truth, but they do not accept the truth in the slightest, let alone practice it. Their humanity is extremely vile. Regardless of what duty they perform, they are always causing disruptions and disturbances, wrecking the work of the church, and bringing about many evil outcomes with a terrible influence. There is no doubt that these people are nonbelievers, and that they are all wicked people. This is primarily why they are cast out. Now, most people can discern nonbelievers. When they see the various behaviors of these individuals, they feel angry. How could these people be considered believers in God? They are Satan's lackeys, sent to disrupt and disturb the work of the church. Some are purely freeloaders, belonging to those who love ease and hate work; they don't want to do any work but still want to eat well every day. Aren't they parasites? They are even inferior to guard dogs. These people have thus been cast out. People who genuinely believe in God are all people who are willing and eager to fulfill their duty. Although most people don't know what duty actually means, at the very least they know in their hearts that people should fulfill their duty, and they are willing to do so. But does being willing to fulfill one's duties mean that one is therefore practicing the truth? Does this internal willingness mean that one has fulfilled their duties well? Absolutely not. One must put the truth into practice and meet the standard of acting according to principles to be considered as having fulfilled their duties well. Before you've put the truth into practice, no matter how much faith you claim to have, or how eager and willing you say you are—able to risk your life, not hesitating to go through fire and water—these are all just slogans that serve no purpose. You must, based on this willingness, also act according to the truth principles. You say, "I don't particularly love the truth, nor do I pursue it, and I haven't changed much in disposition while fulfilling my duties. But there is one thing I've held onto: I do whatever I'm told to do. I don't cause disruptions or disturbances; I may not be able to achieve submission, but I do listen." Wouldn't someone who can do this get to remain in the church and perform their duties normally? But those evildoers and nonbelievers who were removed couldn't even meet this lowest requirement, and they even created disturbances. Such nonbelievers or evildoers should not be allowed to remain in the church to perform their duties. God's chosen people must discern nonbelievers and evildoers; otherwise, they will be easily misled by them. Any person with conscience and reason should adopt an attitude of rejection toward nonbelievers and evildoers.

Fulfilling one's duties is the most crucial aspect of believing in God. First, one must understand what duty is, and then gradually gain genuine experience and understanding of it. What is the minimum attitude a person should have toward their duty? If you say, "The house of God gave this duty to me, so it belongs to me. I can do as I please, because this is my business and no one can interfere," is this an acceptable attitude? Absolutely not. If this is your attitude while performing your duty, you are in trouble, because your attitude is not in line with the truth principles. Your attitude is one of doing whatever you want rather than seeking the truth, let alone having a Godfearing heart. If a person is too willful, they will be somewhat neglectful of their proper work while performing their duty. What attitude should a person have when performing their duty? They must have a desire to obey God and satisfy Him. If they do not complete the commission God has entrusted to them, they feel they have let God down; and if they have not performed their duty properly, they feel they are not worthy of being called human. Having this sort of attitude while performing your duty makes you loyal. To perform your duty well, you first must know what God demands, seek truth, and seek the principles. Once you have ascertained that the commission God has given you is your duty, you should seek by thinking, "How can I perform my duty well? Which truth principles should I practice? What does God demand of people? What work should I do? How should I act so that I carry out my responsibilities and am loyal?" Who are you being loyal to? To God. You must be loyal to God and perform your responsibilities for people. You should perform your duty according to God's words and the truth principles, and hold fast to your duty. What does it mean to hold fast to your duty? For example, if a duty has been given to you for a year or two, but, so far, no one has checked up on you, what should you do? If no one checks up on you, does that mean the duty is gone? No. Pay no mind to whether anyone checks up on you or inspects what you are doing; this task was entrusted to you, so it is your responsibility. You should consider how this job should be done and how it can be done well, and that is how you should do it. If you are always waiting for others to check up on you, for them to supervise you and urge you on, is this the attitude you should have in your duty? What kind of attitude is this? This is a passive attitude; it is not the attitude you should adopt toward your duty. If you adopt this attitude, your performance of your duty will certainly be inadequate. In order to perform your duty adequately, you first must have a proper attitude, and your attitude must be in line with the truth principles. This is the only way to guarantee you perform your duty well.

Regarding what duty is, one's attitude toward duty, as well as the difference between fulfilling one's duty and engaging in any kind of worldly work, our fellowship on these topics will conclude here for now. You should all ponder over the content that has been

fellowshiped. For example, why discuss the relationship between fulfilling one's duty and engaging in personal management? What is the intended outcome of discussing these topics? On the positive side, it can provide people with a correct path, correct direction, and correct principles for fulfilling their duty. On the negative side, it can also help people recognize which behaviors count as engaging in personal management. These two aspects are both interconnected and distinct from one another. Understanding these two sides is not only about understanding mere words of the truth; you must comprehend which states and manifestations are involved. Once you have a thorough understanding of these states and manifestations and can discern them, the next time you exhibit these incorrect states and manifestations, if you are a person who pursues the truth, you will seek the truth to find a way out from here. If you don't understand this aspect of the truth, you may engage in personal management thinking that you are expending yourself for God, and even believing that you are fulfilling your duty and are very loyal. Such consequences will arise from not understanding the truth. For instance, during the process of performing your duty, when some of your thoughts and methods, as well as the intentions and motives behind your actions, are revealed, you realize that you're not fulfilling your duty and have already deviated from the principles and scope of fulfilling one's duty; the nature has changed, and you are actually engaging in personal management. Only when you understand these truths can you find a way out from here and put an end to such thoughts, actions, and manifestations. However, if you don't understand the truth and engage in your own personal management while performing your duty, you will be oblivious to the fact that you've already violated the principles. Like Paul, for example; after working and running around for so many years, he ended up shouting at God, saying, "If You don't give me a crown, then You are not God!" You see, he could still utter such words. If people today, having understood the truth, still follow the path of Paul, they are not ones who love the truth. If you are a person who genuinely believes in God, understanding the truth is crucial for you. Without understanding the truth, you are definitely living based on a satanic disposition. At best, you'll merely adhere to some rules and avoid committing obvious wrongdoings, still thinking that you are practicing the truth. That would be guite pitiable. So, if one desires to pursue the truth and aims to enter into the truth reality, they must first understand the truth. The purpose of understanding the truth is so that people can accurately perceive other people and events, be discerning, have principles for action, have a path of practice, and achieve submission to God. When you understand the truth, you can discern all sorts of people, events, and things, choose the right path of practice, speak and act according to principles, shed your corrupt dispositions, and achieve submission to God. If you don't understand the truth, then the path you walk will certainly be wrong, and you won't have any life entry, nor will you be able to be saved. Some people are particularly good at disguising themselves, appearing as though they are in pursuit of the truth, but they have no principles in their actions and all they do causes disruptions and disturbances, creating much trouble for the work of the church; such people cannot be saved. Therefore, the purpose of frequently listening to sermons and frequently eating and drinking of God's words is not for the sake of superficial engagement or filling the heart, nor is it to equip oneself with doctrines or practice eloquence; it is to equip oneself with the truth and attain an understanding of the truth. What was just discussed is actually not particularly deep in terms of the truth of knowing God; it is the most basic truth. People's understanding of the truth is limited and varies in depth, and it depends on the individual's caliber. Some people comprehend more deeply; that is, they have the comprehension ability. Others comprehend quite superficially. Regardless of the depth of one's comprehension, what's most crucial is the practice of the truth. However, the truth cannot be divided into big or small, noble or lowly, nor can it be divided into deep or shallow. That is to say, truth can be classified as the most basic or the most elementary, but it cannot be divided into degrees of depth; it's just that people comprehend and experience it to varying depths. Anything that touches upon the essence of the truth is equally profound and not something anyone can fully experience or completely possess. No matter what aspect of the truth is concerned, people have to start from the shallowest layer in their comprehension and practice, and then gradually progress from the shallow to the deep, reaching a true understanding of the truth and entering into reality. The shallowest part of the truth is what can be understood literally. If people cannot practice or enter it, then they only understand some words and doctrines. Merely understanding words and doctrines falls far short of the essence of the truth. People who don't understand the truth always regard the ability to explain the literal meaning as understanding the truth; this is just human ignorance. If your practice of the truth is only about following rules and rigidly applying them without any principles, don't think that this is practicing the truth and entering into reality; you are still far from it. If you continue to practice and experience for several more years, and discover much more light, which will suffice for you to practice and experience for several more months or years, and later, with yet more experience, you can discover newer light, progressing like this from the shallow to the deep, in a step-by-step manner, then you have truly entered into the truth reality. Only one who has fully entered into the truth reality is one who has obtained the truth. Even if one day you live out the reality of the truth, and it can be said that you've obtained the truth, in actuality what you've experienced and come to know is still limited. You cannot say that you are the truth, nor can you claim like Paul did that "to me to live is Christ" (Philippians 1:21), because the truth is too profound, and what one can experience and understand in several decades of a lifetime is extremely limited. Obviously, then, understanding the truth is achievable by people to some extent, but obtaining the truth is by no means an easy matter. If one cannot understand or put into practice even the shallowest truths, then that is someone who does not love the truth, and definitely lacks spiritual understanding; people who are nowhere near the truth cannot be saved. Those who never understand the truth cannot perform their duties well; they are wastes of life, beasts in human clothing. Some people think they understand the truth just because they understand some doctrines. If they really understand some truths, then why can't they perform their duties well? Why do they have no principles in their actions? This shows that understanding doctrines is useless; understanding more doctrines doesn't mean understanding the truth.

After fellowshiping the topic of duty, we will now move on to the issue of adequate performance of duty. With regard to the adequate performance of duty, the emphasis is on the word "adequate." So, how should "adequate" be defined? In this, too, there are truths to seek. Is it adequate merely to do a passable job? For the specific details of how to understand and regard the word "adequate," you must understand many truths and fellowship more on the truth. In the course of fulfilling your duty, you must understand the truth and the principles; only then can you arrive at an adequate performance of duty. Why should people fulfill their duties? Once they believe in God and have accepted His commission, people have their share of responsibility and obligation in the work of God's house and in the site of God's work, and, in turn, because of this responsibility and obligation, they have become an element in God's work, one of the recipients of His work, and one of the recipients of His salvation. There is quite a substantial relationship between people's salvation and how they fulfill their duties, whether they can do them well, and whether they can do them adequately. Since you have become a part of God's house and accepted His commission, you now have a duty. It is not for you to say how this duty should be fulfilled; it is for God to say; it is for the truth to say; and it is dictated by the standards of the truth. Therefore, people should know, understand and be clear on how God measures people's duties, what He measures them according to—this is a worthwhile thing to seek. In God's work, different people receive different duties. That is, people with different gifts, calibers, ages, and conditions receive different duties at different times. No matter what duty you have received, and no matter the times or circumstances of your receiving it, your duty is only a responsibility and obligation you are supposed to perform, it is not your management, nor is it your business. The standard God demands for the performance of your duty is that it is "adequate." What does it mean to be "adequate"? It means to meet God's demands and satisfy Him. God must say it is adequate and it must receive His commendation. Only then will the performance of your duty have been adequate. If God says it is not adequate, no matter how long you have been performing your duty, or how much of a price you have paid, it is not adequate. Then what will the result be? It will all be classified as rendering service. Only a minority of service-doers with loyal hearts will be spared. If they are not loyal in their service, then they do not have a hope of being spared. Speaking plainly, they will be destroyed in a disaster. If one never meets the mark when performing their duty, they will have their right to perform a duty taken away. After this right is taken away, some people will be cast aside. After being cast aside, they will be taken care of by other means. Does "taken care of by other means" mean to be cast out? Not necessarily. God looks mainly at whether a person has repented. Therefore, how you perform your duty is crucial, and people should take it seriously and conscientiously. Because performing your duty is directly connected to your life entry and entry into the truth realities, as well as big issues like your salvation and being perfected, you must treat the performance of your duty as the first and foremost task when believing in God. You cannot be muddleheaded about it. In the process of fulfilling their duties, various people will exhibit a range of different behaviors. These different behaviors are visible not only to people but also to God. It's not just the church that scores and evaluates; ultimately, God will also give scores and evaluations to all those who perform their duties. Some people basically meet the standard, while others are utterly inadequate. Some inadequate people will still be under observation, while some will already have been definitively categorized by God. Who are the people that God sees as inadequate? They are those with poor humanity and lacking a conscience and reason, who consistently perform their duties in a careless and perfunctory manner. Regardless of how much of God's grace they enjoy, they are uninterested in reciprocation and devoid of gratitude. Of course, this naturally includes evildoers as well. It can be said that anyone with poor humanity and lacking conscience and reason performs their duties inadequately. Those who are clearly evil will inevitably commit countless wrongs while performing their duties. As long as they are not cleared out, they will keep committing evil. Such people must be cleared out promptly. Of course, there are also some people who appear to have some semblance of humanity and who don't seem to be bad people, but their performance of duty is careless and perfunctory, and yields no results. After being pruned and dealt with, and receiving fellowship on the truth, it will depend on how they ultimately perform and whether or not they have sincerely repented. For such people, God is still waiting and observing. As for those who have poor humanity and lack conscience and reason, as well as those who are clearly evil, God has already reached a conclusive verdict on them—they are to be thoroughly cast out.

Next, let us fellowship about what manifestations there are of the inadequate performance of duty. I'll fellowship an example first, and you all can discern whether this person is performing his duty adequately and in accordance with God's requirements. There was someone who was selected to be a leader in the church and was hosted by a half-believing family, where some members were believers and some were not. However, they all had a peculiar trait, which was that they were particularly adept at reading the mood of and flattering those in authority. What would this trait inadvertently form for the leader? (It would form a temptation.) It formed a temptation. Was this a blessing or a misfortune for him? Whether it was a blessing or a misfortune remains to be seen; let's continue. After this family hosted the leader, they served him meat and good food at every meal. Why did they receive the leader this way? Was it out of love? Would they have received the brothers and sisters this way? Definitely not. When the leader was there, they cooked meat for him every day. Eventually, the leader, delighted with the meals, told the family, "Your whole family loves God. Your mother can enter the kingdom, your son can enter the kingdom, and you and your wife can also enter the kingdom. In the future, your entire family can enter the kingdom." Upon hearing this, the family became elated, thinking, "Our entire family can enter the kingdom, even the unbelievers among us can enter. It seems the meat we've been giving him hasn't been wasted; we should continue to serve it to him." In reality, this family had little understanding of what entering the kingdom entails, but they knew it's a good thing. Who among those who believe in God wouldn't want to enter the kingdom of heaven and receive blessings? They thought, "As long as the leader says we can enter the kingdom, then we can, right? The leader's word is final; the leader represents God, after all!" Afterward, the more the leader said they could enter the kingdom, the more lavish the meals they offered him. Gradually, this leader no longer wanted to visit other families because they didn't offer him these good things or flatter him in this way. Not long after, the leader gained more and more weight; his head grew fatter as well, going from a "human head" to a "pig's head." During a co-workers' gathering, he was immediately noticeable. Having not seen him for just a month, he had gained so much weight that they urgently questioned him about his work. They discovered serious issues and gave him a stern dealing with, dissecting the essence of his problem before eventually replacing this false leader. Further investigation revealed more problems: This false leader didn't do any real work and reveled in the benefits of his status every day. He favored those who flattered him, promoting them, while suppressing those who didn't offer him gifts. He even demanded that his wife bring him more chicken to eat. So, what do you think of this false leader's performance of his duties? What was his attitude toward his duties? He wasn't actually doing the work; it's more like he had gone somewhere just to be an official. Otherwise, how could he have gained so much weight? There are two reasons for this: On one hand, he deliberately chose host families where he could eat meat, staying there and continually indulging himself; on the other, he definitely had no sense of burden while performing his duties, and he didn't endure any hardship. If a leader or worker has a sense of burden, upon seeing the extensive workload of the church and the many issues that urgently need resolving, wouldn't they be stressed and anxious? This anxiousness would whip them into action; they'd immediately start addressing these issues, expending energy and enduring some hardships. Physically, they would only lose weight; it's a natural law. Under what conditions would one continue to eat more and gain weight? It could only be from eating to one's heart's content all day long and not focusing on anything else, being free from burden, sitting high and mighty, disconnected from the community and the workplace, indulging in fleshly comforts. Only then could one continue to gain weight, transforming from a "human head" to a "pig's head" in just over a month. So, how well was this leader performing his duties? The nature of his role as a leader had changed; this was no longer about fulfilling his duties but about indulging in comfort and the benefits of status. He was acting like a government official. Not only did he shirk real work, he also engaged in wrongdoing. If someone didn't flatter him or provide him with delicious food, he suppressed them. Moreover, he incited brothers and sisters to join him in dealing with them, eventually arousing public ire. People began to feel repelled by him and distanced themselves from him. Setting aside the reasons for his removal, let's just discuss the adequacy of the performance of his duties. His indulgence in the benefits of status and lack of real work is the most serious issue. He was not serving God's chosen people; he was acting over them like an official, and was in no way fulfilling his duties. In his work as a leader, he showed not a shred of loyalty in performing his duties, let alone devoting his heart and energy. He only gave his heart and energy to eating, drinking, and enjoying himself. He racked his brains thinking about how to enjoy the benefits of his status, and he didn't fellowship the truth to the host family to restrict this kind of fawning behavior from them. Moreover, he deceived them, saying that only such hosting would allow entry into the kingdom and earn rewards. Isn't this doing evil? If this was how he treated the host family, what would he do in the work of the church? How would he treat God's chosen people? Surely it would be full of deception, carelessness, and perfunctoriness. Did this person truly know what duty was? Did he know what the work that God entrusted to him was? What did he take this commission to be? He took it as capital and as the basis for enjoying the benefits of his status, and as a result, he committed numerous evils, disturbing church life and causing loss to the life entry of brothers and sisters. Such a way of performing duty is not only inadequate, but has also turned into wicked deeds. Lacking any adequate component in the performance of one's duty, can they be remembered by God? (No.) Clearly they can't, which is quite pitiful. It is pitiful to not understand the truth—is it even more pitiful to understand the truth but not practice it? (Yes.) This is Case One, the "Human Head That Turned Into a Pig's Head" case. This case is relatively simple: It involves indulging in the benefits of status, performing one's duty without a shred of loyalty, and lacking even a bit of a God-fearing heart. This leader treated his God-given duty as capital for indulging in the benefits of his status. This is easy to discern. Remember the name of Case One, so that in the future you can draw a comparison, discerning others, and motivating yourselves. What do you think of this case I've talked about? Do you despise such people and such actions? (Yes.) If you accept God's commission, could you commit such acts? If you could have more reason than that false leader and be somewhat restrained, and could strive for the truth, then there is still some hope. But if you could indulge in eating and drinking and enjoying the benefits of status like him, then you will be exposed and cast out; you'll be purely a false leader and a person despised by God. Now you have some discernment and understand some truths. The extent to which you can restrain and control yourself determines how much hope you have for salvation; they are directly proportional. If you can't restrain yourself, and continue to act according to your own preferences, living in a corrupt disposition and indulging in the benefits of status, pleased and intoxicated when someone flatters you, without any self-reflection or genuine repentance, then the hope you have for receiving salvation is zero.

Next, let's talk about another case. During the expansion of the gospel, many people in the church go to various places to spread the gospel. The work of spreading the gospel is a duty for anyone. Regardless of how you treat it or whether you think this duty is good or not, in general, it is a commission given by God to people. Speaking of God's commissions to people, this involves people's responsibility, and it also involves people's duty. Since it involves people's duty, it also involves how one performs their duty. During the process of spreading the gospel, some people specifically seek out wealthy areas and wealthy households. When they see someone driving a nice car or living in a big house, they feel envious and jealous. If they find a household that hosts them well, they linger and harbor a covetous heart. They think that since they have made contributions in the process of spreading the gospel, they should enjoy some grace. So what does their gospel-spreading become? All they do is indulge in fleshly pleasures, exchanging their service for physical enjoyment; it becomes the selling of their labor. After two or three years, they have gained some people by spreading the gospel there and even established a church, thus accumulating some capital. Then they start to get carried away, and by the time they "gloriously" return to their hometown, they are radiant, having practically become a fashionable person. They bring back high-end household appliances and electronic products, and are dressed in fine clothing from head to toe. The local people don't recognize them anymore, thinking that they must have struck it rich somewhere. Is there not a problem here? They've been a believer for so many years, always performing their duty away from home. Initially, there wasn't really anything of value in their home, but now they take back all the fine clothing and good appliances people give; they're both well-dressed and well-equipped. They consider this God's grace. But where did these things actually come from? It could be said they were exchanged for their labor of spreading the gospel. Some others saw their many years of faith and their hard work in gospel-spreading, so they give this person some good things. Is this "giving" charity? Is it compassion? If these good things were obtained because of gospel-spreading, given to them through flattery by others, is it appropriate for this person to consider them God's favor or God's grace? To put it bluntly, they're taking advantage of the opportunity to spread the gospel to acquire these things. If they're always lamenting their poverty in front of others, while also mentioning they like this or that item, and then people reluctantly give it to them, doesn't that have the semblance of extortion or blackmail? Some people who preach the gospel like to tell others, "We gospel spreaders are messengers of God, sent by God. You receive God's gospel from us—what a tremendous blessing and advantage you're gaining! Given how wealthy you are and how much of God's grace you've enjoyed, shouldn't you show some appreciation? Shouldn't you share some of your excess or unused items with us?" After such persuasion, some people, out of embarrassment, end up giving in, and the gospel spreaders think they're perfectly justified. Do those who give really do it willingly? Regardless of whether the givers are willing, are these things that gospel spreaders should be receiving? (No.) Some rationalize: "Why shouldn't I receive these? I've worked hard to preach the gospel; isn't receiving these few things just God's grace?" What are you doing when you preach the gospel? Is this your job to make a living? Preaching the gospel is not a transaction; it's your duty. When you demand things from people, you're essentially demanding things from God. But since you can't reach God, and you dare not ask Him, you reach out to people instead, and mislead them by speaking a slew of spiritual theories. You feel you've earned merit by gaining some people through gospelspreading and that you are entitled to receive some compensation for your efforts. You don't think it would be good asking for money directly, so you ask for things instead, believing that this way, your efforts haven't been in vain. Is this fulfilling your duty? (It's not.) The nature of your actions has changed. What have you turned gospel-spreading into? You've commercialized God's gospel, bartering it for these material things. What kind of behavior is this? (Opportunism.) This is opportunism? Is calling it opportunism downplaying its severity? Isn't it actually doing evil, isn't it a wicked deed? (Yes.) Why is it considered a wicked deed? Spreading the gospel is performing duty and bearing witness to God; as you bear witness to God, you simultaneously bring the gospel to a person and God gains that person, and you've thus completed your mission. Whatever you should receive for completing your mission, God will give it to you; you don't need to ask anyone, nor does anyone have a reason to exchange charity for this gospel. God's gospel is priceless; no amount of money can buy it, nor can it be traded for anything. When you use gospel-spreading as an opportunity to gain material benefits, you lose your testimony; this approach is blasphemous and a mark of disgracing God. Moreover, what is the nature of making people grateful to you after you spread the gospel to them? This is stealing God's glory! God's gospel and God's work are not commodities. God freely bestows His gospel upon man; it is free and involves no transactions whatsoever. Yet people turn God's gospel into a commodity to sell to others, demanding money and material things from them. This lacks testimony and disgraces the name of God. Isn't this a wicked deed? (Yes.) It is indeed a wicked deed. Is this adequate performance of duty? (No.) Is this more severe in nature than the case we just talked about, the "Human Head That Turned Into a Pig's Head"? (Yes.) Where does the severity lie? (In disgracing God.) This is disgracing God, blaspheming God, and stealing God's glory. Taking God's gospel and selling it to people, vending it to them as if it were a commodity, and then profiting exorbitantly and seeking personal gain from it—what sort of creatures would do this? These are bandits and evildoers, behaving in the way of Satan! God clearly created heaven, earth, and all things, as well as humankind, yet Satan and evil spirits mislead people by saying they are the ones who created humans, heaven, and earth, making people worship them as God and the Creator. Isn't this stealing God's glory? This is a sin, it is a wicked deed, it is opposing God. Is man's selling the gospel the same as

Satan's behavior? (Yes.) What is the purpose of their selling the gospel? To make people regard them as the messenger of the gospel, as if the gospel originates from them and they have the power to make decisions. Isn't this stealing God's glory? (Yes.) What kind of sin has been committed by stealing God's glory? What is the nature of this? This is the wicked deed of opposing God; it is behavior that blasphemes God. Does spreading the gospel in this way still count as performing one's duty? This is entirely doing evil; it is opposing God. Spreading the gospel in this way is not bearing witness for God at all, so it is not fulfilling one's duty; it is purely doing evil. Some people say: "Spreading the gospel is such hard work; getting some good things is only fair. What's the big deal? This doesn't count as anything wrong among the unbelievers." Is this statement correct? It depends on what your intentions are, what you are coveting, and what is the nature of it. If you are doing it for personal gain, what you are selling is God's gospel, what you are selling is the truth, and what you ultimately gain is your personal benefit—then it is indeed a wicked deed. Is it excessive to characterize this as a wicked deed? (No.) It's not excessive in the slightest. When someone has received their duty and carried it out, but then such consequences arise, who is to blame? (The person themselves.) They can only blame themselves. So how did these consequences come about? It is directly related to people's evil nature. Some people do not pursue the truth, but they have a sense of shame, character, and conscience, so they wouldn't do such things. If someone does engage in such actions, it shows that this person lacks humanity; they are greedy and have a vicious disposition. This leads not only to a failure to perform their duties adequately, but it actually turns it into doing evil. Some people say: "How can it be characterized as doing evil? They've managed to gain quite a few people through their gospel-spreading; just the fact that they've had obvious results should negate the idea that they're doing evil, right?" Is this statement correct? (No.) Why is it incorrect? Spreading the gospel is their duty, their responsibility. What is the intention and purpose behind their duty? What principles guide their duty? Are they responsible in their actions? Based on these factors, one can determine whether the person is performing their duties or doing evil. Although they have been performing their duties, the starting point for their performance is wrong; they haven't acted according to principles and have committed many wicked deeds. There's not the slightest manifestation of practicing the truth. What is the essence of this kind of gospel-spreading? (Selling the gospel.) What should this case be called? The "Selling the Gospel" case. Just hearing this name, you know the nature of the issue is very serious. How could someone sell God's gospel? The nature of this issue of selling the gospel is very serious. So, every time the selling of the gospel is mentioned, shouldn't people know what the matter is, what the states, behaviors, and methods are? This is Case Two, and the nature of this case is more serious than the previous one.

The following case is also one that occurred during the process of spreading the gospel. In the past, the house of God had established some principles and methods for spreading the gospel, including methods that concern compassion and making friends. This allowed some people to find loopholes to exploit. Which people exploited these loopholes? People with an evil nature who do not love the truth. In the process of spreading the gospel, there are indeed some evil people who seize this opportunity to find romantic partners and engage in romantic and intimate relationships. When such things happen, they think there are reasons for it, when in fact it's these evil individuals of Satan exploiting loopholes. Using the opportunity of spreading the gospel to come into contact with the opposite sex, when these people find someone suitable or preferable, they do everything in their ability to find chances to interact with and entice them. On the surface, it appears to be for the sake of gaining people through spreading the gospel, but in reality, it's to satisfy their personal lust. They do all these things under the banner of spreading the gospel, under the banner of expanding God's work, under the banner of bearing witness for God and dedicating themselves to God, and also under the banner of fulfilling their duty. No one does these things unintentionally; in fact, they are fully aware yet doggedly pretend to be confused. Each person knows in their heart when they do these things that it is sinful, detested by God, and not permitted by God, but they can't control their fleshly lust, and they try hard to make excuses and justifications for the sins they commit. Can this conceal their own issues? If you commit such sins once or twice and then repent, God may still pardon you, but if you persistently refuse to change, you're in danger. Some people may feel somewhat uneasy each time they commit such a sin, wondering, "Can I be saved if I act this way?" But they then think, "This isn't a great evil; at most it's just an outpouring of corruption. I won't do it again; it won't affect my outcome and destination." Is this attitude toward committing a transgression one of genuine repentance? If there's not even remorse in their heart, will they not continue to relapse? I think it's very risky. Can such a person perform their duty adequately? In performing their duty, there are still elements of a "private operation"; they're mixing "public and private," which is a great adulteration! This is sure to offend God's disposition. These people cannot be deemed "adequate" in fulfilling their duty; this is more serious than asking for things or selling the gospel. How is it more serious? It's disgusting; it is a trade in flesh and lust. So, what is the nature of this issue? It's willfully sinning despite knowing the truth. The word "willfully" changes the nature of the issue. In fact, they know that the regulations and principles in the work arrangements are designed to get people to practice wisdom and to prevent Satan from gaining leverage against them. The aim is to bring people before God, but they exploit loopholes and seize opportunities to freely unleash their wicked lusts; this is called knowingly committing sin. What does the Bible say about this? ("For if we sin willfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remains no more sacrifice for sins" (Hebrews 10:26).) If even the sin offering of the cross is no longer available, do these people still have any relation to salvation? That depends on the situation. Some people act out of necessity, or denounce themselves internally, but they are forced to act this way due to the circumstances at the time. If the number of times is not too many, no more than three, they can be forgiven. What does it mean that they can be forgiven? It means that upon the first offense, if they can come to their senses, seek the truth, show signs of remorse, and turn back without committing an offense again, all while asking to perform their duties, they can be given a chance to atone for their sins. There is still hope for salvation in such cases, but how much hope depends on individual pursuit. No one can make a definitive judgment for you, no one can give you guarantees; it mainly depends on your own pursuit. I won't make any promises to you, saying that as long as you don't commit this sin again, you will surely be saved; I won't make that promise because I don't know what your future performance will be like. If you exceed the number of times for which forgiveness is possible, you repeatedly refuse to change, and you have no good deeds in the course of preaching the gospel that can offset your wicked deeds, then you are utterly done for. You've committed so much evil without a trace of good deeds; your preaching of the gospel is merely to engage recklessly in intimate relationships, not to perform your duty well—it is disconnected from your performance of duty. This is no longer an issue of having or not having a sin offering. What should such people be classified as? They should be classified as filthy demons and evil spirits. They are not normal humans. They are not just committing sins; they have nothing to do with performing their duty. Is there still hope for their salvation? No, there isn't. Such people have been kicked out of God's house; they have been cut out and God will not save them. What they do and how they behave not only fails to touch upon their duty; it can't even be considered a matter of adequate performance of duty. The end result and the outcome for such people will be determined based on their classification. Isn't this case quite disgusting? Its nature is even more severe than the second case we just discussed. Among such people, there are some whose cases are more severe in nature. Can they turn back? Can they have a repentant heart and stop doing such things, and still spread the gospel and render service in God's house? Are there people like this? (No.) Can they willingly render service? (No.) In fact, some of these people have gained some people during their time of spreading the gospel. But now, what has all this work they've done amounted to? It's amounted to service, not performing their duty. Actually, these people haven't been lacking in effort, but the path they've taken has determined their fate and outcome. Among those who also spread the gospel, is it the case that each of them will encounter such temptations? It can be said that everyone will face these sorts of temptations to varying degrees in different situations, but does that mean each of them will succumb to temptation and commit sin? (No.) Not everyone can commit sin, not everyone can engage in such activities—this condemns those who do engage in these kinds of activities, and they are thus exposed. This shows there is something wrong with their disposition and their humanity. Who can they blame for having such an outcome? (Themselves.) They can only blame themselves, and no one else.

Some people, no matter what transgressions they commit during their time of spreading the gospel, never seek the truth to resolve them, do not pray to God, and never engage in self-reflection, which shows that they are obstinately unrepentant. In the end, these people are cast out. I've heard of someone who, while spreading the gospel, took possession of a woman and would not even allow her to find a partner and get married; the nature of this is very severe. What kind of person is this? (A wicked person.) Can such wicked individuals remain in the house of God? (No.) God's house has no room for such tyrants; they disgrace God! By doing such things, they impact countless people's perception of God and cause so many to misunderstand Him! People will say, "How could someone who believes in God do such things?" This is already a disgrace to God. If the church does not expel and deal with such individuals but instead lets them continue spreading the gospel and offers them a chance to repent, then that is entirely wrong. This person is not a first-time offender; their behavior is severe in nature and they should be directly expelled. Otherwise, it would disgrace God and provide Satan with leverage to judge and condemn the house of God. So Satan cannot be afforded an opportunity to gain leverage; those who are habitually licentious must be expelled from the church. Such individuals are licentious spirits who have already disgraced God, and God will absolutely not save them. Regardless of how effective their preaching of the gospel is or how many people they've gained, if they don't walk the right path, they've destroyed and forfeited themselves. Such people are not allowed to exist within God's house; they are targets for being cut out. So, do their deeds count as performing their duty? No, all their contributions have been completely erased in the eyes of God and will not be remembered by Him. They are not merely inadequate; the nature of their performance of duty has shifted, and it has become doing evil. How does God deal with those who do evil? He cuts them out. What does being cut out mean? It means they are removed from among the people God has chosen and prepared to save—they do not belong among them. They are instead categorized among evil spirits, filthy demons, and the unsaved. What are their chances of attaining salvation? (Zero.) Though they performed their duties and followed God just the same, in the end this type of person reaches this point and is cast out. So you see, this is yet another type of person. Is the nature of this case more serious than the previous case? (Yes.) It is even more serious; it is targeted. This case should be merged with the third one; it falls under the category of a special, typical case in the third example, and it is targeted. What should this case be called? "Evildoers Will Be Cut Out," let's settle on that. For the three kinds of people in these three cases, their performance of duty basically amounted to rendering service to no effect. What does it mean to render service to no effect? It means that they turned their duty into the mere rendering of service—and even then, they didn't render service well or properly perform their duty. They didn't treat their duty as duty, and even committed various wrongdoings and wicked deeds and were ultimately cast out, meeting no good end. The nature of all three of these cases is very serious.

There is another case, and its nature is also quite severe. There was an individual who performed work for many years and, on the surface, seemed to pursue the truth and genuinely expend himself. He forsook marriage and family, abandoned his career and prospects, went to many places to perform his duties, and also undertook some work that was of little consequence. But in the process of performing his duties, he understood few truths because he did not really pursue the truth, and he thought he was doing well just because he could talk about some words and doctrines. What was more serious was that this person didn't practice the truth at all. So his performance of duty was merely preaching some doctrines and following some rules, usually behaving kindly toward others and offending no one. Regarding how to perform the work of the church and what issues still existed, he was not attentive, didn't put in the effort, and did not seek the truth to resolve these issues. In short, his attitude toward work was superficial and indifferent; it seemed like he didn't slack off, but he wasn't tiring himself out either. He didn't appear to be acting in a careless and perfunctory manner, but the results of his work were not particularly good. In one particular incident, due to his negligence and careless and perfunctory attitude, he caused a loss of over 10 million RMB to the offerings to God. Just what kind of a figure is 10 million RMB? Ordinary people, upon hearing this amount, would consider it an astronomical figure. They would gasp in disbelief and hardly dare to think about it, having never seen so much money in their lifetime. But this "old gentleman," after causing a loss of over 10 million RMB in offerings, had no remorse, no hint of repentance, and wasn't sad. When the church expelled him, he still complained. What sort of creature would do this? Let's discuss two points. First, this sum of money was lost while you were working, and regardless of whose fault it is, you are responsible. You had a responsibility to protect it, but you failed to do so. This is dereliction of duty, because this is not human money; this is an offering, and people should treat it with utmost loyalty. If the offerings suffer a loss, how should one think? Even death would not be sufficient compensation! What is a human life worth in money? If the loss is too great, even giving up one's life won't be enough to repay it! The key is that the nature of this issue is too severe. This "old gentleman" didn't take the loss of so many offerings seriously; this person is too detestable! Losing over 10 million RMB in offerings was like losing 100 or so RMB to him; he didn't report it at all to the Above, had no remorse for this issue at all, and didn't say to those around him, "Let's analyze how this money was lost and what should be done. Should we repay it or find another solution? Or perhaps we should inform the Above, admit responsibility and resign, and pray to God to confess our sins?" He didn't even have this attitude; is this despicable? (Yes.) It is all too despicable! His capacity for such great evildoing exposes his attitude toward his duty and toward God. Secondly, after being expelled, not only did he not accept it, nor confess his sin, nor repent, but he even complained. Such a person is beyond reason. Just think about what he could possibly have to complain about. He complained, "I've believed in God for over 20 years, I never got married, I gave up so much, endured so much suffering, and now they expel me, reject me. I'll find my own place!" Not long after, he got married. Tell Me, if a typical person—one with conscience and humanity—had a bit of sense of their conscience, would they get married that quickly? Would they be in the mood for it? Generally, a person with even a bit of conscience and humanity, when faced with such a grave issue, would even contemplate death, thinking, "My life is over, how could I have committed such an act after believing in God for over 20 years? I have only myself to blame and I deserve to be expelled! Forget about 10 million; I can't even afford to repay one million. Even if I were sold, I couldn't make up for it, my life isn't worth anything!" Why did you still do it when you knew you couldn't afford it? Don't you know that money was an offering, dedicated to God? That money wasn't yours; your responsibility was to safeguard it. It wasn't something that had no relation to you; it was something you had to keep safe. It was the most important thing, and your carelessness was a dereliction of duty. Having lost it, you certainly couldn't shirk responsibility for it. As someone who believes in God, didn't you have an obligation and responsibility to keep these offerings safe and prevent any mishaps? Shouldn't you have minimized the risk of something going wrong? If you can't even do that, what are you? Aren't you a living demon? (Yes.) That's utterly disgusting and devoid of humanity! Moreover, after being expelled, not only did he stop believing in God and get married, but he also disturbed the believers in his family—the nature of this is even more serious. He performed his duty for many years, forsook much, made many sacrifices, did quite a bit of work, took risks, and served time in jail. But these external factors do not determine one's fate. What does? The path one chooses. Had he taken the path of pursuing the truth, he wouldn't have ended up like this and wouldn't have caused such a great loss to God's house. It was absolutely not random for such a major mishap to occur; it was directly related to the quality of his humanity and the path he chose. Do you think God is aware of the path he's on? (Yes.) God knows. So, was this incident meant to expose him or cast him out? It was both to expose and to cast him out. From the human perspective, he seemed to be fulfilling his duty well, with devotion, expenditure, a willingness to pay the price, and an ability to endure hardship. So why would God do something like this to him? Why would God expose him? What was meant to be exposed? Was it merely to expose his end? No, it was meant to expose his faith, expose his humanity, expose his essence and nature—all of these have now been laid bare. Can God still save such a person? Does God hold even a glimmer of hope for him? God has absolutely no hope for such a person. Does God have any love or mercy left for him? None at all. Some might say: "If God has no love or mercy for him, then is there only righteousness, majesty, and wrath left?" That's correct. Such a wicked person no longer needs love or mercy, and there's no longer a need for that, because he has severely offended God's disposition. All that's left from God for him is righteousness, majesty, and wrath. His end has nothing to do with God's management work, it has absolutely nothing to do with God's work of saving humankind; he has been cast out and removed. Therefore, no matter where this person is now, in God's eyes, he is but a living dead man, a walking corpse dwelling among filthy demons and evil spirits, among those who wear human faces but possess beastly hearts and are beasts in human clothing. These are his qualities, and he has been cut out from the Creator's sight. Considering his end and his final attitude toward this major event that occurred in his life, did his performance of duty all this while have anything to do with the word "adequate"? (No.) How do you know that his performance of duty was not adequate even before this event occurred? Is it through judgment and inference, or did you make this evaluation by observing his essence? (By observing his essence.) That's correct. Take Paul as an example—if he had pursued the truth, if he could have sought to be perfected like Peter, he would not have spoken such blasphemous words. Every outcome has a cause; the outcome this individual met with has its underlying reasons. From the fact that this person was able to reach this point today, and from his attitude toward God, his attitude toward the offerings, and his attitude toward his own wicked deeds, it's enough to let people see clearly what path he was walking and what his faith in God really was. This completely exposes his essence and the path he was on. If he were on the path of pursuing the truth, the path of fearing God and shunning evil, and if he could genuinely treat his duty as his responsibility and obligation, how would he have handled this situation when it inevitably occurred? He definitely would not have the attitude he has now—that of resistance and complaint. His demonic side has been laid bare; the nature essence deep within his soul has been completely exposed. He is not a human being, he is a devil. If he were human, he wouldn't have ended up like this after having believed in God for over 20 years. If he were human, how much regret would he feel for such a great loss of the offerings? How many tears would he shed? To what extent would he tremble? He would feel inescapably responsible and guilty of terrible sin, believing himself to be unforgivable, and would feel he should repent and confess his sins to God. At the very least, even if the church expelled him, he would not stop believing, nor would he betray God, let alone disturb his family's faith in God. What do we discern from this person's various subsequent behaviors? That he is a nonbeliever who has no love for the truth, and that his humanity is also malicious. This is the fourth case. What should we name this case? ("The Loss of Ten Million in Offerings Case.") We should add his reaction to it and call it "Losing Ten Million in Offerings with No Sign of Repentance." Isn't that name better? It serves as a warning to others; at the very least, it makes people aware of where the severity of his actions lies.

The occurrence of all these events, the various behaviors displayed by these people, as well as their attitudes toward God after these events took place, all arose and were exposed in the process of performing their duties. Therefore, to some extent, the path one takes in believing in God and one's ultimate end are greatly related to the performance of one's duty; it could even be said that there is a direct relationship. The topic of performing duties should be an everlasting subject, and the truth concerning this aspect should also be an everlasting subject. It's the truth that people most fundamentally should understand, and a topic that should be continually discussed in the process of people's life growth and believing in God. This is because it's inseparably connected with changes in people's dispositions, with their life entry, and with the type of path they walk and what kind of outcome they ultimately have. Today, we've fellowshiped extensively about performing duties and have also fellowshiped about several cases. The main purpose of this is to make you understand how to perform your duties in a way that God praises, what the consequences are if you do evil, and the importance of performing your duties up to standard. The events in these cases got progressively more severe and increasingly frightening, but they weren't concocted by Me. They truly occurred among those who believe in God and who are within the ranks of those performing their duties. What does this signify? Some people say: "Eh, there's no issue if we don't perform our duties, but problems always arise when we do. So is it alright to just not perform our duties?" How is this line of thinking? Isn't this giving up eating for fear of choking? Isn't this foolish? You must learn to seek the truth to resolve these issues; this is a proactive attitude and the kind of attitude a normal person should have. If you're afraid that problems may arise while performing your duties that will lead to being condemned, expelled, cast out, or cut out, and finally losing any hope of attaining salvation, and you simply stop performing your duties or adopt a negative, antagonistic approach toward them, what kind of attitude is that? (A bad one.) Some others say: "Our humanity is too poor for performing duties, so why don't we just contentedly render service? God doesn't have high requirements for those who render service, and there aren't any standards or principles—just exerting effort is enough. Do whatever is asked, be obedient, don't take on any significant responsibilities, and don't have any ambitions to become a leader or worker. Just being able to remain until the end would be the greatest blessing." How are these motives? Aren't they rather base and vile? Can such unambitious individuals obtain God's salvation? Can a person without humanity render service adequately? Those without humanity cannot render service adequately; they will not become the loyal service-doers who get to remain.

The number of examples mentioned during these last few times in fellowship is relatively high. These events are easy to remember, but the truths I have fellowshiped on are difficult to understand. However, there's a benefit to this: By discussing these events, you may recall or come to understand the truths they touch upon a little. If we didn't talk about these cases, achieving this kind of result would probably require more effort. Discussing these cases serves as both an impetus and a warning, helping people find the right path from within them. It guides you in knowing which path to walk in your faith to avoid offending God's administrative decrees, making major mistakes, or taking the wrong course. The main goal is to help people perform their duties adequately. After hearing about these four cases, how do you feel? Do you have a new understanding of performing duties adequately? Is it easy for people to perform their duties adequately? (It's not easy.) Where does the difficulty lie? Is it because people don't understand the truth and cannot find principles, and thus keep making mistakes? (No.) So where does the difficulty lie, then? It is in this: People don't love the truth, nor do they pursue it. In the process of performing their duties, if people don't pursue the truth and don't practice it, coupled with their vicious, evil, and arrogant dispositions, this can easily lead to certain consequences and bring about outcomes that people don't expect or don't wish to see. Does anyone anticipate a bad end for themselves? (No.) Are there those who hope for just a mediocre end, thinking that as long as they scrape by to the end without dying, it's fine? (Yes.) What kind of people are these? They are people who don't pursue the truth; they're merely marking time until death. For such people, their performance of duty is bound to be completely careless and perfunctory, making it easy for them to make mistakes or commit sin, and very difficult to perform their duties up to standard. What kind of people can perform their duties up to standard? (Those who pursue the truth.) Who else? (People with humanity.) What does humanity encompass? (Conscience and reason.) Those who have conscience and reason, who possess humanity, will easily perform their duties up to standard if they pursue the truth. Some people say: "You keep talking about these serious negative examples of people failing to perform their duties adequately, and it's making us lose confidence. When will we ever reach the standard of performing our duties adequately? Are there any positive examples of this?" Let's discuss something more uplifting and positive, then. Currently, many people are beginning to focus on pursuing the truth, and they are also starting to become more diligent when performing their duties. For instance, some can cooperate harmoniously with others while performing their duties. What does harmonious cooperation mean? Here's one manifestation of it: It's not merely about everyone getting along well on the outside, without conflict or intrigue. Harmonious cooperation means that when facing various issues at work—whether or not you have insight into them and whether or not your perspective is correct—you can still confer and fellowship with others, seek the truth principles, and then reach a consensus. That is harmonious cooperation. What is the purpose of reaching a consensus? It's to better fulfill one's duties, to do the work of the church better, and to be able to bear witness to God. If you want the performance of your duties to meet the mark, then in the course of performing your duties, you must first achieve harmonious cooperation. There are currently some people who are already practicing harmonious cooperation. After understanding the truth, even though they are unable to fully practice the truth, and even though there are failures, weakness, and deviations along the way, they still strive toward the truth principles. So, they have hope of achieving harmonious cooperation. For example, sometimes you may think what you are doing is right, but you are capable of not being self-righteous. You can discuss with others and fellowship on the truth principles together until they are clear and apparent, so that everyone understands, and is in agreement that doing this will achieve the best result. Also, that it does not step outside the principles, that it takes the interests of the house of God into consideration, will protect the interests of God's house to the greatest degree possible. Practicing in this way is in alignment with the truth principles. Although the end result may not always be as you envisioned, the path, direction, and goal of your practice was right. So how does God see it? How does God define this matter? God will say that the performance of your duty is adequate. Does adequacy mean that your duty was performed in accordance with God's will? No, it doesn't. Adequacy is still a ways off from satisfying God's will, receiving God's approval, and practicing in full adherence to God's requirements. Adequacy simply means that you are on the right path, your intentions are right, and your direction is right, but you haven't yet reached the high standard of acting according to the truth principles as required by God. For instance, regarding obedience, let's say the house of God arranges for you to do something in the course of performing your duties. How should you practice so as to meet the mark in performing your duties? When you first hear about the task, you may have some opinions. But after some consideration, you think, "God has said that we should learn to seek and submit in matters we don't understand. So, I must seek. Although I don't understand the truth or know how I should practice, the task has fallen to me, so I must comply and submit. Even if it's just following the rules, I should follow them first." If you can practice in this manner, then you are meeting the mark. But is there a gap between reaching this standard and receiving God's approval? (Yes.) This gap is determined by the extent to which you understand the truth. Although you can submit, you do not understand God's intentions and have not fully identified the truth principles or put them into practice; you have merely adhered to the rules. You have adhered to the basic things one should do, according to the standards of conscience and rules, so in terms of execution, there are no problems, and in terms of the nature of your actions, there's nothing wrong. However, this doesn't meet the standard of practicing the truth; you still don't understand God's intentions. You've only passively and reflexively upheld your duties; you did not fulfill them properly according to the truth principles. You haven't reached a level where you can bear witness to God or satisfy God's intentions. You have not met the standard for bearing witness. Therefore, performing your duties in this manner is merely adequate, and does not yet meet with God's approval.

What is the standard for determining whether one has performed their duty adequately? If the path of performing one's duty is correct, the direction is correct, and the intention is correct; if the origin is correct and the principles are correct—then if these aspects are correct, the duty one has performed is adequate. Many people understand this in theory, but become confused when something actually happens to them. To sum it up, I'll tell you a principle: Do not act arbitrarily and unilaterally when facing situations. Why can't you act arbitrarily and unilaterally? For one thing, acting in such a manner is not in line with the principles of performing duty. For another, a duty is not your own private affair; you are not doing it for yourself, you are not engaging in your own management, it is not your own personal business. In God's house, no matter what you do, you are not working on your own enterprise; it is the work of God's house, it is God's work. You must constantly bear this knowledge and awareness in mind and say, "This is not my own affair; I am doing my duty and fulfilling my responsibility. I am doing the church's work. This is a task God entrusted to me and I am doing it for Him. This is my duty, not my own private affair." This is the first thing people should understand. If you treat a duty as your own personal affairs, and do not seek the truth principles when you act, and carry it out according to your own motives, views, and agenda, then you will very likely make mistakes. So how should you act if you make a very clear distinction between your duty and your own personal affairs, and are aware that this is a duty? (Seek what God asks, and seek principles.) That's right. If something happens to you and you don't understand the truth, and you have some idea but things still aren't clear to you, then you must find brothers and sisters who understand the truth to fellowship with; this is seeking the truth, and before all else, this is the attitude you should have toward your duty. You shouldn't decide things based on what you think is appropriate, and then slam the gavel down and say case closed—this easily leads to problems. A duty is not your own personal affair; whether major or minor, matters of God's house are no one's personal affair. As long as it relates to duty, then it is not your private matter, it is not your personal affair—it concerns the truth, and it concerns principle. So what is the first thing you should do? You should seek the truth, and seek the principles. And if you do not understand the truth, you must first seek the principles; if you already understand the truth, identifying the principles will be easy. What should you do if you don't understand the principles? There is a way: You can fellowship with those who do understand. Don't always assume that you understand everything and are always right; this is an easy way to make mistakes. What kind of disposition is it when you always want to have the final say? This is arrogance and self-righteousness, it is acting arbitrarily and unilaterally. Some people think, "I am college-educated, I'm more cultured than you, I have the comprehension ability, you all have small stature and don't understand the truth, so you should listen to whatever I say. I alone can make the decisions!" How is this view? If you have this kind of view, you will run into trouble; you will never perform your duties well. How can you perform your duties well when you always want to be the one to have the final say, without harmonious cooperation? Performing your duties this way will absolutely not meet the mark. Why do I say this? You always want to constrain others and make them listen to you; you don't take in whatever anyone else says. This is biased and stubborn, it is also arrogance and self-righteousness. In this way, not only will you fail to perform your duties well, but you will also hinder others from performing their duties well. This is the consequence of an arrogant disposition. Why does God demand harmonious cooperation from people? In one respect, it is beneficial for exposing people's corrupt dispositions, thus allowing them to know themselves and shed their corrupt dispositions—this benefits their life entry. In another, harmonious cooperation is also beneficial for the work of the church. Since everyone lacks understanding of the truth and has corrupt dispositions, if there can't be harmonious cooperation, then they will not be capable of performing their duties well, which will impact the work of the church. The consequence of this is severe. In summary, to achieve adequate performance of duty, one must learn to cooperate harmoniously and, when faced with situations, fellowship the truth to find solutions. This is essential—it benefits not only the work of the church but also the life entry of God's chosen people. Some people just can't get this; they always think that harmonious cooperation is too troublesome, and that at times, fellowshiping the truth doesn't easily yield results. These people then raise doubts, saying, "Is it really necessary to harmoniously cooperate to achieve adequate performance of duty? When faced with some situation, will everyone's fellowshiping together definitely produce results? I think this is all just going through the motions; following these rules is pointless." Is this view correct? (No.) What problem does this view expose? (Their attitude toward performing duty is problematic.) Some people have an arrogant and selfrighteous disposition; they are unwilling to fellowship the truth and always want to have the final say. Can someone so arrogant and self-righteous cooperate harmoniously with others? God requires people to harmoniously cooperate in performing their duties to resolve their corrupt dispositions, to help them learn obedience to God's work in the course of performing their duties, and strip away their corrupt dispositions, thereby achieving adequate performance of duty. Refusing to cooperate with others and wanting to act arbitrarily and unilaterally, making everyone listen to you—is this the attitude you should have toward your duty? Your attitude toward performing your duty is related to your life entry. God is not concerned with what happens to you each day, or how much work you do, how much effort you put in—what He looks at is what your attitude toward these things is. And what does the attitude with which you do these things, and the way you do them, relate to? It relates to whether or not you pursue the truth, and also to your life entry. God looks at your life entry, at the path that you walk. If you walk the path of pursuing the truth, and you have life entry, you will be able to cooperate harmoniously with others when you perform your duties, and you will easily perform your duties in a way that is adequate. But if, while performing your duty, you constantly emphasize that you have capital, that you understand your line of work, that you have experience, and are mindful of God's will, and pursue the truth more than anyone else, and if you then think that because of these things, you are qualified to have the final say, and you don't discuss anything with anyone else, and are always a law unto yourself, and engage in your own management, and always want to be "the only flower in bloom," then do you walk the path of life entry? No—this is the pursuit of status, it is walking the path of Paul, it is not the path of life entry. The way God has people walk the path of life entry and the path of pursuing the truth doesn't involve such behaviors or display these manifestations. What is the standard for adequate performance of duty? (Seeking the truth in all things, being able to act in accordance with principles.) That's right. To perform your duty adequately, it does not matter how many years you have believed in God, how many duties you have performed, nor how many contributions you have made to God's house, much less does it matter how experienced you are in your duty. The main thing God looks at is the path a person takes. In other words, He looks at one's attitude toward the truth and the principles, direction, origin, and starting point behind one's actions. God focuses on these things; they are what determine the path you walk. If, in the process of your fulfilling your duty, these positive things cannot be seen in you at all, and the principles, path, and basis of your action are your own thoughts, aims, and schemes; your starting point is to protect your own interests and safeguard your reputation and position, your modus operandi is to make decisions and act alone and have the final say, never discussing things with others or cooperating harmoniously, and never listening to advice when you have made a mistake, let alone seeking the truth, then how will God see you? You are not yet up to standard if you perform your duty so, and you have not set foot on the path of pursuing the truth, because, as you do your duty, you do not seek the truth principles and always act as you wish, doing whatever you like. This is the reason why most people do not perform their duties adequately. So how should this problem be resolved? Would you say it is difficult to fulfill one's duty adequately? In fact, it is not; people must only be able to take a stance of humility, possess a bit of sense, and adopt an appropriate position. No matter how educated you are, what awards you have won, or what you have achieved, and no matter how high your status and rank might be, you must let go of all of these things, you must get off your high horse—this all counts for nothing. In God's house, however great these glories are, they cannot be higher than the truth, for these superficial things are not the truth, and cannot take its place. You must be clear about this issue. If you say, "I am very gifted, I have a very sharp mind, I have quick reflexes, I am a quick learner, and I have an exceedingly good memory, so I am qualified to make the final decision," if you always use these things as capital, and see them as precious, and as positive, then this is trouble. If your heart is occupied by these things, if they have taken root in your heart, it will be hard for you to accept the truth—and the consequences of that don't bear thinking about. Thus, you must first put down and deny those things that you love, that seem nice, that are precious to you. Those things are not the truth; rather, they can block you from entering the truth. The most pressing thing now is that you must seek the truth in performing your duty, and practice according to the truth, such that your performance of your duty becomes adequate, for the adequate performance of duty is merely the first step onto the path of life entry. What does "the first step" mean here? It means to begin a journey. In all things, there is something with which to begin the journey, something that is most basic, most fundamental, and achieving the adequate performance of duty is a path of life entry. If your performance of duty merely seems fitting in how it is done, but is not in line with the truth principles, then you are not performing your duty adequately. So how, then, is one to work on this? One must work on and seek the truth principles; being equipped with the truth principles is what is crucial. If you merely improve your behavior and your temper, but are not equipped with the truth realities, it is useless. You may have something of a gift or specialty. That is a good thing—but only by putting it to use in performing your duty are you using it properly. Performing your duty well does not require an improvement in your humanity or personality, nor that you set aside your gift or talent. That is not what is required. What is crucial is that you understand the truth and learn to submit to God. It is all but inevitable that your corrupt disposition will pour out as you perform your duty. What should you do at such times? You must seek the truth to resolve the problem and come to act in line with the truth principles. Do this, and it will not be a problem for you to perform your duty well. Whatever realm your gift or specialty is in, or wherever you may have some vocational knowledge, using these things in the performance of a duty is most proper—it is the only way to perform your duty well. One prong is relying on conscience and reason to perform your duty, and the other is that you must seek the truth to resolve your corrupt disposition. One gains life entry by performing their duty in this way, and they become able to perform their duty adequately.

As it appears now, adequate performance of duty is inseparable from seeking the truth and acting according to the truth principles. If one cannot seek the truth to resolve problems and reach the level of acting according to principles, then they cannot achieve adequate performance of duty. The definition of adequate performance of duty is as explained. Are God's requirements for man high? Actually, they're not high. He just asks you to have a correct attitude, intention, and view in your actions. On this basis, you can obtain the work of the Holy Spirit and deepen your knowledge of yourself. You will then be able to undergo trials and refinements, enabling you to enter into deeper truths and undergo changes in disposition. Before you undergo trials and refinements, God will, on the basis of your understanding of the truth, give you some judgment and chastisement. But what is the foundation for judgment and chastisement, as well as trials and refinement? It's whether you have reached the level of performing your duty adequately—in other words, whether you have achieved life entry. Your life entry is not disconnected from your work and responsibilities in the church. If you spend all day at home reading God's words and emptily talk about performing your duty and life entry, this is unrealistic and fruitless. It's like armchair strategizing; you talk all day about performing your duty adequately, about receiving God's commission, but without any dedication or expenditure, and certainly without suffering or experiencing hardships. Even if sometimes you're moved to tears by singing hymns or reading God's words, this won't produce any effect. From this perspective, is there a relationship between reaching the level of performing your duty adequately and attaining salvation? Or, is it related to receiving God's judgment and chastisement? They are related. To receive God's judgment and chastisement, one must achieve adequate performance of their duties. Why does God set such a standard, requiring people to achieve adequate performance of their duties? It's because God uses your performance of duty to gauge the degree of your life entry. If you have achieved adequate performance of your duties, it means your life entry has already attained a standard that qualifies you to accept judgment and chastisement, which also means you are eligible for accepting God's perfecting work on

you. So what conditions has God put forward to man for achieving this? Your performance of your duty must be seen as adequate in God's eyes, meaning, in other words, that there is a fundamental path and direction to your life entry which God acknowledges and deems qualified. How does God test this? Mainly through your performance of duty. Once you've earned God's approval by performing your duties adequately, the next step immediately begins: God will start subjecting you to judgment and chastisement. No matter what mistakes you make, you will be disciplined; it's as if God has begun to closely monitor you. This is a good thing—it means you have been validated by God, you're no longer in danger, and you're the right kind of person who absolutely will not commit glaringly evil acts. In one sense, God will protect you; in another, subjectively speaking, the path you're on, your life goals and direction, have been rooted in the true way. You won't leave God, nor will you deviate. Next, God will certainly perfect you; this blessing is upon you. So, if one wishes to receive this blessing and walk the path of being perfected, the first requirement is to achieve adequate performance of one's duties. God observes your various performances in the house of God, as well as the tasks, commissions, and missions He gives you, to understand your attitudes toward God and the truth. Through these attitudes, God assesses exactly which path you are walking. If you are on the path of pursuing the truth, then your performance of your duties will meet the mark, and you will surely also have life entry and varying degrees of dispositional change. These are all achieved during the process of performing your duties. Before God formally perfects you, this is as far as you can get relying on human effort. Without God's work, you can only reach this level; striving further would be difficult. You can only rely on yourself to accomplish what's within your means and within human capacity, such as restraining yourself through willpower, enduring suffering, paying prices, forsaking, dealing with feelings, abandoning the world, recognizing evil trends, betraying the flesh, faithfully performing duty, discerning, and not following man. When you have achieved all these, you are qualified to be perfected by God. God basically doesn't interfere with what humans can accomplish. He continually supplies you with the truth, continually waters you, supports you to understand the truth, tells you how to understand the truth in various aspects, and how to enter the truth realities. Once you have understood and entered these, God will give you a qualification certificate, and your chance of being saved will be 80 percent. However, before reaching 80 percent, all your energy and effort must be invested; you can't live this life in vain. Some people say: "I've been believing in God for twenty years now; have I invested all my energy?" This isn't measured by the number of years. Some say: "I've been believing in God for five years now, and I've come to understand some truths. I know how to do my duty adequately and am striving in this direction; I know some ways now and seem to feel somewhat peaceful and comforted in my heart." This feeling is basically accurate, but does it mean that you have an 80 percent chance of being saved? No; how much have you really reached? Between 10 to 15 percent. Because in the process of fulfilling your duty adequately, you still have to go experience being pruned and dealt with many times; you have to experience many circumstances. In these circumstances, on the positive side, God will expose you to quite a bit. In the process of exposure to these people, events, and things—that is, in these practical circumstances—God lets you understand some truths. Why does He let you understand truths through these people, events, and things? If you don't go through these experiences, your understanding of the truth will forever remain at the level of words, doctrines, and slogans. Once you've experienced various circumstances in life, those doctrines you previously came to understand or have been able to comprehend and grasp within your memory will become a kind of reality. This reality is the practical side of the truth, and it's what you should understand and enter into.

What are the odds of someone being saved when they haven't yet met the standard of performing their duty adequately? At most, it's between 10 and 15 percent, because they do not understand the truth and absolutely cannot have true obedience. Can a person who doesn't understand the truth act according to principles? Can they take their duty seriously and responsibly? Absolutely not. Those who do not understand the truth definitely all act according to their own will, do things in a careless and perfunctory manner, mix in a lot of selfish motives, and act based on their own preferences. Even if you can speak many doctrines, and can spout theories and slogans, it doesn't mean you have the truth reality, so your chances of being saved are not high. To attain true salvation, and to break free from Satan's influence and live by the word of God, the next step is to put effort into various truths. What is the purpose of this effort? It is to enter into the truth reality more accurately and solidly. Only when you have entered into the truth can you embark on the right path for your life. If you only know how to spout doctrines and slogans, but do not grasp the truth principles of fulfilling your duty, and are even capable of acting recklessly based on your own whims, then you lack the truth reality; and you are still a long ways off. After someone has experienced many things in the course of performing their duties and realizes they do not understand the truth, as well as how much they lack, they start to put effort into the truth. Gradually, they shift from spouting doctrines and slogans to having a true understanding, to accurately practicing the truth, and to truly obeying God. In this way, their hope of being saved increases, and the odds become higher. What is this increase based on? (It's based on the degree to which they understand the truth.) The degree to which one understands the truth is not the most important factor; what matters most is practicing and entering the reality of the truth. Only by practicing the truth can you understand it; you will never understand the truth if you don't practice it. Merely understanding words and doctrines is not the same as understanding the truth. The more you practice the truth, then the more reality you have, the more you change, and the better you understand the truth. Hence, your hope of being saved will increase accordingly. In the process of performing your duties, on the positive side, if you can treat your duties in the correct manner, never abandon them regardless of the circumstances you face, and even when others lose faith and stop performing their duties, you still hold fast to yours and never abandon them from start to finish, remaining steadfast and loyal to your duties until the end, then you are genuinely treating your duties as duties and demonstrating complete devotion. If you can meet this standard, you've essentially met the mark for performing your duties adequately; this is on the positive side. However, before reaching this standard, on the negative side, one must be able to withstand various temptations. What kind of problem is it when someone can't withstand temptations in the process of performing their duty, so they abandon their duty and flee, betraying their duty? That amounts to betraying God. Betraying God's commission is to betray God. Can one who betrays God still be saved? This person is done for; all hope is lost, and the duties they previously performed were merely rendering service, which vanished into nothingness with their betrayal. So, it's essential to hold fast to one's duty; by doing so, there is hope. By loyally fulfilling one's duty, one can be saved and earn God's approval. What does everyone find to be the most difficult part of holding fast to one's duty? It is whether they can stand firm when faced with temptation. What do these temptations include? Money, status, intimate relationships, feelings. What else? If some duties carry risks, even risks to one's life, and fulfilling such duties might result in arrest and imprisonment or even being persecuted to death, can you still fulfill your duty? Can you persevere? The ease with which these temptations can be overcome depends on whether one pursues the truth. It depends on one's ability to gradually discern and recognize these temptations while pursuing the truth, to recognize their essence and the satanic tricks behind them. It also requires recognizing one's own corrupt dispositions, one's nature essence, and one's weaknesses. One must also continually ask God to protect them so they can withstand these temptations. If one can withstand them, and hold fast to their duty without betrayal or escape under any circumstance, then the likelihood of being saved reaches 50 percent. Is this 50 percent easily achievable? Each step is a challenge, fraught with peril; it's not easy to attain! Are there people who find pursuing the truth so hard that they feel life is too exhausting and would rather be dead? What kind of people feel this way? This is how nonbelievers feel. For mere survival, people can rack their brains, endure any hardship, and still cling to life tenaciously in disasters, not giving up until their last breath—if they believed in God and pursued the truth with this kind of vigor, they would definitely achieve the results. If people do not love the truth and are unwilling to strive for it, they are good-for-nothings! The pursuit of the truth isn't something that can be achieved through mere human effort; it requires human effort combined with the work of the Holy Spirit. It requires God orchestrating various environments to test and refine people, and the Holy Spirit working to enlighten, illuminate, and guide them. The suffering one undergoes to obtain the truth is entirely warranted. Just like mountain climbers who risk their lives to scale peaks, they aren't afraid of hardship in their quest to challenge the limits, even to the point of venturing their lives. Is believing in God and attaining the truth harder than climbing a mountain? What kind of people are those who desire blessings but are unwilling to suffer? They are good-for-nothings. You can't pursue and obtain the truth without willpower; you can't do it without the ability to suffer. You must pay a price to obtain it.

People have come to understand the definition of adequacy, the standard for adequacy, the reason why God has set forth this standard for adequacy, the relationship between performing one's duty adequately and life entry, and other such factors related to the truth of adequate performance of duty. If they can then get to where they can hold fast to their duty regardless of time or place, without giving up on it, and can withstand all manner of temptations, and then understand and gain knowledge of and entry into all the various truths that God requires in all the different situations He lays out for them, then in God's view, they have basically achieved adequacy. There are three fundamental ingredients to achieving adequacy in the performance of one's duty: First, having a correct attitude toward their duty, and not abandoning their duty at any time; second, being able to withstand all sorts of temptations while performing their duty, and not stumbling; third, being able to understand every aspect of the truth while performing their duty, and entering into reality. When people accomplish these three things and have met the mark, then the first prerequisite for accepting judgment and chastisement and being perfected—performing one's duty adequately—will have been completed.

Regarding adequate performance of duty, some content concerning the term "adequate" has been discussed before. How was "adequate" basically defined in previous discussions? (As acting according to principles.) The "adequacy" discussed today has risen to God's intentions and the standards God requires for man. Why does God require that people perform their duty to an adequate standard? This relates to God's intention to save people and His standards for saving and perfecting people. If you do not achieve adequacy in performing your duty, God will not perfect you; it is the most crucial condition for God to perfect people. Therefore, whether one can be perfected by God crucially depends on whether their performance of duty is adequate. If your performance of duty is inadequate, then God's work of perfecting people has nothing to do with you. Now, some people are on the right path in performing their duty, and their direction is also correct, but they still cannot be considered as performing their duties adequately. Why? Because people understand too little of the truth. It is like some children who want to share some household responsibilities with their parents, but they may not have the stature to do so. At what point will they have the stature to truly share some household responsibilities? It's when they can do some things without worrying the adults; then they can share in the household duties—that's when they can do it. Although you can do some things now, you still remain at the stage of exerting effort and rendering service because the truth you understand is too shallow, the truth you can put into practice is too little, and the principles you can grasp are too few. You are often in a process of groping, often acting in a state of haziness, so it is very difficult for you to confirm whether what you are doing is in line with God's intentions; you are always unclear in your mind. Can your performance of duty be considered adequate, then? It still cannot, because you understand too little of the truth, and your life entry has not reached the level God requires; your stature is too small. What does it mean for one's stature to be too small? Some say it's shallow understanding of the truth, but actually it's not just about a shallow understanding of the truth. It is also directly related to one's immature humanity or their poor caliber and having too many negative things. For example, if a duty comes upon you now and you don't know how to do it, you may feel that you are useless and that you can't be considerate of God's will. This leads you to become negative and weak, feeling that God's arrangements are bad and that you can't do anything, and that you're sure to be cast out. Then you no longer want to perform your duty. Isn't this a manifestation of small stature? Moreover, there are now many young brothers and sisters who are not yet married. If they encounter a good-looking man or woman, they may feel smitten, and a few glances exchanged between them can generate feelings; with such strong affections brewing, can they still perform their duties well when they start dating? This is falling into temptation. Isn't this indicative of a small stature? It is indeed. Additionally, some people have some special gifts, and they perform some special duties in God's house. This makes them feel they have some capital, so they want to put on airs, always wanting to show off. As soon as they show off, they lose principles in doing things. And if others praise them even a bit, they will certainly lose their principles in doing things, becoming complacent and forgetting their duties. This too is falling into temptation. Isn't this indicative of a small stature? Even minor matters can cause a person with small stature to stumble. For example, some people work as actors within God's house; with their looks and charisma, they appear in a few movies and then feel like they've gained a bit of fame. They think, "I've made a bit of a name for myself now; if this were in the secular world, wouldn't people be asking for my autograph? Why doesn't anybody in the house of God want my autograph? Seems I'd better act in another good movie." However, when they don't get the lead role in the next movie, they feel like giving up their duties, deeming them pointless. They always want to play leading roles and be a famous actor, and when they don't achieve that, they become dispirited, moody, and even consider guitting. This is having a small stature. Having a small stature means you're unfit for significant responsibilities. Even if you are granted a duty by God, you still can't earn His trust. With one wrong thought or one thing that goes against your wishes, you could relinquish your duties and turn against God. Isn't this also indicative of a small stature? (Yes.) It's an exceedingly small stature. With such small stature and these behaviors, how far away is one from performing their duties adequately? Where does the gap lie? It lies in how much one loves the truth. There are also some people who, in the process of performing their duties, find that their closest family member has fallen ill. They then stop attending gatherings and neglect their duties, thinking that skipping their duties for a couple of days is inconsequential—after all, if their family member were to die, they'd be gone forever. But they fail to consider that performing one's duties is a crucial matter related to life, that it is one's only chance for attaining salvation. They place feelings and family above their duties and attaining salvation. Is this not indicative of a small stature? Their stature is far too small! This shows they don't understand the proper affairs of life, and they don't know to engage in proper tasks. Does the size of one's stature depend on their age? It does not. Corrupt human beings, whether male or female, and regardless of age, birthplace, or nationality, all have the same corrupt disposition. They all possess the nature of Satan and can rebel against and resist God, committing all kinds of evils. If one does not pursue the truth, can they have genuine repentance? Never; they will not change. Some people fall sick and shout about relying on God and not fearing death, yet they also feel they can't just sit around and do nothing. They think that if they don't perform their duties they'll surely die, so they immediately go to perform their duties. They look at which duty entails the busiest tasks and is most important, which one is valued by God, and rush to sign up for it. Throughout the process of performing their duty, they keep wondering, "Can this illness be cured? I sure hope it can be. I've devoted my life; shouldn't I be cured?" In actuality, the illness they have is terminal; whether they perform their duty or not, they will die. Although they've come to perform their duty now, God searches the hearts of man—with such small stature and such a motive, can they perform their duty well? Absolutely not. People of this kind don't pursue the truth, and their humanity is not good. They always have their own little schemes in mind. Once their illness flares up or they feel even slightly unwell, they start thinking, "Has God really blessed me? Has He really cared for and protected me? It seems like He hasn't, so I'm not going to perform my duties anymore." The moment they feel a little uncomfortable, they want to give up on their duties. Do they have any stature? (No.) Therefore, don't think that just because various people can sit here and listen to sermons, or that they can abandon their families and careers to perform their duties in some position in the house of God—doing work related to their own professional skills or areas of expertise—that they are necessarily performing their duties. Nor does it mean that everyone who performs their duties does so willingly, much less that all those who perform their duties possess a certain stature. On the surface, people seem busy and appear to be willingly doing things and expending themselves for God on the foundation of genuinely believing in God. In actuality, deep in their hearts, everyone is often weak. They often harbor thoughts of giving up their duties, often have their own plans, and even more often hope that God's work will finish soon so that they can quickly receive blessings. Their goal is just that. What God aims to resolve are these human weaknesses, rebelliousness, and small stature, as well as people's ignorant thoughts and actions. When these issues are all resolved and are no longer problems, when nothing that arises can affect your ability to perform your duties, then that's sufficient, and your stature has grown. The path a person will ultimately walk, and the extent to which they will walk it, is not determined by how loudly they shout slogans, nor by their fleeting emotions or desires. Rather, it depends on their pursuit and the degree of their love for the truth.

In what situations will you give up your duty? Is it when you are facing death? Or when you encounter some minor disappointments in life? Some people have many demands when it comes to performing their duty. In one respect, they must not be exposed to wind or sun, and their work environment must be comfortable. They cannot bear even a slight grievance. Additionally, they must often be with their husband (or wife), live a world for two, and also have their own private lives, such as going out for entertainment, going on vacations, and so on, all of which must satisfy them. If they are not satisfied even a little bit, in their hearts they will become uncomfortable and incessantly resentful, and they'll even disturb others by spreading notions. Some people who understand the truth can discern that these people are no good, that they are nonbelievers, and they will distance themselves from them. But there are some people who don't understand the truth; they have a small stature and lack discernment, and they will be affected by these people's disturbances. Tell Me, should such evildoers be cleared out from the church? (Yes.) This kind of person, who consistently disturbs and disrupts the work of the church, must be cleared out to protect those who have small stature and are ignorant. In what circumstances might you yourselves abandon your duties and leave without notice? For example, while spreading the gospel, you see someone who is especially good-looking and speaks charismatically, and the more you look at them the more your adoration grows, thinking, "How great it would be to not perform my duties and find a partner like this!" Once you think this way, you are in danger; it will be easy to succumb to temptation. And once you've thought about it too much, you're set on pursuing this relationship. But when you finally win them over, you realize that they are also a corrupt human being and aren't that great after all, but by then it's too late for regret. Once someone falls into the temptation of romantic entanglements, it's not easy to get out. It won't be easy to turn back without spending one or two years, or three to five years. During these three to five years you've forfeited, how much truth will you miss out on? How great will the loss to your life be? How much will your life growth be delayed? Some other people see others making a lot of money in the secular world, wearing designer clothes, eating and drinking well, and their heart stirs; they want to go make money too. That's how temptation arises. Anyone whose mind starts racing when they face situations, thinking about abandoning their duty, is not able to withstand temptation; they're in danger. This is a sign of small stature. You feel upset and discontent when you see someone else eating some good food. You also feel discontent when you see someone else with a good partner. And you become unhappy when you see someone who is around your age and similar in attractiveness, but who is dressed better than you and even famous. You start to think, had you not abandoned your education and had you graduated and found a career, you would definitely be doing better than them. Whenever you face these situations, you're troubled for days. These temptations are a kind of constraint, a kind of vexation for you, which shows your stature is small. When you're spreading the gospel and you meet a suitable member of the opposite sex, a "tall, rich, and handsome" type or a woman who is fair-skinned, rich, and beautiful, you might not necessarily be able to avoid temptation. What does it mean that you might not be able to avoid it? It means your stature hasn't reached a level where you can overcome various temptations; you cannot avoid them, so your heart gets taken over and lured away. What you think about, what you ponder in your head, even what you dream about and discuss with others all become about these matters. It affects the performance of your duties; while fellowshiping the truth, others have a lot to say while you contribute less and less, and you lose interest in believing in God. Isn't this being lured away? It's falling into temptation, and it's dangerous. Some people think that you've only fallen into temptation when you've started dating someone or gone off with them, but by the time you've reached that point, you're done for. Could situations like this arise if you encountered such matters? (I don't know.) If you don't know, that proves your stature is small. Why does this prove your stature is small? In one respect, you've never been faced with such matters, so you don't know how you'd react; you don't have a handle on yourself. In another respect, when faced with this kind of situation, you don't have the right attitude and approach to deal with this kind of problem. If you can't seek the truth to resolve the problem, that means you are passive. Being passive proves that you have small stature, and you are ignorant. While you may not actively seduce others, others can certainly seduce you, which brings temptation your way. If you can't overcome it, that's a problem. For instance, what if someone offers you money and status, or what if an even better person comes along and tries to entice you? Would it be easy to overcome that? What are the odds you could overcome it? It's said that some people, upon receiving just two chocolates from someone who fancies them, get infatuated and consider starting a relationship with that person—that's how small their stature is. Is this a matter of not believing in God for long enough? Not necessarily. Some people have been believers for over a decade and can still fall into temptation when encountering such situations. Whether it's their first, second, or third time encountering this, they can still be enticed. What's the reason for this? Their stature is small, and they truly lack understanding of some truths. Why do they lack understanding? Because they don't pursue the truth; they're always muddle-headed. In their view, such matters are not significant. They think, "If a suitable match really does come along, why can't I get married? It's just that I haven't met anyone suitable yet, and I'm not impressed by anyone, so I'll just muddle through." This muddling through is not an attitude of pursuing the truth; it's not walking the path of attaining salvation and being perfected—it is not this mindset. They just want to scrape by, living each day as it comes, going wherever life takes them. And if there really comes a day when they can't go on, then so be it. They are not interested in God's intention to save people or the work God does for this salvation. Moreover, they don't earnestly seek the various truths related to God's salvation of man, nor do they take it to heart. Some might say: "But they always show up to sermons; how can You say they don't take it to heart?" But merely observing the ritual of attending gatherings and listening to sermons is different from accepting the truth. There are plenty of people who listen to sermons, but how many actually practice the truth? Even fewer are those who embark on the path of pursuing the truth. There are many people who focus solely on understanding doctrines and enriching their own notions and imaginings when they listen to sermons. Those who love the truth listen with the aim of seeking and accepting it. They are able to listen to sermons and reflect upon themselves, comparing what they heard to their own states, and focus on resolving their corrupt dispositions. They latch onto the practical aspects of the truth; they emphasize practicing and experiencing these aspects, and gaining the truth. Therefore, those who love the truth listen to sermons in order to obtain life, to understand the truth and transform themselves. They accept the truth in their heart, and when they practice it, the truth they understand benefits them; understanding the truth provides a path. As for those who don't pursue the truth, they listen to sermons in a muddled way. They'll listen to an entire sermon from beginning to end, and when you ask them what they've understood afterward, they'll say, "I understood it all. I took clear notes about everything." But if you ask them how this helps them, they'll just vaguely say that it's somewhat helpful. Is this actually helpful? No, because they haven't acquired the sermon's truths. Why haven't they? Because they haven't accepted it, how could they acquire it? Some people say: "How could they not have acquired it? How could they not have accepted it? They listened very attentively and even took notes." Some people take notes just for the sake of formality, not because they yearn for the truth. Some who fellowship the truth may not necessarily accept it; it depends on whether their hearts truly yearn for the truth. What does it mean to truly accept the truth then? It means that after reading God's words, one can align them with their own states, their own conduct and deeds, the principles of believing in God, the commissions and responsibilities given by God, and the path they are walking. They can reflect on themselves in relation to all these things, discern them clearly, achieve understanding of the truth, and then practice and enter into it. Only this is one who accepts the truth; only this is one who pursues the truth.

Just now, the manifestations of people with small stature were discussed. In the gradual process of understanding the truth, people will gradually resolve the issues of their small stature, such as foolishness, ignorance, timidity, and weakness. What does weakness refer to? It means that the component of your belief in God is particularly small; your belief in God is very minimal. In doctrine, you believe that God can accomplish everything and that He reigns sovereign over all things, but when faced with actual situations, you dare not trust in God; you dare not wholeheartedly hand everything over to Him and you cannot submit—this is weakness. People's foolishness, ignorance, timidity, and rebelliousness, these negative things, can only be resolved gradually or improved to varying degrees through seeking the truth in the performance of duty. What does improvement mean? It means that these negative things are gradually resolved; the results of your performance of duty get better and better, and when faced with situations you can endure more than you could before. For instance, in the past, when confronted with such situations, due to your small stature, you would be weak, you would become passive, and it would even affect your attitude toward performing your duties. You would throw tantrums, give up duties, be careless and perfunctory, and not demonstrate loyalty. Now, when faced with such situations, your degree of loyalty to performing your duty does not diminish; if you have difficulties or weaknesses in your heart, you can seek the truth to resolve them. That is to say, the issue of life entry will no longer impact your performance of your duty. Your moods, your state, and your weakness will no longer affect your designated work, nor will they affect your responsibilities, duties, and obligations. Isn't this an increase in your ability to handle matters and cope with external events? This is growth in stature. Some people, if asked to play the leading role, become very happy, and even walk as if floating on air; but if asked to play an extra, they are reluctant and become moody, and walk with their head bowed. Some people always want to stand out when spreading the gospel, but cannot fellowship the truth. They do not practice training but still always want to stand in high places and show their faces. Is this genuine submission? Is this the correct attitude toward performing one's duty? When one's mindset is incorrect and their state is wrong, they should seek the truth for resolution, and eventually be able to seek and practice the truth no matter what situation arises; this is having life experience. Once you can discern all sorts of matters, then you have gained immunity. No matter what you encounter or when it occurs, it will not affect your performance of your duty; nor will your performance be affected by any minor issue, any slight mood, or changes in people, events, things, and circumstances; your capacity to overcome sin and overcome various circumstances and moods will become stronger—this means your stature has grown. How does stature grow? It is the result achieved when people gradually enter into the truth reality by seeking the truth to resolve problems. Once you've understood some truths, and these truths become your life, become the foundation of your conduct, become your view for observing matters, and become your guiding light, then you are resilient; you will not weaken so often. For example, you would be very happy if you were made a leader before; if you were replaced, you'd be negative for a month or two, unwilling to do anything you were asked to do, performing any task with a negative attitude, acting in a careless and perfunctory manner, even to the point of giving up altogether. Now, if you were going to be replaced, you'd say, "Even if I am replaced, it won't affect me. I won't be negative for a single day. If I'm replaced today, I'll continue with what I should do tomorrow. I accept and submit to God's orchestrations and arrangements." This is resilience. How does this resilience come about? If you do not pursue the truth, and when faced with matters you do not seek the truth for resolution, and do not focus on acting with principles, will you have this stature? You won't ever be resilient if you live by the unbelievers' philosophies for dealing with the world. Only if you live by the truth can you gradually let go of pride, status, and vanity, so that in the end, nothing can topple you and nothing can affect you in performing your duties well. This is having stature; it is being resilient. When you are resilient and your stature has grown, don't you perform your duties more and more up to standard? When you perform your duties adequately, does it not mean that you already have a certain stature? What does this stature include? Genuine faith in God, genuine submission to God, and loyalty to God, as well as the ability to treat your duties correctly; receiving whatever happens as coming from God, and being able to submit to God, fear God, and shun evil. These are the manifestations of the growth of stature.

Now, have you felt in your consciousness that being saved needs to be put on the agenda, and that you can no longer be muddled about it? Understanding each and every truth is extremely important for being saved; you cannot be muddled about any single truth. Believing in God is not merely exerting some effort, running around, enduring some suffering, and being able to persevere through trials without stumbling. If people who believe in God truly regard being saved as a significant matter in life and treat obtaining the truth as a significant matter in life, then they can let go of anything; letting go will be easy for them. If one hasn't yet felt how important it is to be saved, then that's foolish and ignorant; their faith is too small, and they're still living in dire straits. If someone doesn't love the truth, it will be difficult for them to achieve adequate performance of duty. This is because to achieve adequate performance of duty, one needs to understand many truths and also enter into many truths. In the process of understanding and entering into the truth, the duty one performs will gradually become adequate; their various weaknesses and moods will gradually change, and their various states will also gradually improve. In the process of understanding the truth and entering into the truth reality, one will be increasingly clear within them about the vision concerning belief in God and being saved, and at the same time, one's desire and demand for being saved will become increasingly urgent. What is meant by urgent? It means you can feel that being saved is an urgent matter, an extremely important matter; and that if you don't resolve your corrupt dispositions, it could be very dangerous and you won't be able to attain salvation. This is the kind of mindset that carries a sense of urgency. In the beginning, you have no concept of being saved or perfected. Gradually, you come to understand that humans have corrupt dispositions and need God to save them. You discover that people live in sin, trapped in a corrupt disposition with no freedom, living a life of extreme suffering, and that sooner or later they'll be swept away by Satan's evil trends. You realize that humans can't stand firm on their own—no matter how resilient or determined you are, you can't guarantee that you will follow God to the end—and that you must pursue the truth, you must experience judgment, chastisement, trials, and refinements in order to understand the truth and know yourself, and only then will you have the resolve to follow God to the end. It is at this point that you begin to feel some urgency about being saved. Understanding the truth is crucial for being saved. Pursuing the truth is a significant matter that one must never abandon or overlook. Whether or not you pursue the truth has a direct relationship with being saved, and it is inextricably linked to whether you can be perfected by God. In the process of performing your duties, all the problems and difficulties you encounter must be resolved by seeking the truth; your weakness, ignorance, and foolishness will gradually change as well. What does this change refer to? It means that your ability to overcome sin has grown stronger, and you are becoming increasingly sensitive to your corrupt dispositions and to wicked things. You are gaining more discernment and feeling toward these matters in your heart. Currently, some people still lack this awareness, and feel nothing when they see sin, evil, or satanic things—this is unacceptable and shows their stature is still some ways off. Some others have no feelings, no discernment, and not even a trace of genuine hatred toward various sinful behaviors and the various ugly aspects of Satan. Nor do they have any awareness or discernment, or much less any hatred, for their own actions and the corruption they reveal, as well as the corrupt dispositions and ugly things deep within their hearts—these people are still far from having stature. However, no matter how far the gap is, no matter how weak one is or how small their stature is at the moment, this is not a problem, because God has provided people with a path and direction to resolve these issues. As you gradually reach the standard of performing your duties adequately, you're also pursuing an understanding of the truth and entry into the truth realities. As you pursue understanding the truth and entering the truth realities, your ability to overcome sin grows stronger, and your capacity to discern evil things also increases, thereby resolving your weakness and rebelliousness to various extents. For example, when your stature is small and you encounter a situation, even if you know it's not good, you might still be constrained and bound by it, and even engage in it. When you understand the truth and can practice some truths, aside from detesting such matters in your heart, you will also reject and refuse to engage in them; at the same time, you will also help others break free from them. This is progress; this is the growth of stature. What are the markers of the growth of stature? First of all, there is a devotion to fulfilling duty, with no more careless or perfunctory behavior. Additionally, one's faith in God becomes more genuine and more practical, and there is true submission to God. Furthermore, one can discern and overcome Satan's temptations and disturbances; Satan can no longer mislead or control them, and they can break free from Satan's influence. With this, one has truly met the standard for being saved.

After today's fellowship, do you know how to gauge whether the duties you perform are up to standard? If you do, it proves that you have some understanding of these truths and have made progress; if you do not, it proves that you haven't understood what was said, and you've fallen short. You need clarity in two aspects: One is the ability to evaluate yourself, and the other is knowing how to perform your duty so as to meet the standard and knowing the path. In the past, the focus most of the time was on the performance of duty, with little mention of performing it adequately. Today, the main discussion has been about the standards for adequate performance of duty. The standards for adequacy and the various truths involved in this aspect have been basically fellowshiped quite clearly. Additionally, what issues should be avoided and what principles should be upheld in the process of performing duties, as well as the mistakes that should not be made—these are all very important. In particular, don't steal offerings, don't recklessly engage in romantic relationships, and don't defy work arrangements. If you commit these errors, then you are utterly finished; there is no hope of being saved. So, do not take the wrong path, do not walk the path of an evildoer. Once you set foot on that road, there truly is no hope; no one can save you. If God doesn't save you, then you certainly cannot save yourself either. If someone reaches that point, it's a serious problem; it's not easy to turn back. That is essentially a road to nowhere.

Spreading the Gospel Is the Duty to Which All Believers Are Honor-Bound

In the last meeting, we talked about doing your duty adequately. Achieving this is the first and most basic of the four fundamental conditions required for God's perfection of man. Last time, we engaged in fellowship on the definition and principles of fulfilling one's duty. We also discussed some examples, fellowshiping on the various outward signs that indicate people are not performing their duties adequately. By doing this, I allowed God's chosen people to clearly see that such problems should be corrected, and to understand the attitude God takes toward those who do their duties in such a way. After fellowshiping on this, you gained a general understanding of how to perform your duty adequately, what to pay attention to, what things you cannot do, and what actions may offend God's disposition and lead to destruction. By engaging in fellowship on how to perform your duty adequately, can you conceptually see and understand something of the truth of this matter? When performing various duties, what principles should all the varied types of people abide by, and what truths should they practice? Do you have a clear understanding of such specifics? (We do not clearly understand this.) Then we need to talk about it in greater detail. We must set out more detailed classifications so as to discuss what it means to do one's duty adequately.

The work of the house of God is divided into several main categories. The work that is at the forefront of all the work of God's house is that of spreading the gospel. It involves an enormous number of people, it touches on a vast scope of things, and it involves a great amount of work. It is the first category of work, and the most important task in the overall work of the church. The work of expanding the gospel is the first important task in God's management plan. That is why it must be classified as the first category of work. So, what is the title held by those who perform this duty? Spreaders of the gospel. As for the second category, what is the most important duty in the internal work of the church? (That of leaders and workers.) Right, it is the duty of leaders and workers at all levels in the church, including the supervisors and team leaders of various groups. This duty is of the utmost importance, and all of the work done by these people is important. This is the second category. As for the duties of the third category, what duties are relatively important in the work of spreading the gospel? (Some special duties.) Yes, the third category includes people who perform various special duties, including writing, translation, music, filmmaking, art, and external affairs work. Those of the fourth category mainly perform ordinary duties involved with logistical work, such as reception, cooking, and purchasing. A detailed classification of these duties is not necessary. The fifth category is for those people who can only perform some duties in their spare time due to their family situations, physical conditions, or other such reasons. These people perform their duties to the best of their abilities. This is the fifth category. The others, who do not perform their duties, are placed in the sixth category. These people have nothing to do with performing duties, so why should they be listed in a category at all? Because they are counted among the number of church members, they are listed in this last category. If they have listened to many sermons, are able to understand the truth, and voluntarily ask for duties to perform, we should allow such people to perform duties and give them an opportunity for repentance, as long as they have sincere faith and are not people of extremely low caliber or wicked people, and provided they promise not to cause disturbances. The members of the church basically all fall into the six categories just mentioned. The only ones left are new believers. It cannot be said that they do not fulfill their duties. Rather, because they are small in stature and have only a shallow understanding of the truth, they cannot do anything. Even if some of them are of good caliber, they don't understand the truth or principles, and so still can't perform any duties. They can begin to perform duties after believing in God for two or three years. At that time, we can list them among the various categories of people who undertake duties. To conclude, we have now clearly delineated the six categories. The first category is for those who spread the gospel; the second category is for the leaders and workers at all levels of the church; the third category is for those who perform special duties; the fourth category is for those who perform ordinary duties; the fifth category is for those who perform duties when time permits; and the sixth category is for those who do not perform duties. What principles provide the basis for the ordering of these categories? These categories are divided according to the nature of the work, the time required to do the work, the workload, and the importance of the work. When we previously talked about performing duties, we basically discussed the various aspects of the truth about performing duties. Our fellowship concerned the truth principles that all people should follow in performing their duties. We did not draw up any categories and we did not discuss in detail which principles each of these types of people should abide by, nor the specific truths they should focus on entering into. Next, we will fellowship on this aspect of the truth more completely, discussing each category in turn so as to be clear.

I will first open our fellowship on the truths that those who spread the gospel should understand. What are the basic truths that people who spread the gospel should understand and equip themselves with? How should you go about this duty to perform it well? You must be equipped with some truths of the vision needed for spreading the gospel and you must master the principles of spreading the gospel. Once you have mastered the principles of spreading the gospel, what other truths should you equip yourself with to resolve the notions and problems of others? How should you treat those who investigate the true way? The most important thing is to learn discernment. Who you can preach the gospel to and who you cannot: this is the first principle you must understand. If you preach the gospel to people who cannot be preached to, it will not only be wasted effort, but can easily bring about hidden dangers. This must be understood. In addition, even people who the gospel can be preached to will not accept it if you just say a few words or talk about some profound doctrines. It's not that easy. It may be that you talk till your mouth goes dry and your tongue is parched, and you lose all patience, wanting to abandon those who are investigating the true way. In such circumstances, what is it most important to possess? (Love and patience.) You must have love and patience. If you lack all feeling of love, then you certainly have no patience. In addition to understanding the truth with respect to the vision, spreading the gospel also requires great love and great patience. Only in this way can you properly perform the duty of spreading the gospel. How is the duty of spreading the gospel defined? How do you view the duty of spreading the gospel? Wherein do those who spread the gospel differ from those who perform other duties? They bear witness to God's work in the last days and bear witness to God's coming. Some people say that they are messengers of the gospel, that they are sent on a mission, that they are angels come down from above. Can they be so defined? (They cannot.) What is the mission of those who spread the gospel? What image do they have in people's minds? What is their role? (Preachers.) Preachers, messengers, what else? (Witnesses.) Most people would define them like this. But are these definitions actually accurate? The common terms are "preacher" and "witness"—"messenger of the gospel" is a more prestigious title. These three terms are often heard. No matter how people understand and define the titles of those who perform this duty, these titles are all inextricably linked to the word "gospel." Which of these three terms is more relevant and more apt to the duty of spreading the gospel, making it a more rational title? (Preachers.) Most people think that the title of preacher is more apt. Does anyone give their vote to the title of witness? (Yes.) What about the title of messenger of the gospel? (No.) Basically no one agrees with the title of messenger of the gospel. Let us first discuss whether the title of preacher is appropriate. "Preach" means to spread, disseminate, convey, and publicize something—and what is the "way" that preachers preach about? (The true way.) That is a good way to say it. "Way" is the true way of God's work and God's salvation of man. This is how we explain and define the term preacher. Next, let's talk about witness. What is it that a witness witnesses? (God's work in the last days.) It is not wrong to say that a witness bears witness to God's work in the last days. These two titles look to be relatively appropriate. What about messenger of the gospel? What does "gospel" refer to? It is the good news and glad tidings of the work of God, God's salvation of man, and God's return. How can we explain "messenger"? A good explanation of "messenger" is someone who is sent by God, one who is directly dispatched to spread the gospel, or a certain person God sends at a certain time to convey God's words or important message. This is a messenger. Do those who spread the gospel play such a role? Do they do this sort of work? (No.) What kind of work do they do then? (They bear witness to the work of God in the last days.) Is their witness to God's work in the last days a mission they have received directly from God? (No.) Then how can this mission be explained? (It is the duty of created beings.) It is the duty of people. Regardless of whether God has charged you, told you, or entrusted you with the proclamation of His new work and the dissemination of the gospel, you have the responsibility and the obligation to tell more people about the gospel, to disseminate it, and to convey it to more people. You have the responsibility and the obligation to enable more people to know this news, to come before God, and to return to God's house. This is the duty and responsibility of people, so it cannot be said that they have been dispatched and sent out by God. Therefore, the word "messenger" is not appropriate here. What is the nature of this word? It is false, exaggerated, and empty. The word "messenger" is too exaggerated to be appropriate. From the time of the Old Testament to the present, from the beginning of God's management work to the present, the role of messenger has never existed. That is to say, no such role has taken part in the work of God's management plan for the salvation of mankind throughout its entire duration. How can ordinary people shoulder what is meant by the word "messenger"? No one can take on such work. Therefore, this role is not open to man, and no one can be linked to or associated with this word. A messenger, as people understand it, is someone who is sent by God to do something or to convey a message. Such a person has little to do with God's grand and overarching work of managing mankind. That is to say, the role of messenger is all but nonexistent in the three stages of God's work. Therefore, do not use this word in the future. It is naive to speak in this way. Can a person take on the title of "messenger of the gospel"? They cannot. For one thing, they are flesh and blood. In addition, they are a member of corrupt mankind. What type of being is a messenger? Do you know? (We don't know.) You don't know, yet you still dare to use this name. This is impersonation. It can be absolutely said that messengers have nothing to do with mankind, and humans cannot have anything to do with the word "messenger." Mankind cannot shoulder it. Messengers of the gospel, the coming down of messengers from above, and the work of the messengers all basically came to an end in the time of Abraham in the Old Testament. This is already over and done with. Ever since God formally performed the work of mankind's salvation, mankind should cease to use the word "messenger." Why shouldn't this word be used anymore? (Man cannot shoulder it.) It is not a matter of whether or not man can shoulder it, but rather that messengers have nothing to do with corrupt mankind. Among corrupt mankind, there is no such role, nor is there such a title. Let's go back to the word "preacher." If we were to give an objective, accurate, and profound definition of the "way" that they preach about, how would we define it? (The word of God.) This is a relatively general term. Specifically, does it only refer to the gospel and the message of God's work at the present time? (No.) Then what is it that the people who spread the gospel actually proclaim? To what extent is the work of those who spread the gospel related to the "way"? What kind of work actually falls within the scope of their duties? They simply convey some basic information to the recipients of the gospel—such as that God has come in the last days, the work He has done, God's words, and God's will—so that people can hear and accept this information and then return to God. After they bring people before God, their responsibility to spread the gospel is fulfilled. Is any of what is meant by the "way" contained in the information they communicate? Here, the terms "information" and "gospel" are basically equivalent. So, do they have anything to do with the "way"? (No.) Why is there no such association? What exactly does the "way" refer to? The simplest word we can use as an explanation is path. The term "path" encapsulates the definition of "way," which is more specific. To speak more concretely, the "way" is all the words given forth by God for the salvation of mankind, to free humans from their corrupt satanic dispositions, and to allow them to escape from Satan's bondage and dark influence. Is this an accurate and concrete description? Looking at it now, is the word "preacher" an appropriate definition for those who fulfill the duty of spreading the gospel? (It is not suitable.) The duty of a preacher goes far beyond spreading the gospel. Only those who know God and bear witness to God can take on this title. Can an average person who spreads the gospel shoulder the work of a preacher? Absolutely not. Spreading the gospel is no more than proclaiming the good news and simply bearing witness to the work of God. These people cannot shoulder the work of preachers at all, they cannot fulfill the duty of preachers, so they cannot be called preachers. The title of preacher confers a higher standing, and those who spread the gospel do not merit this title. This title is not apt for them. Now the term "witness" is the only one that remains. What is it that a witness witnesses? (God's work in the last days.) Is it apt to say that they proclaim and bear witness to God's work in the last days? If the meaning of witness were to be accurately defined, it should refer to one who bears witness to God, rather than one who bears witness to the gospel. What if we called these people who spread the gospel witnesses to God? Are they able to bear witness to God? (They cannot.) How can we explain the term "witness" as used here? On close investigation, the word "witness" is also not appropriate. Since those who spread the gospel only proclaim the words spoken

by God to all people who thirst for God's words and tell the word of God to the people who welcome God's appearance, this does not reach the true significance of the word "witness." Why do I say that this is not what it means to bear witness? Bearing witness involves that which a person fellowships on and proclaims in order to enable people to come to know God and to bring these people before Him. At present, those who spread the gospel are merely bringing people into the church, into God's workplace on earth. They do not bear witness to God's disposition, to what God has and is, or to the work of God. Is the title of witness suitable for them? To speak precisely, it is neither suitable nor apt. Now, we have investigated and contemplated all three terms—messengers of the gospel, preachers, and witnesses—finding them all ill-suited to those who spread the gospel. Regardless of whether these terms come from religion or are commonly used by members of the house of God, these titles are neither suitable nor apt. Now we come to a question: Are titles important? (They are important.) Are they really important? For example, if your original name was John Smith, but you are now called James Clark, have you changed? Do you not remain you? This means that the title or name you use is not important. If it doesn't matter, why dissect these words? I dissected these words so that people could gain an accurate view of the duty of spreading the gospel, accurately define what this duty actually is, and know how they should properly perform and treat this duty. It is first necessary for you to determine your own position within this duty. This is very important. Therefore, this title must be accurate.

I have just now roughly dissected several titles or terms referring to those who perform the duty of spreading the gospel. The titles and definitions of witnesses, preachers, and messengers of the gospel are all inaccurate. Why are they inaccurate? It is because the people that merely spread the gospel do not do any substantive work worthy of these names. They are not bearing witness to God's deeds, God's work, or God's essence. This is not the work that they do, nor is it the duty they perform. Therefore, they are not worthy to be called by the title of witness. The title of preacher is also of this nature, to say nothing of messenger of the gospel. This last title is devoid of meaning, based on nothing at all. It is nothing but a lofty-sounding title people give to themselves. Where did the title messenger come from? Was it not produced by the inflation of man's arrogant disposition? (Yes.) This is just the wish to give oneself a lofty title. These more substantive titles that superficially seem to be relevant to this sort of duty are not suitable. Some others are even less suitable and less appropriate, so we will not list and dissect them each in turn. Since these titles are inappropriate, let's take a look at what actually constitutes the essence of the duty of spreading the gospel. In a religion, what do people call it when someone is won over through the spreading of the gospel? (Bearing fruit.) When those who spread the gospel win over a person, they say that they have borne a fruit. When they meet and talk, they always discuss how much fruit they have borne spreading the gospel in such and such a place. They measure themselves up against one another to see who has borne more fruit and of what sort these fruits are. Why do they make such comparisons? In superficially comparing the number of their fruits, what are they actually comparing? They are comparing merits and their qualifications for entering the kingdom of heaven. If they make such comparisons among themselves, do they see the work of spreading the gospel as their duty? Why do they place such importance on the fruit they bear? They believe that the fruits that they bear are somehow related to going to heaven, to receiving blessings, and to earning rewards. If these fruits have no connection to those things, would they make these comparisons whenever they meet? They would compare themselves in other respects. They would compare themselves in any respect related to receiving rewards and entering the kingdom of heaven. Because winning over people and bearing fruit when spreading the gospel relates to going to heaven and receiving rewards, in order to accomplish these things, people never get bored of comparing who has won over more people and borne more fruit when spreading the gospel. Then, in their hearts, they calculate ways to win over more people and bear more fruit so as to improve their qualifications and confidence when it comes to entering heaven and obtaining rewards. In this, the attitude of all sorts of people with regard to spreading the gospel becomes apparent. Is their attitude and motivation concerning spreading the gospel the desire to fulfill their duties as created beings? (No.) This is an incorrect point of view. Their goal is not to do their duties well, not to fulfill God's commission, but to get rewards. Performing one's duty in such a transactional manner is obviously not in conformity with the truth, but in violation of the truth. It is not in keeping with God's will, but repugnant to Him. Regardless of the amount of fruit borne by these people, it has no bearing on their final destinations. They regard spreading the gospel as a profession, as a way or a bridge to gain blessings and rewards. The intention of such people in performing their duties and accepting this commission is not to fulfill God's commission or perform their duties well, but only to gain blessings and rewards. Therefore, for people such as these, no matter how much fruit they bear, they are neither witnesses nor preachers. The work they do is not the performance of a duty, but merely toil and service done in order to obtain blessings for themselves. The most serious problem here is not simply that their purpose in spreading the gospel is to obtain blessings and rewards, but that they use the fact that they win over people by spreading the gospel as a chip to be exchanged with God for rewards and the blessing of entry into heaven. Is this not a very serious problem? What is the essence of this problem? They are putting the gospel up for sale, "selling" it in exchange for blessings. Isn't this the nature of the deal they hope to strike with God? This is the essence of their intentions, practices, and the nature of their actions. Selling the gospel in exchange for rewards seems to be the problem found among the so-called "preachers" in the religious world. So then, do those who are now fulfilling the duty of spreading the gospel in God's house share the same problem? (Yes.) What is the essential problem common to both? It is that they are selling the gospel in exchange for God's satisfaction and approval so as to achieve their goal of obtaining blessings and of possessing that beautiful destination. When it is presented in this manner, some of you may not be convinced, but many people do in fact behave this way.

After winning over people, many among those who spread the gospel feel that they are capable of saving people and that they have performed a great service, and they often say to the people who have accepted the gospel from them: "If I had not preached the gospel to you, you would never have been able to believe in God. It was due to my loving heart that you were fortunate enough to receive the gospel." And after those people have accepted the gospel from them, this same sort of person will always think to ask them, "Who was it that spread the gospel to you?" Those people will ponder this question and think, "It is true that you preached the gospel to me, but it was the work of the Holy Spirit—I cannot give you the credit for it." And they will not want to respond. When they do not respond, the questioners will grow angry and continue to question them. What is the intention behind their constant questioning? They want to claim credit. Among those who spread the gospel, there are also some who will bring the gospel to someone, but refuse to hand them over to the church when that person satisfies the conditions for entering it. There are some spreaders of the gospel who will spread the gospel to several people and not give them over, and some who will spread the gospel to 20 or 30 people—enough to establish a church—and not hand them over either. Why do they not give these people over to the church? They say, "These people still do not have a very solid foundation. Let's wait until they have a solid foundation, until they have no doubts, until they cannot be easily misled, then I will give them over to the church." After half a year, these people will have something of a foundation and meet the principles for entering the church, but these spreaders of the gospel still will not give them over. They want to lead these people by themselves. What intention is behind this? If there was no profit to be gained from it, would they want to lead these people? What profit do they seek? They seek to obtain personal gain and advantages from these people. If they were to give these people over to the church, they could not obtain those benefits. So, you must have discernment of this problem. It is just like how many pastors and elders in the religious world know full well what the true way is, but do not accept it and do not allow the believers to accept it. In fact, they do this for their own prestige and profit. If the believers were to accept the true way, those pastors and elders would not be able to profit from their faith. Spreaders of the gospel such as these are afraid that, once their gospel recipients join the church, they will be forgotten and therefore no longer be able to profit from their faith. This is why they do not give these people over to the church. When will the spreaders of the gospel like this give over these people? Once all of those people listen to them and obey them, then they will give them over to the church. After these people enter the church, some of them who have fairly good humanity, pure comprehension, and love the truth will often listen to sermons and come to understand some truths, and thereby be able to discern these people who spread the gospel to them. They will then say, "That person seems to be an antichrist, like Paul." The next time they meet, they will pay no heed to those spreaders of the gospel. When they are ignored, these spreaders will grow angry and say, "You are ungrateful! If I hadn't spread the gospel to you, would you have come to believe in God? Would you have found the true way? Have you forgotten me, your mother, now that you have someone else to lead you?" They want to be seen as a mother. Do people who talk like this have sense? (No.) If someone can bring themselves to say this, they certainly aren't any good. Why do I say this? When they spread God's gospel, who do the people that they win over belong to? (God.) Although they may work hard to spread the gospel, the people they win over do not belong to them, but to God. Those who accept the gospel want to follow God, not believe in those who preached the gospel to them, but this kind of gospel spreader does not allow them to join the church and follow God. Instead, they want to keep these people in their grasp and control, and make these people follow them. Isn't this the highway robbery of spreading the gospel? This kind of gospel spreader obstructs people from coming before God, making it so those people must go through them in order to come before God, and so that everything must be communicated through them. Aren't they trying to profit off their faith? Don't they want to control these people? (Yes.) What sort of behavior is this? It is purely the behavior of Satan! This means that an antichrist has shown their true colors, and they want to control the church and God's chosen people. People of this sort can be found in churches everywhere. In serious cases, they may control dozens or even hundreds of people. In milder cases, when they preach the gospel to a few people, they will just constantly demand gratitude from them, bring up these people's debt to them whenever they meet, and always mention things from the time when these people first came to believe. Why is it that they always mention such things? It is so that those people do not forget their kindness and do not forget whose preaching it was that enabled them to enter the house of God, and who the credit should go to. They harbor an aim in bringing up such matters, and if this is not achieved, they scold those people. What is the first thing they say to scold them? (That they are ungrateful.) Do these words of theirs have sense? (No.) Why do you say that they lack sense? (Because these gospel spreaders are not standing in their rightful place. Spreading the gospel is their duty, it is something that they are supposed to do. And yet, after bringing the gospel to people, they see it as a contribution that they have made, and not their duty.) They always think that they have made a contribution by spreading the gospel. This is wrong. In one respect, they are not standing in their rightful place. It is God who saves people, and people can only cooperate in this. What can a person accomplish if God does not work? In another respect, spreading the gospel to other people is not their contribution. They have made no great contribution, it is their duty. It is God who wants to gain people, gospel spreaders are merely cooperating with Him a bit. To save and gain people is God's business, and it has nothing to do with the gospel spreaders. They cannot do these things. In spreading the gospel, they are just performing the job of transmitting it, they are simply sharing God's gospel of the last days with other people. This cannot be said to be some kindness that they bestow on people, so if these people pay them no heed, they are not being ungrateful. Do such things not often occur while people are fulfilling their duties by spreading the gospel? Has this kind of corruption poured forth from you? (It has.) Was it a severe outpouring? Have you gone so far as to scold others? Have you gone so far as to hate others? Have you gone so far as wishing to curse and control people? You wish to dominate and control whoever receives the gospel from you. You want to take those people for yourself rather than give them over to God. You expect whoever receives the gospel from you to be your loyal progeny. Do you have such thoughts? Many people treat preaching the gospel like bearing fruit. They think that whoever receives the gospel from them becomes their fruit and their follower, and must follow them obediently and treat them like their God and their master. Do you think in this way? Even if you do not reach such a blatant extreme, you still possess this aspect of a corrupt disposition. What is the reason for this? Basically, it comes down to those two points: In one respect, people do not stand in their proper place and do not know who they are. In another respect, they do not regard spreading the gospel as their duty. If you treat spreading the gospel as your duty, you will understand that no matter what you do, no matter how many people you preach to or how many people you win over, this is just fulfilling the duty of a created being, that it is a responsibility and obligation you ought to fulfill, and that it is no great contribution to speak of. Understanding the matter in this way is in line with the truth. But why are some people who preach the gospel able to control those who receive the gospel from them and take those people as their own? It is because they are too arrogant and selfrighteous by nature and they lack the slightest bit of sense. In addition, it is because they do not understand the truth and have not resolved this aspect of their corrupt disposition. That is why they can do such stupid, arrogant, and barbaric things that disgust other people and are loathed by God.

When people do something, when they possess a little capital or make a contribution, they want to show it off, they want to control people, they want to exchange what they have done for rewards or to secure a good destination. Some would go so far as to attempt to make a trade using God's gospel. What trade do they want to make? Here is an example. When a person like this arrives at the house of a potential gospel recipient and sees that their family is poor, they think that they will probably not benefit from spreading the gospel to this person. Consequently, they feel uninterested in them or even discriminate against them. Whenever they see that person, they feel displeased, and they say to their leader, "That person won't be able to believe in God. And even if they were to believe, they could not gain the truth." This is the excuse they use to avoid spreading the gospel to them. Not long after, someone else goes to spread the gospel to this person, and they accept it. How can the first gospel spreader explain this? How could they say that this person won't believe in God? How could they be so arbitrary? How could they know whether or not someone would believe if they didn't spread the gospel to them? They couldn't know. Why didn't they win over this person? It is because they were prejudiced against that person, they looked down on them, and didn't show a loving heart to them that they failed to win over that person. By performing their duty in that way, they were being negligent. They did not show a loving heart and they failed to fulfill their responsibility. Is this a credit or a demerit in God's eyes? (A demerit.) It is absolutely a transgression. Why did this transgression come about? Isn't it because they could not get any benefits from that gospel recipient? When they saw that spreading the gospel to that person would not profit them, they felt an aversion toward them and retaliated against them, not wanting to let them obtain salvation, and then finding all kinds of reasons and excuses to avoid spreading the gospel to them. This is a serious dereliction of duty and a serious transgression! Refusing to spread the gospel to someone when there is no profit to be obtained—what kind of attitude is this? Isn't this a typical manifestation of a person selling the gospel? (Yes.) In what way are they selling the gospel? Explain the details and process. (That gospel spreader decided whether they wanted to spread the gospel to someone based on whether they could benefit from it. This is equivalent to treating God's gospel as a commodity and selling it to obtain the benefits that one desires. When they saw that there were no benefits to be gained, they refused to spread the gospel.) They regard God's gospel as their own private asset. If they see someone from a rich and powerful family who is well-fed and well-clothed, they think to themselves, "If I spread the gospel to them, I can stay in their house, and I can also have good food to eat and good clothes to wear," and they then decide to preach the gospel to that person. What sort of behavior is this? This is a typical example of a person selling the gospel. This gospel spreader treats God's gospel and the glad tidings of God's new work as a commodity and as their own private asset, deceiving and tricking others at every turn in order to secure profit and whatever things they need for themselves. Is this fulfilling one's duty? This is called doing business and profiting from peddling the gospel. Peddling means selling things that one has by means of trade, and obtaining the money or material things one wants in exchange. So how do they peddle the gospel? It depends on whether they can obtain benefits from potential gospel recipients. What this means is, "I'll spread the gospel to you if it's beneficial to me. If there's no profit in it for me, I'll find an excuse not to preach it to you. It'll just be a deal that didn't work out." Why didn't this deal work out? It didn't work out because the gospel spreader couldn't profit from it. What do we call this type of person? They are called "traveling con men." They have nothing real to offer, but go everywhere deceiving and tricking others, relying on their words to make them money and to obtain profits. By preaching the gospel in this way, are they fulfilling their duty? They are purely doing evil. Their actions have nothing to do with fulfilling their duty, because they do not regard spreading the gospel as their duty, and they do not see it as their responsibility or obligation, or as a commission entrusted to them by God. Rather, they see it as a job, a profession done in exchange for the things that they need, to satisfy their own interests, and to meet their own demands. There are even some people who don't want to leave when they go to wealthy areas to preach the gospel, because they eat well, dress well, and stay in nice places there. They start crying in front of the gospel recipients about how poor they are, "See how God's grace and blessings surround you here. Every family has its own car to drive, lives in its own modest mansion, and dresses well. You even eat meat every day. That's not possible where we come from." After hearing this, the gospel recipients say, "Since the place that you live is so impoverished, come and stay with us here often," then, they give these gospel spreaders some things. This is a disguised form of soliciting and extorting money and material goods from people. What is their extortion based on? "We have preached God's gospel to you, and gotten nothing in return. We have fulfilled God's commission. You have received such great blessings, so you should repay God's love and give us a little charity. Isn't that what we deserve?" In this way, they use various means to secretly, directly, or indirectly extort material goods and money from people. They use spreading the gospel as an opportunity to seek personal benefits. The first manifestation of this is selling the gospel, which is the most serious in nature. The second manifestation is disguised extortion. Therefore, within the ranks of people who perform the duty of spreading the gospel, some people's pockets imperceptibly begin to bulge while they are preaching the gospel, and they become affluent. Some people say, "Isn't it good to be affluent? Isn't this God's blessing?" That is rubbish! You rely on your own tricks and devices to extort and swindle things from people, and then you claim that it is God's blessing. What is the nature of such words? They are blasphemy against God. This is not God's blessing. God does not bless people in this way. So why would an idea like this arise within someone? This is the result of their ambitions and their greedy, satanic nature.

Those who spread the gospel all suffer a great deal. Sometimes they are persecuted and mobbed by religious people, or even handed over to Satan's regime. If they are a little incautious, they are likely to be arrested by the great red dragon. However, those who love the truth can approach such things correctly, whereas those who don't love the truth will often complain about the slightest suffering. Some of those who spread the gospel have said things like this: "I preached the gospel to a person, and after talking for such a long time, he didn't even give me a glass of water. I don't want to preach to him." Is it a problem that someone did not give them a glass of water? There is a kind of disposition hidden in the words of these spreaders of the gospel. The implication is that spreading the gospel is only worthwhile when it is enjoyable and profitable. If it involves suffering, or if they don't even get a glass of water to drink, then it is not worthwhile. Within this, there is an intention to solicit something and to strike a deal. If there is always a transactional nature to the way that a person spreads the gospel, are they sincerely expending themselves for God? If they can't even bear this little bit of suffering when performing their duty, and a little thing can cause them to become negative, can they fulfill their duty adequately? They will also say, "Not only was I not given any water, they didn't give me any food at lunchtime." Is it a problem if someone didn't let these gospel spreaders stay and eat with them? They have been spreading the gospel for several years and they always pay attention to how people host them, what they give them to eat and drink, and what gifts they receive—why is this? Do they not know how to treat people who are investigating the true way? This is a problem with their character. Do they have even a little love for people in their hearts? And why do they still not understand the kinds of suffering those who spread the gospel should endure and how they should practice the truth? Why haven't they put this into practice at all? Is it a problem if the people to whom you preach the gospel do not give you water to drink or food to eat? This is not a problem. Spreading the gospel to people is fulfilling our obligation; it is our duty. There are no additional conditions. The people to whom you preach are not obliged to feed you, wait on you, or smile at you. They do not have to listen to everything you say and obey you. They are under no such obligation. If you can think this way, that is objective and rational. Then, you will be able to regard these things correctly. So, how should someone who is investigating the true way be treated? As long as they conform to the principles of God's house for spreading the gospel, we have an obligation to preach it to them; and even if their current attitude is poor and unaccepting, we must exercise patience. For how long and to what extent must we be patient? Until they reject you and do not let you into their house, and no discussion works, nor does calling them, or having someone else go invite them, and they do not acknowledge you. In this case, there is no way to spread the gospel to them. That is when you will have fulfilled your responsibility. That is what it means to perform your duty. However, so long as there is a bit of hope, you should think of every way you can and do your utmost to read God's words and bear witness for His work to them. Say, for instance, you have been in contact with someone for two or three years. You have tried spreading the gospel and testifying for God to them many times, but they have no intention of accepting it. Yet their understanding is guite good, and they really are a potential gospel recipient. What should you do? First of all, you absolutely must not give up on them, instead you should maintain normal interactions with them, and keep reading God's words to them and bearing witness for His work. Do not give up on them; be patient until the end. On some unknown day, they will wake up and feel it is time to investigate the true way. That is why practicing patience and persevering to the end is a very important aspect of spreading the gospel. And why do this? Because it is the duty of a created being. Since you are in contact with them, you have an obligation and a responsibility to preach God's gospel to them. Many processes lie between them first hearing God's words and the gospel up until they turn themselves around, and this takes time. This period calls for you to be patient and wait, until that day comes when they turn themselves around and you bring them before God, back to His house. This is your obligation. What is an obligation? It is a responsibility that cannot be shirked, to which one is honor-bound. It is just like how a mother treats her child. No matter how disobedient or mischievous the child may be, or if they are sick and will not eat, what is the mother's obligation? Knowing that this is her child, she dotes on them, and loves them, and cares for them attentively. It makes no difference whether the child acknowledges her as their mother or not, and it does not matter how they treat her—she stays by their side all the same, protecting them, without leaving for an instant, constantly waiting for them to believe that she is their mother and for them to return to her embrace. In this way, she constantly watches over and cares for them. This is what responsibility means; this is what it means to be honorbound. If those engaged in spreading the gospel would practice in this way, harboring this sort of loving heart for people, they would then be upholding the principles of spreading the gospel, and be entirely capable of achieving results. If they're always making excuses and talking about their conditions, they will not be able to spread the gospel, and they will not be fulfilling their duty. Some people who spread the gospel are always picky about potential gospel recipients having too many questions and difficulties and being poor in caliber, and as a result, they are unwilling to suffer and pay a price to win them over. But if their own parents and relatives have a lot of difficulties and poor caliber, they are still able to treat them with a loving heart. Doesn't this mean that they are not treating people fairly? Do these people have loving hearts? Are they people who show consideration for the will of God? Absolutely not. When spreading the gospel, they always look for any reasons and excuses they can find based on objective conditions to not preach the gospel to people, or, no matter who they see, they do not find them pleasing and think them to be inferior to themselves, and they always feel that there is no one to preach the gospel to—as a result, they end up not bringing the gospel to a single person. Are there principles in spreading the gospel like this? Someone like this doesn't consider God's will or God's requirements at all. Anyone who can acknowledge that God's words are the truth and anyone who can accept the truth is a potential recipient of the gospel, unless they are obviously wicked people or absurd types. If people would truly show consideration for God's will, they would perform their duties and treat people with principles. No matter what problems people investigating the true way have or how much they reveal their corrupt dispositions, as long as they can acknowledge and accept the truth, you should tirelessly read God's words to them and testify for God's work. This is the principle that must be followed in spreading the gospel.

I have heard that some of those who spread the gospel do not have any love at all in their hearts. While dealing with the notions and questions of those who are investigating the true way, these spreaders of the gospel engage in fellowship multiple times. But when those people still do not understand and keep asking questions over and over again, these spreaders of the gospel can no longer bear it and start to lecture them. "You ask too many questions. You don't understand the truth no matter how much I fellowship with you. Your caliber is too low, you don't have the comprehension ability, and you can't gain the truth and life. You are all service-doers." Some people cannot bear to hear such words and become negative for a while. People differ from one to another. Some people see that God's words are the truth when they investigate the true way. Even if they have some notions and problems, these are solved while they read God's words. These people are so pure that they can easily accept the truth. They read God's words by themselves, seek, and investigate, and then when someone fellowships with them, they willingly accept the true way and join the church. But other people have a lot of questions. They have to investigate until they find clarity in all respects. If there is just one point that they have not investigated until it is clear, they will not accept the true way. These people are careful and cautious in everything they do. Some of those who spread the gospel do not have any love in their hearts for such people. What is their attitude? "You can believe it or not! You will be no great loss to the house of God, nor will you be any great gain. If you don't believe, just leave! How do you have so many questions? These have all been answered for you already." In fact, these spreaders of the gospel do not answer the questions raised by these potential recipients of the gospel clearly, they do not fellowship on the truth clearly, they do not completely dispel the doubts in these people's hearts, but they want them to abandon their notions and accept the gospel as guickly as possible. Is this something people can be forced to do even if they are unwilling? If someone says truthfully that they don't understand, then you should read a few passages from God's words to them concerning their problems and notions, and then fellowship on the truth to enable them to understand. Some potential gospel recipients like to get to the root of things. People like this want to find out everything. They aren't making things difficult for you, they aren't nitpicking or finding fault, they just take things seriously. When encountering such serious people, some of those who spread the gospel can't answer them and feel that they have made a fool of themselves. Consequently, they do not want to fellowship with such people, saying, "I've been spreading the gospel for so many years, but I've never had such a thorn in my side!" These spreaders of the gospel call such people thorns in their side. In fact, these spreaders of the gospel have only half an understanding of any aspect of the truth, they speak about some grand doctrines and empty words and try to get people to accept them as the truth. Is this not making things hard for others? If others don't understand and ask detailed questions, they are not happy, and say, "I've explained the three stages of God's work to you, and I've explained them clearly. If you still can't understand after I have said so much, you should read God's words yourself to resolve your notions. The word of God is sitting right there. If you read and understand it, then believe. If you can't understand it, then don't believe!" After hearing this, the potential gospel recipients think, "If I continue to ask guestions, I may lose out on my chance to be saved and not be able to receive blessings. I won't ask questions then, I'll just quickly go along with him and believe!" Afterward, these people keep attending gatherings and listen to sermons attentively, and they gradually come to understand some truths and gradually resolve their notions. Regardless of how their belief is going now, is this an appropriate way to spread the gospel? Can it be said that these spreaders of the gospel have fulfilled their responsibility? (It cannot.) In spreading the gospel, you must first fulfill your responsibility. You must follow your conscience and sense in doing all that you can and all that you ought. You must lovingly provide solutions to whatever notions the person investigating the true way may have or whatever questions they raise. If you really cannot provide a solution, you can find a few relevant passages of God's words to read to them, or relevant clips about experiential testimony, or some relevant gospel testimony films to show them. It is entirely possible that this will be effective; at the very least you will be fulfilling your responsibility, and won't feel accused by your conscience. But if you are perfunctory and muddle your way through, you are liable to delay things, and it will not be easy to win over that person. In spreading the gospel to others, one must fulfill their responsibility. How should the word "responsibility" be understood? How, precisely, should it be put into practice and applied? Well, you should understand that having welcomed the Lord and experienced God's work in the last days, you have an obligation to bear witness for His work to those who thirst for His appearance. So, how are you to spread the gospel to them? Whether online or in real life, you should spread it in whatever way wins over people and is effective. Gospel-spreading is not something you do when you feel like it, something you do when you are in a good mood and do not do when you are not. Neither is it something done according to your preferences, with you deciding who receives preferential treatment, spreading the gospel to those you like and not spreading it to those you do not. The gospel should be spread according to God's demands and to the principles of His house. You should fulfill the responsibility and duty of a created being, doing all that you are capable of to testify to the truths you understand, to the words of God, and to the work of God to those investigating the true way. That is how you fulfill the responsibility and duty of a created being. What should a person do as they are spreading the gospel? They should fulfill their responsibility, do all they can, and be willing to pay every price. It is possible that you have been preaching the gospel for a short time, lack sufficient experience, are not very eloquent, and do not have a high level of education. In fact, these things are not of critical importance. The most important thing is that you choose suitable passages from the word of God and fellowship on truths that hit home and can solve problems. Your attitude must be sincere and enable you to touch people, so that no matter what you say, potential gospel recipients are all willing to listen to you, especially when you talk about your real experiences and speak from the heart. If you can make the potential recipients of the gospel like you so that they willingly associate with you, willingly fellowship with you, and willingly listen to your testimony, then that is a success. They will then treat you as a confidant, and willingly listen to everything you say, they will find all aspects of the truth you choose to fellowship on to be good and very practical, and be able to accept them all. In this way, you can easily win them over. This is the wisdom you must possess if you spread the gospel. If you cannot help people with a loving heart and you cannot be a confidant to others, you will find it too much of an effort to spread the gospel and win people over. Why is it that those who speak simply and openly, those who are straightforward and warm-hearted are so effective in spreading the gospel? It is because everyone likes gospel spreaders like this, and they are willing to interact and build friendships with them. If gospel spreaders like this understand the truth and fellowship on the truth in a particularly practical and clear manner, if they can patiently fellowship the truth with others, solve the various problems, difficulties, and perplexities that people have, brighten up their hearts, and bring great comfort to them, people will like and trust them in their hearts, take them as a confidant, and listen willingly to anything they say. If a gospel spreader always puts themselves on a pedestal and lectures others, treating them like children and students, people will likely see them as annoying and repulsive. Therefore, the wisdom you should possess to spread the gospel is this: First, make a good impression on others, speaking in a way that is agreeable to your listeners. After listening to you, they should be able to gain something from it, and receive some benefit. In this way, your spreading of the gospel will be smooth sailing, encounter no obstacles, and achieve fruitful results. Even though some people may not accept the gospel, they will see that you are a good person and willingly associate with you. Those who preach the gospel should be able to socialize with people. Making a wide range of friends is a good road to take. Additionally, there is still one thing of the utmost importance. No matter who you preach the gospel to, you must first do a lot of prep work. You must equip yourself with the truth, master principles, have the ability to discern people, and employ wise methods. You must persistently practice doing this prep work. First of all, in your conversations with people who are investigating, you must understand and grasp their backgrounds, what denominations they belong to, what their primary notions are, whether they are introverts or extroverts, how their comprehension abilities are, and how their characters are. This is the key thing. Once you have a firm grasp of potential gospel recipients in all respects, your preaching of the gospel will be much more effective, and you will know how to prescribe the right medicine to resolve their notions and problems. If you encounter temptations from wicked people, atheists, or devils, you will be able to sense them, discern them for who they are, and hurriedly abandon them. Reading God's words can reveal all kinds of people. Wicked people and atheists will be repulsed when they hear them, and devils hate to listen to God's words. Only those who thirst for the truth will be interested. They will seek the truth and ask questions. This is how you can confirm that they are potential gospel recipients. Once we confirm this, we can engage them in systematic fellowship on the truth. When fellowshiping on the truth, we can fully grasp the caliber of these potential gospel recipients, how well they can comprehend the truth, and the state of their characters. In this way, we will know which people to work on and how to fellowship on the truth. No matter how much effort we put in, it will not be in vain. In the process of spreading the gospel, if you do not understand and grasp the situation of the other party and do not prescribe the right medicine, it will not be easy to win over people. Even if you do happen to win over a few people, it will only be by chance. Those who understand the truth and see to the bottom of things are able to take fewer wrong turns when spreading the gospel or avoid taking them entirely. They preach to the people they should and do not preach to the people they should not. They make an accurate assessment before preaching and avoid doing useless work. In this way, they do their duty with greater efficiency and less wasted effort, achieving good results. So, if you want to spread the gospel effectively, equip yourself with the truth and do enough prep work. What if you meet a religious person who knows the Bible well, but you haven't read the Bible? What can you do? At that time, it's too late for you to equip yourself with the truth of the Bible, so you should quickly introduce them to a gospel spreader who understands the Bible. Give this person over to whoever understands the Bible. This is in line with the truth principles. If you try to blindly show off by preaching the gospel to them anyway, this person will not accept the gospel. This result will be caused by your irresponsibility. In addition, you have to find the time to equip yourself with some knowledge of the Bible when you are not working. Spreading the gospel without knowing anything about the Bible is not very workable. Many of the questions raised by investigators involve the words in the Bible. If you understand the Bible, you can use the truth of the Bible to resolve these questions. No matter what notions the potential gospel recipients hold, you can find the corresponding Bible verses and words of God to resolve their notions. The desired result can only be achieved in this way. Therefore, spreading the gospel requires some knowledge of the Bible. For example, you should know which prophecies in the Old Testament and which verses in the New Testament testify to God's return and God's work in the last days. You should read these words more, ponder them more, and keep them in your heart. In addition, you must understand how religious people understand these Bible verses, ponder how to fellowship so as to lead them to an accurate and pure understanding of these verses, and then incorporate these verses of the Bible to guide them to an understanding of God's work in the last days. Is this doing your prep work? This is exactly what it means to do prep work. You have to understand the needs of the different kinds of people who investigate the true way, and then do some prep work according to the situation. Only then will you be able to do all that you can and fulfill your responsibilities. This is your responsibility. Some people will say, "I don't need to do all that. I just need to read the Bible a few times. No matter who I spread the gospel to, I always say the same things. The words I use to preach the gospel are fixed and do not change. I will use these words and they can believe or not. The people that don't believe won't receive blessings. They can't put that on me. After all, I've fulfilled my responsibility." Did they fulfill their responsibility? What is the situation of the person investigating, what is their age, education level, marital status, hobbies, personality, humanity, family situation, and so on? You don't know any of this, but you still go and preach to them. You have not done any prep work and made no effort at all. And you still claim to have fulfilled your responsibility? Isn't this just deceiving people? Treating your duty like this shows a superficial and irresponsible attitude. It is a perfunctory attitude. You preach the gospel with such an attitude and, when you don't win someone over, you say, "If he doesn't believe, that's just his bad luck. Besides, he lacks spiritual understanding, so even if he did believe, he wouldn't be able to gain the truth or be saved!" This is irresponsible. You are shirking your responsibility. You obviously didn't do your prep work well. It is obvious that you didn't fulfill your responsibility, that you didn't do your duty faithfully. And you still make excuses by giving all kinds of reasons, trying to shirk your responsibility with words. What kind of behavior is this? It's called deception. To shirk your responsibility, you make judgments and draw conclusions about people and talk irresponsible nonsense. This is called arrogance and self-righteousness, insidiousness and viciousness. It is also called deception. It is trying to deceive God.

If God has entrusted to you the duty of spreading the gospel, you should accept God's commission, deferentially and obediently. You should endeavor to treat every person who is investigating the true way with love and patience, and you should be able to bear hardship and toil. Be diligent in taking responsibility for sharing the gospel; provide clear fellowship about the truth, so that you may give account of it to God. This is the attitude with which one should perform their duty. If someone investigating the true way seeks the truth from you, and you brush them aside, are unable to earnestly fellowship about the truth to them and resolve their problem, and even find excuses, saying, "I'm not in the mood now. Whoever they are, however much they thirst for the truth or for God's appearance and work, it's not my business. It's not on me whether they can believe. If the Holy Spirit doesn't go to work, no matter how much prep work I do, it will be of no use—so I won't make that effort! Anyway, I've already said all the truths I understand. Whether they can accept the true way, that's God's affair. It has nothing to do with me," then what attitude is this? It is an irresponsible attitude, a hardened one. Are there not many who spread the gospel in this way? Can such gospel-spreading meet an adequate standard? Can it exalt God and bear witness to Him? No, not in the least. Such gospel-spreading is merely a bit of service; it comes nowhere near the performance of a duty. So, how can one spread the gospel adequately? No matter who it is investigating the true way, you must first do prep work and equip yourself with the truth, then rely on love, patience, tolerance, and a sense of responsibility to perform this duty of yours well. Be unadulterated and do all you can and ought to do. Spreading the gospel in this way is adequate. If circumstances do not allow you to spread the gospel, or if the person investigating refuses to listen and leaves, this is not your fault. You have done what you should do, and your conscience will not accuse you. This means that you have fulfilled your responsibility. Some people may meet the principles for spreading the gospel, but the timing may not be right. It is not yet God's time. In this case, the work of spreading the gospel must be set aside for the time being. Does setting aside the work mean that you do not spread the gospel to the person? It does not mean that you do not spread the gospel, only that you wait for the appropriate time to do so. What other people should not be preached to? For example, when a person speaks in tongues—not for a day or two, or even a year or two—but for a long time, and can speak this way at any time and in any place, this person is an evil spirit and the gospel cannot be spread to them. There are also people who appear to be good people on the outside, but upon inquiry and with further understanding, you discover that they have committed adultery with many people. If the gospel is spread to people such as these, it will cause much trouble. They will be likely to cause disturbance for God's chosen people, so the gospel must not be preached to them. There are also some religious pastors who require too much effort to accept the truth. Even if they are willing to accept it, they still have conditions. They are only content to serve as leaders and workers. Most people of this sort are antichrists. According to the principles, the gospel should not be spread to them. Only if they are willing to do the service of spreading the gospel and are able to bring in many others is it permitted to spread the gospel to people like this. If someone's humanity is too wicked, and you can tell that they are a wicked person by their appearance alone, then this sort of person will never accept the truth and will never repent. Even if someone like this entered the church, they would be expelled, so the gospel should never be spread to them. Preaching to someone like this would be tantamount to bringing Satan and a devil into the church. Another situation comes up when some minors are willing to believe in God. However, in some democratic countries, minors must obtain the consent of their guardians if they want to participate in church life and perform their duties. Do not ignore this requirement. It calls for a reasonable solution, and wisdom is needed. In China, as long as one of the parents leads such a minor to believe in God, there is no problem at all. If a young adult who is no longer a minor can comprehend the truth and wants to believe in God, but their parents oppose and limit them, the young adult can leave their family and come to the church to believe in and follow God free from the restrictions and obstacles of their parents. This is completely proper. This is the same situation as Peter's when he came to believe in God. In conclusion, regardless of the situation, it is permitted to spread the gospel as long as the objective conditions permit and it does not violate the law. This matter needs to be approached according to the truth principles and the dictates of wisdom.

When spreading the gospel, how can someone fulfill their duty adequately? First, they must be able to comprehend and understand the truth concerning spreading the gospel. Only when they understand the truth can they possess the correct views, know how to deal with wrong or absurd views, and know how to handle affairs and deal with problems in accord with the truth principles. Then, they will be able to discern various incorrect practices and practices of antichrists that violate the truth principles. As such, they will naturally understand which truth principles should be mastered in order to fulfill their duty of spreading the gospel. To fulfill this duty, what truth is it of the utmost importance to understand first? You must understand that spreading the message of God's work is the responsibility and obligation of each of God's chosen people. It is a commission that God has entrusted to all. This is the source of this duty. Some people say, "I'm not on the gospel team, so do I have this responsibility and obligation?" They all have this responsibility and obligation. The truth concerning this aspect of duty is useful to everyone. I do not know if you have noticed a certain phenomenon in the allocation of various personnel in the church. Some people were once leaders, but they were then replaced because they could not do practical work. After being replaced, as they did not possess any skills or expertise, they could not perform special duties. So finally, they were assigned to the gospel team to spread the gospel, or to water newcomers, or to perform some ordinary duties. If they likewise fail to fulfill any other duties in the church, what should happen to them? Such people are refuse and should be cast out. So, if you are dismissed as a church leader for incompetence and you don't have any special talents or skills, then you have to be prepared to spread the gospel. If you can spread the gospel and do your duty as part of the gospel team, then the truth about performing duties adequately is relevant to you. If you fail to fulfill your duty of spreading the gospel, the truth about performing duties adequately has no relevance to you, and in God's house, during the time of God's work, the work of performing a duty is no concern of yours. In your heart, you should clearly know all that this implies. If you do not perform any duty, what relationship do you have with the work of God? Therefore, regardless of the type of duty one performs, it is, naturally, best if they can persevere to the end and perform their duty well. Some people say, "I don't want to spread the gospel because this always brings me into contact with strangers. There are all sorts of bad people who are capable of all manner of bad things. In particular, religious people treat those who spread God's gospel of the last days as enemies and are quite capable of handing them over to Satan's regime. They are worse than the unbelievers. I could not bear this pain. They might beat me to death, maim me, or hand me over to the great red dragon. That would finish me." Since you can't bear the hardship and your stature is so small, you should do the work of your current job well. That would be the wise choice. Of course, it would be even better if you could perform various duties as well as spreading the gospel. Spreading the gospel is not only the responsibility of the members of the gospel team, it is the responsibility of everyone. Because everyone has heard the good news and glad tidings of God's new work from God, everyone has the responsibility and obligation to proclaim this gospel so that more people will come to God's house upon hearing the good news and come before God to accept His salvation. This will allow the work of God to reach its conclusion as soon as possible. Such is God's commission, such is His will.

Some of those who spread the gospel busily preach the gospel all day long, yet fail to win over a single person after several years of preaching. What has happened? They look so busy, and it seems that they do their duty with great care. So why didn't they win anyone over? The truth that must be understood for the duty of spreading the gospel is actually similar to the truths that must be understood for other duties. If someone preaches the gospel for several years without winning over anyone, it means that this person has problems. What are these problems? The primary problem is that they do not fellowship clearly on the truth of the vision in spreading the gospel. Why is their fellowship unclear? Either it is because their caliber is too poor for this, or else it is because they are so busy all day that they have no time to read God's words or to ponder on the truth, and they do not understand anything of the truth, and cannot resolve any notions, heresies, or fallacies. If both of these things are the case, can this person fulfill their duty to spread the gospel? I fear it will be very difficult for them to win people over. No matter how many years they work at spreading the gospel, they will see no obvious results. To spread the gospel, you must first understand the truth of the vision. No matter what questions people ask, as long as you fellowship on the truth so that it becomes clear, you can answer their questions. If you don't understand the truth of the vision and cannot speak clearly no matter how you fellowship, then however you spread the gospel, you will not get results. If you do not understand the truth, you should focus on seeking the truth and fellowshiping on the truth. If you read more of God's words, listen to more sermons, fellowship more on the truth of spreading the gospel, and always work hard at fellowshiping on the truth of the vision so as to truly understand the truth of the vision, and to be able to solve the most common notions and problems of religious people, then you will be able to achieve some results, rather than no results at all. Therefore, the failure to understand the truth of the vision of God's work is one reason why people cannot achieve results when spreading the gospel. In addition, you cannot grasp or understand the questions raised by those investigating the true way, and you can't see into their hearts to find where their biggest problems lie and determine the main problems hindering their acceptance of the true way. If you can't be sure about these problems, then you can't spread the gospel or testify for God to other people. If you only practice preaching the gospel using empty theories, it will not work. Once the people investigating start to ask questions, you will not be able to answer them. You will only be able to perfunctorily brush them off by talking about some doctrines. Will spreading the gospel in this way win people over? Certainly not. Many times, when those who are investigating cannot readily accept the true way, it is because you do not give clear answers to their questions. In this case, they will wonder why it is that you, who have believed for so long, can't give a clear explanation to these questions. In their hearts, they will doubt whether this is the true way, so they will not dare to believe or accept it. Is this not the true situation? This is the second reason why people may not achieve results when spreading the gospel. If you want to spread the gospel but can't solve actual problems, then you have no way to spread the gospel to people. If you don't understand the truth, how can you solve their problems? Therefore, if you want to achieve results in spreading the gospel, you must work hard to seek the truth and thoroughly understand all the questions raised by the people investigating. In this way, you can answer their questions by engaging in fellowship on the truth with them. Some spreaders of the gospel always look for some objective reason that can serve as an excuse, saying, "These people are so difficult to deal with. Each one is more warped than the last, and none of them accept the truth. They are rebellious and stubborn, and they always cling to religious notions." Such spreaders of the gospel will not work hard to solve the difficulties and problems of these people, so they will fail each and every time they try to spread the gospel. They lack the least bit of love and cannot persevere very long in this duty. From the outside, it looks like they are very busy, but in fact, they have not made enough of an effort for each person who is investigating the true way. They do not treat the questions these people ask in a serious and responsible manner. They do not seek the truth to find a solution, resolve these questions step by step, and finally win over those people. Instead, they just muddle along. No matter how many people they lose out on, they still stick with the same approach. They work for a few days, and then take a few days off. What do they make of spreading the gospel? They make it into a game, a type of social interaction. They think, "Today I will meet this sort of people and have a lively good time. Tomorrow I will meet that sort of people, and it will be new and interesting." In the end, they will never win over anyone. They never feel any reproach or any sense of burden due to this failure to win anyone over. By spreading the gospel in this way can they fulfill their duty? Are they not being perfunctory and careless and trying to deceive God? Someone who has always spread the gospel in this way is not truly fulfilling their duty because they have not fulfilled their responsibility at all. They are careless and perfunctory about everything. What other reasons cause a failure to win over people when spreading the gospel? Tell Me. (Not spreading the gospel according to the principles.) It does occur that people only care about numbers when spreading the gospel. Such people do not preach according to the principles and often fail to win people over. It also occurs that some people on the gospel team eagerly fight over potential gospel recipients, thinking that the one who spreads the gospel to more people will earn more credit. When potential gospel recipients see them compete in this way, they will not be edified. Instead, notions will arise in their minds, "You believers in God are not united, there is jealousy and strife among you." Then, they will not want to believe. This is a stumbling block. Is this also part of the reason why they fail to win over people when spreading the gospel? (Yes.) Some potential gospel recipients have lived in society for a long time and are on guard against all kinds of people, especially strangers. If there is no intermediary to make an introduction, they will be wary when they first meet someone. For example, if you have just met a stranger, you will certainly not casually tell them your name, address, and phone number. When you become familiar with them, when you get to know each other, when you know that they have no ill will toward you, you will become friends. Only then would you give them this information. However, some of those who spread the gospel cannot understand people, so when people are wary of them, they call these people deceitful and evil. They condemn their defensive mindset, shifting their own responsibility to others. Are those gospel spreaders not also wary of strangers?

Why do they not condemn themselves, but think themselves wise in being wary? It's not fair to treat people in this way. Some of those who spread the gospel ask potential gospel recipients for their personal information as soon as they meet them. If someone doesn't want to give it to them, this sort of gospel spreader will not want to preach to this person. What sort of disposition is this? It is a malicious disposition. They become angry and refuse to preach the gospel just because someone doesn't comply with their requirements in such a small matter. How contemptible! Why do you want to spread the gospel to others? Is this not doing your duty? If you act as you please, is this still doing your duty? Isn't this purely rendering service? How should you give an account of yourself to God? If you never repent, God will condemn you and cast you out. You are bringing trouble upon yourself.

I heard of a case where members of two gospel teams met one potential gospel recipient. Then, they argued with each other, both claiming that they were the ones who contacted this person first. What is the use of fighting over this? Is this a matter of ignorance? This is something that cannot be done. So, what is the proper thing to do? Everyone has to discuss the matter together. It doesn't matter who was the first to make contact. When you find that you have come into contact with the same person, spread the gospel together, divide the work, and cooperate together. If you originally planned to spend two months bringing the gospel to this person, try to do it in only one month since you have more people. Then, everyone should fellowship on the problems and difficulties of the potential gospel recipient, about which aspects of the truth everyone needs to seek in order to solve these issues, on how the two teams should coordinate, and so on. What is the purpose of doing this? It is to win over this person and fulfill your duty. When everyone is of one heart and mind, fellowships together, and directs all their efforts to the same goal, the Holy Spirit will enlighten and lead them. When they are united, people can easily accomplish things, and they will receive God's blessings and guidance. However, if you don't act in this way, if you always compete against others, if you are always managing your own business, if you always draw a clear line between yourself and others, and if you only care about winning over people yourself when spreading the gospel—you preach for you, and I'll win over people on my own—can you fulfill your duty with one heart and one mind? Sometimes people can do their duties on their own, but other times everyone needs to work together harmoniously in order to properly perform the work of the church. If everyone acts on their own and does not cooperate harmoniously, this will mess up the work of the church. Who will take responsibility for this? Everyone is responsible, and the main supervisor bears a larger share of the responsibility. When you mess up the work of the church, you not only fail to do your duty properly, but also commit a great evil, incurring God's disgust and revulsion. Then you have gotten into trouble. If God condemns you as a wicked person or an antichrist who disturbs the work of the church, it will be even worse. You will certainly be exposed and cast out, and you will even have to receive punishment. If you abandon your duty, what is this equivalent to? You will have no share in God's work and will not receive God's salvation. You will belong to the unbelievers, and your life will lose its meaning. What are you living for today? What value do you bring to the gospel team? How can you reflect your value as an individual? You must fulfill your responsibilities in a downto-earth manner, do your duty well, and be able to give assurances to God, saying, "I have won over some people by spreading the gospel. I have done everything in my power. Although I am of poor caliber and only possess a few truth realities, I have done the best I could. I have done my duty without throwing in the towel, getting upset, feeling negative and slacking off, or trying to gain fame or profit. Instead, I have suffered more than a little humiliation in preaching the gospel, endured insults and expulsions from religious circles, and made my bed in the street. Although I have experienced negativity and weakness, I did not abandon my duty, but persevered in spreading the gospel at all times. I thank God for the protection and guidance He gave me." This is what it means to truly fulfill your responsibilities. When the day comes, you will be able to come before God with a clear conscience like this and give an account of yourself. Maybe you met many potential gospel recipients, but did not win over many people. However, based on your caliber and your actions, you won over all the people you could by giving it your best effort. In this case, how will God evaluate you? You have performed your duty adequately. You have tried your best and put your whole heart into it. In order to spread the gospel to potential gospel recipients, you have worked hard to equip yourself with the truth of the vision, and familiarized yourself with the relevant verses of the Bible. You memorized what you needed to memorize and wrote down what you couldn't memorize. When spreading the gospel, no matter who you met and what questions they asked, you were able to provide a solution. This way, your work spreading the gospel became more and more effective and you were able to win over more people. In order to win over more people when spreading the gospel, in order to perform this duty well and fulfill your responsibilities, you overcame many difficulties in yourself, including your own shortcomings, weaknesses, and negative emotions. All of this you overcame, and you dedicated much time to this task. Is it not necessary to overcome such difficulties in order to perform your duty well? (It is.) Furthermore, in order to bring those investigating the true way to hear God's voice, to understand and know God's work, and to accept the true way, you need to understand more of the truth so that you may better testify to God's work. No matter how deep or shallow your fellowship on the truth is, you should have love and patience. Maybe your listeners ridicule you, insult you, reject you, or do not understand you—no matter, if you can deal with this correctly and patiently fellowship on the truth with them, and you have invested a great deal of effort and paid a high price to this end, then you have fulfilled your responsibilities. Doing your duty this way is doing it adequately.

When some gospel spreaders meet a potential gospel recipient who is arrogant due to their family's wealth and social status, they always feel inferior and uncomfortable when standing before them. Will this discomfort affect your performance of your duty? If it affects you so that you are unable to do your duty well and cannot fulfill your responsibilities, then you are not performing your duty. If it only affects your frame of mind—making you unhappy and uncomfortable—but you do not abandon your duty or forget your responsibilities and obligations, so that, in the end, you complete your work and do it well, then you have truly fulfilled your duty. Is this the truth? (Yes.) This is the truth, and everyone should accept it. Is this a situation you may find yourself in? For instance, some gospel recipients may look down on you because you come from the countryside. They may even belittle you. How do you deal with this? You say, "I was born in poverty out in the countryside, while you were born to a life of privilege in the city. This was ordained by God. However, God is gracious regardless of where we are born. We live in this era, and we are all blessed to have caught up with God's work in the last days." These words are the truth, not an attempt to ingratiate yourself. The gospel recipients will say, "Then you are not as blessed as we are. We enjoy this world and the next, but you can only enjoy the next life. Therefore, we enjoy more than you." You say, "This is all by God's grace." As they do not know God's work, is it necessary to dispute with them? If you don't value such things, you will not argue with them. In your heart, you should clearly understand that "I have a duty in my heart, a burden on my shoulders, a mission and an obligation. I won't argue with them about that. Come the day that they believe and return to the house of God, when they have heard more sermons and understand something of the truth, they will think of their conduct and actions today and be ashamed." If you think about it this way, your heart will open up. This is actually what happens. If you truly win them over and they really pursue the truth, then after believing for three or five years, they will recognize that it was inappropriate, lacking in humanity, and inconsistent with the truth to treat you as they did when they first met you. They will then have to apologize to you the next time they see you. In the process of spreading the gospel, you will encounter this sort of situation often. When this happens, how do I deal with it? I do not pay much attention to such things. It's not a big deal. If you do not think it is a big deal, then their words will not bother you. This is called possessing stature. If you understand the truth and possess the truth reality, you will be able to see through many sayings or practices that supposedly cause harm to people. You will be able to iron them out. However, if you can't see through these things, you will remember such words and actions for a lifetime and, with a wink, a word, or a gesture, anyone may injure you. How severe are such injuries? They will leave a mark on your heart. When you see wealthy people, people with higher status than you, or people like those who once looked down on you and attacked you, you will be afraid and timid. How can you do away with this timidity? You have to see through to their essence. No matter how grand they are, no matter what status or standing they hold, they are nothing but corrupt people. There is nothing special about them. If you see this, your heart will not be restrained. In the work of spreading the gospel, you will certainly encounter these problems. They are all common problems. Some people will not understand you or will be prejudiced against you, or even hintingly and indirectly say ugly things to ridicule you. Some people will say that you preach the gospel to make money, to seek profit, or to find romance. How would you handle such situations? Should you argue with such people? Especially when a potential gospel recipient comes from a family with money, what should you do if you are eating a meal in their house and see that look on their face? If, to maintain your dignity, you do not eat at their house, can you continue to preach the gospel on an empty stomach? You should consider the matter like this: "Today I can eat at their house and spread the gospel to them. They can receive those who spread the gospel. This is their good fortune." In fact, this is how things actually are. This is their good fortune. They don't realize it, but you need to know this in your heart. While spreading the gospel, one will often encounter such ridicule, mockery, sneers, and slander, or even find themselves in dangerous situations. Some brothers and sisters, for instance, are denounced or abducted by evil people, and the police are called on others, who are handed over to the government. Some may be arrested and jailed, while others may even be beaten to death. These are all things that happen. But now that we know about these things, should we change our attitude toward the work of spreading the gospel? (No.) Spreading the gospel is everyone's duty and obligation. At any time, regardless of what we hear, or what we see, or what kind of treatment we encounter, we must always uphold this responsibility of spreading the gospel. Under no circumstances can we give up on this duty because of negativity or weakness. The duty to spread the gospel is not smooth sailing, but fraught with danger. When you spread the gospel, you will not face angels, or aliens, or robots. You will face only evil and corrupt humanity, living demons, beasts—they are all humans surviving in this evil space, this evil world, who have been deeply corrupted by Satan, and resist God. Therefore, in the process of spreading the gospel, there are certainly all sorts of dangers, to say nothing of petty slander, sneers, and misunderstandings, which are common occurrences. If you truly regard spreading the gospel as a responsibility, as an obligation, and as your duty, then you will be able to regard these things correctly and even handle them correctly. You will not give up on your responsibility and your obligation, nor will you deviate from your original intention to spread the gospel and testify to God because of these things, and you will never put this responsibility aside, for this is your duty. How should this duty be understood? It is the value and primary obligation of human life. Spreading the good news of God's work in the last days and the gospel of God's work is the value of human life.

Today, we are fellowshiping on the truth of fulfilling one's duty to spread the gospel. Have you gained anything from this? (Yes.) In the past, our fellowship on the truth of spreading the gospel focused on vision, that is, we expressly fellowshiped on the truth related to the vision and did not discuss many detailed issues as we are today. Because most people know something about the general outline of the truth of the vision, but may not be clear on the detailed practice paths and principles for specific issues, today I bring these specific issues into our fellowship. Through fellowship on some cases and people's behavior—or the right and wrong things to do when someone encounters these situations, the viewpoints people hold, and how they should fulfill this responsibility, this obligation—through fellowship on all these topics, do you find that the truth of spreading the gospel becomes more concrete and easier to implement in real life? I believe that, after listening to this aspect of the truth, your hearts will become much brighter. When you encounter certain specific problems in the process of spreading the gospel, you will benefit from these words because they are practical and touch on the truth principles. They are not empty words. In your daily life, when you encounter such matters related to spreading the gospel and live in some incorrect states, or when you encounter some problems in your work of spreading the gospel, can you use these truths to solve the problems you face? If you can solve such problems, then today's words are not spoken in vain. If you still cannot solve such problems, or if you do things your own way, make your own decisions and stick to them, do whatever you want, and act willfully and recklessly without considering your duties and responsibilities, then these truths are just empty talk to you and serve for nothing. They serve for nothing not because the truth can't help you, not because the truth is of no benefit to you, but because you have no love for the truth at all and you don't practice the truth. You see the duty of spreading the gospel merely as a hobby or a way to pass the time. If you approach the duty of spreading the gospel with this point of view, what will happen? Will you be able to fulfill your duty adequately? (No.) If talking of fulfilling your duty adequately seems a bit distant, then let Me first ask you this: If you approach the duty of spreading the gospel with this point of view, can you satisfy the will of God? (No.) This should be clear in all of your hearts. When you approach this duty with this kind of viewpoint and this sort of attitude, your heart will feel unsteady. You will think that your attitude is not as God would like. If you act in this way, even if you win over some people and it looks like you are doing good deeds on the outside, your intentions and motives for performing your duty are contrary to the truth principles. You are just like those religious people who spread the gospel in order to obtain blessings and make deals with God. Such an intention and source of motivation are wrong. When considering how people perform their duties, God judges people's intentions and motives. God examines the attitudes and mindsets with which people approach their duties. Based on this, God works to cleanse people of corruption and save them so they can break away from sin. Therefore, no matter how you spread the gospel, you should accept God's scrutiny. No matter what kind of person you are, of what caliber you are, what sort of duty you have fulfilled, and what your duty was before you joined the ranks of those who spread the gospel, you should abide by these truth principles of spreading the gospel, you should see spreading the gospel as your duty and responsibility, and take it upon your shoulders.

Some leaders and workers who cannot do practical work or solve practical problems are replaced and assigned to spread the gospel as part of the gospel team. They might say to everyone they meet, "I was a leader. I was sent to the gospel team to spread the gospel because I didn't do a good job. Maybe God is having me spread the gospel to temper me for a time, to equip me with the truth and train me. That means I don't have to put that much effort into spreading the gospel. Whatever I do is fine. After all, I am leader material. Once I grow in stature, I must be made a leader. As I am of such good caliber, it would be a waste of talent if I were not a leader. Right now the church has a shortage of leaders and workers!" Their words imply that God's house can't do without them as leaders. They are only made to spread the gospel in order to give them the opportunity to practice, to equip them with the truth, and to have them do some grassroots work as a part of their cultivation and training. Therefore, they view their duty to spread the gospel as something temporary, they are only doing it to pad their resumes, have a good time, and broaden their horizons. They think that, if they achieve results in spreading the gospel, understand the truth, and are able to do some work, they will be promoted to serve as a leader or worker. If they adopt this mindset toward fulfilling their duty to spread the gospel, can they achieve true repentance? They have not reflected on themselves or come to know themselves. They have no self-awareness. Are these people in trouble? They don't correctly comprehend spreading the gospel. They think too highly of themselves; they really don't know themselves at all! They are completely unaware of what is actually going on. In fact, this has happened because they are not people who pursue the truth and they completely lack any comprehension ability. Superficially, they are articulate, they enjoy handling affairs, and it seems like they have some caliber, but when they serve as leaders and workers, their character and caliber are not up to scratch. They cannot meet the standards and criteria to be leaders and workers, so they are cast out. They don't see that they are a dime a dozen, but instead shamelessly boast and puff themselves up. Although some people will never say it, in their personal estimation they believe only those who can't do anything else are assigned to spread the gospel. In their hearts, they divide all duties in the house of God into high, middle, and low. They regard the duty of spreading the gospel as the most lowly of all the duties in the house of God. Whoever makes a mistake or does not fulfill their duty adequately is sent to spread the gospel. This is how these people comprehend this duty. Is there any difference between this understanding and taking spreading the gospel as one's responsibility and the obligation to be fulfilled in one's life? If someone understands it this way, can they do their duty well? (No.) Where did they go wrong? They regard a person's greatest responsibility and the obligation they should fulfill in their life—the work of spreading the gospel—as the humblest work. They don't take it as their own responsibility and obligation, and they don't understand it as a duty. No matter how the house of God fellowships on the necessity of faithfully performing one's duty and that spreading the gospel is one of these duties, they do not recognize that this is the case. In their heart, they believe that the various levels of leaders, workers, and people in charge in the house of God are at the top. They have absolute authority and will ultimately receive great rewards and be perfected by God. The followers under them are only foot soldiers, especially the spreaders of the gospel who always interact with people outside the church. Among all the jobs, their work may be the hardest and the most exhausting. In the end, you can't say for sure whether these people will be perfected. Is it their fault that they conceive of the duty of spreading the gospel in this way? Are there those who regard this sacred responsibility and obligation of spreading the gospel as the humblest chore and place it at the lowest rung of a hierarchy of ranks and grades? They look down on this duty and they also look down on those who perform it. So what viewpoint do they bring with them when they do this duty? (They view it as temporary.) Anything else? When they win someone over, they don't think much of it, and when they fail to win someone over, they don't care. They don't regard spreading the gospel as a part of their own work and do not make every effort to perform this duty well. In their hearts, they look down on the duty of spreading the gospel, so what will be the result of their work at spreading the gospel? Can they equip themselves with all aspects of the truth in order to fulfill their duty of spreading the gospel? In order to win over more people, do they memorize excerpts from God's word and Bible verses and familiarize themselves with a variety of experiential testimonies so that they can solve the various problems they meet when spreading the gospel? (No.) If when spreading the gospel, people who have absurd comprehension and hold many notions ask them difficult questions, how will they deal with them? (They will give up on them.) This is a sort of attitude. Will they complain to God, saying, "Why did I have to meet such a ridiculous person without any spiritual understanding when spreading the gospel? What bad luck!"? They have no love for potential gospel recipients, and they hope that God will not save this sort of person. Concerning this matter, they do not pray to God, nor do they seek God's will, much less show any consideration to God's will. They choose how they treat potential gospel recipients according to the preferences of the flesh, and when they encounter people with a lot of problems and serious notions, they give up on them. They only choose to spread the gospel to people with few notions or none at all, and they don't want to pay any price. Whenever something is detrimental to their vanity or dignity, or to their reputation or status, whenever something goes against the preferences of the flesh or conflicts with the enjoyments of the flesh, what do they choose to do? They choose to give up, choose to flee, choose not to fulfill this responsibility, but rather refuse this responsibility. At the same time, they inwardly complain to God in their hearts, "Why did I have to meet such a ridiculous person with so many notions? Why make me suffer this? I have lost face, wasted my effort, and failed to win anyone over." Covertly, their hearts are full of resentment toward God. Therefore, they are not willing to accept the duty of spreading the gospel, and they are not willing to fulfill the responsibility of spreading the gospel either; if their attitudes toward the duty of spreading the gospel are such as this, then they are not far from being cast out.
